"If a State bank or trust company is required or permitted by the law of its State to keep its reserves either in its own vaults or with another State bank or trust company or with a national bank, such reserve deposits so kept in such State bank, trust company, or national bank shall be construed within the meaning of this section as if they were reserve deposits in a national bank in a reserve or central reserve city for a period of three years after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in the district in which such State bank or trust company is situate. Except as thus provided, no member bank shall keep on deposit with any nonmember bank a sum in excess of 10 per cent of its own paid-up capital and surplus. No member bank shall act as the medium or agent of a nonmember bank in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this act except by permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The reserve carried by a member bank with a Federal reserve bank may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, be checked against and withdrawn by such member bank for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities: Provided, However, That no bank shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserve required by law is fully restored.

"In estimating the reserves required by this act, the net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the bank deposits against which reserves shall be determined. Balances in reserve banks due to member banks shall, to the extent herein provided, be counted as reserves.

"National banks located in Alaska or outside the continental United States may remain nonmember banks, and shall in that event maintain reserves and comply with all the conditions now provided by law regulating them; or said banks, except in the Philippine Islands, may, with the consent of the reserve board, become member banks of any one of the reserve districts, and shall, in that event, take stock, maintain reserves, and be subject to all the other provisions of this act."

Mr. GRONNA. I do not happen to have the present law before me. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma in what respect this bill differs from the present law?

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will observe the calendar print, he will find on page 3 the changes that are made.

Mr. GRONNA. I have that bill before me.

Mr. OWEN. In line 3, on page 3, the word "thirteen" is inserted instead of "fourteen," "thirteen" having been an error in the original bill. In the succeeding paragraph is the only change that is made. Otherwise it is merely a repetition of the same section, for the convenience of those who would have to inspect the changes made.

The purpose of it is, in the second paragraph of page 3, to permit State banks which are coming into this system to retain deposits of other member banks during the 36 months within which the change is made from the present system to the new Federal reserve system. It simply protects the State banks to that extent.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no further questions.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on a prior occasion when this bill was up I called the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to what seemed to me to be an error in the designation of the section of the Federal reserve act to which reference is made. It now reads "section 13 of the Federal reserve act." What was the section originally given in the bill as introduced?

Mr. OWEN. Fourteen, which related to open-market operations.

Mr. BURTON. And the change has been made to section 13?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; so as to describe the notes which are referred to in section 13.

Mr. BURTON. And that is in accordance with the provisions in regard to reserves contained in the original act?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; section 13 of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. BURTON. This does not affect the nature of the reserves?

Mr. OWEN. No. I think it makes it what it was intended to be in the first instance. If the Senator has before him the Federal reserve act, section 13——

Mr. BURTON. I have it.

Mr. OWEN. It provides that—

Any Federal reserve bank may receive from any of its member banks, and from the United States, deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, or checks and drafts upon solvent member banks, payable upon presentation; or, solely for exchange purposes, may receive from other Federal reserve banks deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, or checks and drafts upon solvent member or other Federal reserve banks, payable upon presentation.

Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, with a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange—

And so forth. This reference should be to section 13.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by striking out the word "as," so as to read: "A bill proposing an amendment to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes."

Res. 314) for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and their being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, and for personal services, rent, and other expenses which may be incurred in the District of Columbia or elsewhere in connection with or growing out of the existing political disturbance in Europe, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President: Provided, That American citizens to whom relief is extended or transportation is furnished hereunder shall pay to or reimburse the United States all reasonable expenses so incurred, respectively, on their account, if financially able to do so. In the execution of the provisions hereof the President is authorized to employ any officers, employees, and vessels of the United States and use any supplies of the Naval or Military Establishments, and to charter and employ any vessels that may be required.

A detailed statement of all expenditures hereunder and under the appropriation of $250,000 made in the joint resolution approved August 3, 1914, and of all amounts reimbursed to the United States of such expenditures shall be made to Congress on or before the beginning of its next regular session.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the trade commission bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the Senators are well worn out with long discussion upon the pending measure, but I have not occupied the time or the attention of the Senate at all up to this time, and I say now that I shall spend but a short time in the consideration of the bill. I was glad to hear the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] say this was not a party measure. I shall not attempt in the consideration of the matter to go into the legal construction of "unfair competition," "unjust discrimination," or the question of "restraint of trade."

These questions have been discussed at great length by the learned lawyers of the Senate, even by a former justice of the supreme court of his State who had been long upon the bench. These men who have "walked the mountain ridges of the law," I think, at times have been illuminating in their discussion. Yet as I have listened and become pretty well satisfied with the contention of one side I am confused by the discussion on the other side of the pending measure.

We are embarking upon a great ocean of doubt and trouble. We are venturing upon an untried and uncharted sea. In my judgment, there is more trouble in this legislation for this country than there has been in any piece of legislation in recent years.

In the first place, I am opposed, unless there is extreme necessity for it, to the multiplication of bureaus and commissions; and nobody knows, as it has been attempted to estimate the number here, the number of employees under the Government that will exist under this commission.

Mr. President, it is well known that there have been up to this time substantially three bills before the House and the Senate. The committee brought out a bill entirely different from that which was brought into the Senate from the House. Here we are to pass upon a bill that is entirely different from the one that has come out of the committee. Who knows, then, what is proper legislation upon this great question, one that is of vital interest to this country, because it concerns every detail of its business throughout its broad expanse? Who knows what power they have given this commission that is to pass upon the business of every individual, partnership, association, and corporation? They have been given arbitrary power and plenary power to do, it seems to me, just as their consciences dictate. They must pass upon what is unfair competition. They must construe it, and to what extent they will disturb the business conditions of the country nobody at this time can opine. They are entering upon a new field, when, if there is any statute necessary to go upon the books, we have a well-devised system to which they could appeal. Some members of the commission no doubt will be laymen; and their construction of what is unfair competition is to be taken instead of that of the courts of this country.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said some days ago that this commission would not be omniscient, but in my judgment it will be omnipotent, and acting through its attorneys, its accountants, its experts, its examiners, its agents, and special agents and employees, it will be well-nigh omnipresent. They will search every nook and corner of this country in order to get after people who are presumably violating this law. They may be taken from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes of the north to the green-fringed borders of the Gulf of Mexico, hauled away from their business these long distances here to go before this commission, when if they had a statute on the book covering this matter they could be brought up in the courts at their homes.

This is a great power that Congress seeks to confer upon the commissioners who are created under the bill, and, in my judgment, it is an unwarranted power.

And, too, will not this law, handled by these commissioners, interfere with existing laws upon the statute books? That is a serious question for Congress in considering this measure to decide.

Our courts, Mr. President, like the gates of Janus, are always open to the oppressed of this country, and it is here that our courts, the best system of any country on the face of this earth, can daily remedy any injustice that has been done under a law that might be put upon the statute books.

I imagine, Mr. President, many of the Senators are consoling themselves that in the end they will reach the rainbow where there is a bag of gold. I am fearful that they are largely mistaken. It is a mirage that they see in the heavens that eludes them as they approach it

Mr. President, the power is given to this commission to go out into almost every business in every State of this Union to pass upon it, to see whether that business is being done correctly, lawfully, under this law.

In order that I may give a concrete case, here in the city is a partnership or individual engaged in the sale of chickens. Some person or corporation comes along and establishes a cold-storage business. It is well known that in the sale of such things they can not compete with cold storage in this business. Now, would this commission, for it is left entirely with them, decide that this cold storage could not come there if it undersells those who have been selling the poultry in the old way? That would be a question entirely for this commission, and it would be one in which they could bring the officers of this cold-storage business before them.

I gave the other day the matter of grain drills as an instance. Suppose some corporation not so powerful had engaged in that business, had had fair success, and had a large number of grain drills manufactured and on hand, which, becoming oppressed by their obligations, they must sell. Perhaps the corporation not so strong financially could sell those grain drills below cost and live. Yet, in my judgment, this commission has the power, the plenary power, to come in and hale the officers of this corporation before them and declare their business to be illegal, unfair competition.

There is another serious feature. It is known, Mr. President, that I am, as I have stated, very much opposed to commissions and bureaus under the Government, and that they should only be created in a case where there is an extreme necessity existing for them. It is known, as has been stated upon this floor, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, handling the railroads and other public-utility corporations of the great States of this Union, now costs the Government $3,500,000 per annum. Nobody knows to what extent this commission, with its multiplicity of agents and employees, would cost the Government. It has been variously estimated at from about $58,000,000 up into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

That is not the worst feature. This great debt that is to be heaped upon the Government annually would not be the worst feature, in my judgment. It would bring many an individual, firm, or corporation before it and, in my judgment, precipitate it into bankruptcy when it might otherwise go on and do a prosperous business. Nobody can anticipate the immense cost it would be to a concern to be haled from the utmost limits of the Union before this commission here in Washington, and if a firm or corporation had scant means, you can see the inevitable result.

Mr. President, this is a great Government, and I for one regret to see the step taken that is going to be taken to-day in passing this bill in the shape that it is. I think we but move back the hand upon the dial plate of progress.

Suppose the great men like Webster and Calhoun and Clay, accustomed to construing the Constitution, could see this measure laid before the people at this time, what would they think of such legislation?

It has been said that this commission would be governed by the rule of reason. Who knows but what they may be controlled in their decisions by the rule of unreason. Yet there is not an adequate remedy beyond them.

As I have stated, they have the right to search every nook and corner of this great country and practically ruin business where they have assailed it, and it may be that they have done it through others jealous of the prosperity of any particular business. They have the right to receive suggestions, search in the innermost corners, examine the books, send these pestiferous myrmidons into the innermost recesses of a man's business, and bring it up and lay it before this commission.

And yet, Mr. President, this is the great panacea they have offered for the ills that are prevailing in this country, when our courts of justice are standing open to every man who is injured by virtue of unfair competition, and there is a law existing already, a law without the enormous multiplication of offices, agents, accountants, and experts, and examiners, in order to ferret out these things.

There is another thing and a higher thing, in my judgment, and that is the interference with State rights. These great rights that the States have reserved unto themselves, that sacred heritage that has come down to us from our forbears, are being laid aside and these emissaries, these experts and examiners are permitted to go into a State and unearth whatever they may see fit to expose.

I do not, Mr. President, believe that the Senators here feel and see the full consequence of this legislation, to what extent it will interfere with State rights, because it has been held in some of the States—I believe in Colorado—that where a railroad intrastate carries a single item which goes beyond its bounds is subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

While I should like to see enacted some legislation looking to the betterment of the condition of this country so as to relieve the people who have been suffering from unjust, unfair competition, I am fearful that this bill—and that is practically the threat that has been before this body—is too ill-digested for it to become a law and to be placed upon the statute books.

For myself, if this bill comes to a final vote in the shape that it seems it is going to pass, I must cast my vote against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to speak upon the bill at this time——

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to speak?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to read the unanimous-consent agreement and ascertain what it provides. I was not here when it was entered into. It appears that at not later than 2 o'clock the Senate will proceed to vote upon amendments. After that time, I assume, only 10-minute speeches will be in order.

Mr. SMOOT. If no Senator desired to speak at this time, I was going to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII until 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had intended, Mr. President, to make some brief observations on the bill, but it has been discussed so fully and there is such a variety of opinions now before the Senate that I have concluded to spare the Senate the necessity of listening to me. I will simply say, Mr. President, that the old conundrum, "when doctors disagree who shall decide," was once wisely solved by a man who said that while the doctors were disagreeing the patient either died or got well; and, as a layman, I might well ask, when lawyers disagree, as they have disagreed in regard to this bill, how can a man not versed in law come to a wise conclusion, except to follow his conscience as he interprets the matter for himself without reference to the legal questions involved?

I have listened very attentively to the debate; I have heard the term "unfair competition" discussed—I have heard it said that it was easy of interpretation, and have heard it said that it was impossible of interpretation except by the Supreme Court of the United States, even if the Supreme Court could accomplish that task; and my mind is so disturbed over the legal propositions involved in this matter that I shall not undertake to reach a conclusion from that point of view.

But, Mr. President, from the other point of view, the view that takes into consideration the rights and the needs of the business men of this country as they exist to-day under the intense rivalry that is going on and under the conditions of business that now exist, I have made up my mind that it is my duty to vote against the bill upon its final passage. In doing this, I am fully satisfied that the laws now on the statute books, if faithfully enforced, are fully adequate to regulate and control all the business of the country that needs regulation and control, and to go beyond that by legislation is simply to subject the business of the country to unnecessary espionage and annoyance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is not my intention at this point to take any considerable time of the Senate. I agree with what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said, that the bill has been debated in all its phases exhaustively; and I think properly so. I do not consider the time devoted to it to have been wasted, and I think that even Senators who early after the committee had reported the bill thought that it ought to be acted upon almost immediately will now admit that the questions involved in the bill not only justified but demanded the somewhat extended consideration which has been given to them.

I desire to say that I think the debate that has proceeded upon the floor of the Senate has been worthy of the great subject involved. I have been told by gentlemen whose opinion I respect, who are not members of this body, that they considered that the debate upon the legal questions and the governmental policies involved in this bill which has taken place upon this floor to be worthy of the best traditions of the Senate. While I am not in the business of throwing any bouquets at the Senate or at myself, it did gratify me to hear from professional men that they thought the debate upon this measure was worthy of the cause.

Mr. President, I am informed that on the 3d of August of this year, day before yesterday, the telegram which I now send to the desk was sent to the two New York Senators and to the chairman of the committee which reported this bill [Mr. NEWLANDS] from the Merchants' Association of New York, a distinguished body of men representing the largest commercial and mercantile concerns in the United States. There are 3,300 members of this association. I will ask the Secretary to read their telegram, not having seen it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The telegram will be read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The industry and commerce of this country, already disturbed by the necessity of readjustment to new conditions created by tariff and currency legislation, is suddenly confronted by the paralyzing effects arising from the possible, if not probable, suspension for an indefinite period of foreign commerce and of international trade and financial relationships. Under such circumstances additional readjustment to comply with the terms of pending antitrust legislation, irrespective of the merits of the pending bills, would constitute a burden which our industry and commerce may be unable to bear and would be likely to precipitate a crisis so serious as to constitute a national calamity.

The Merchants' Association of New York therefore respectfully urges that further consideration of and action upon any of the antitrust bills now pending be immediately postponed until a later session of Congress.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
W. A. MARBLE, President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that no consideration whatever will be given by the Senators who are going to vote for this bill to the opinion of these 3,300 business men, representing the largest business interests in the country. Senators who are going to vote for the bill think that they are better judges of what the business situation requires than are those thousands of men engaged in business. With that I have no quarrel. Each Senator must make up his own mind whose judgment to follow, if he is not going to follow his own, and make up his own mind whether his judgment accords with the President of the United States, as representing the business interests of the country, or with the business interests of the country themselves.

The strongest argument made in behalf of the passage of this bill is that it will remove uncertainty from the minds of business men. The President has a way of stating that. He says an interrogation point confronts the eyes of the business men at the present time, and that the passage of this bill and of the other bills which he is urging will remove that interrogation point. Mr. President, that is the merest assertion, and an erroneous one, in my opinion. Of course, the President is perfectly entitled to his opinion. With me it counts no more than the opinion of any other gentleman and scholar and not so much as the opinion of men who, in my opinion, are better qualified to judge of the situation than is the President of the United States.

The President of the United States is a scholar, a very distinguished gentleman. His life has been spent in writing histories and in taking books off shelves and opening them and reading them and comparing them with other books. He has never had a day's experience in his life in any sort of business which he is now apparently intimately cognizant of and of the needs of which he thinks he is a better spokesman than the business men themselves.

Mr. President, if there is an interrogation point in front of the eyes of the business men now, there will be hundreds of interrogation points in front of their confused vision after these bills have passed. There never was a more confusing subject put up to a business man or to the judges who are to decide the question than the interpretation of the vague, ambiguous words "unfair competition." Anybody who can claim that the mere declaration by Congress that "unfair competition is unlawful," conveys any definite meaning to the mind of anybody to be affected is—well, his state of mind, in my view, is so confused that he is not a safe guide to follow.

Mr. WEST. And, Mr. President, that term may be construed by laymen.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Georgia has seen how we lawyers differ as to its construction, and he knows as a business man and a lawyer, if I mistake not——

Mr. WEST. I used to be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As to the difficulty the business community may have in trying to interpret it. Anybody can guess as to how the five members of the commission to be created may interpret it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] discussed a point that I intended to touch upon had I taken any time, and that was as to the army of officials who are to traverse the country from one end to the other.

As I understand the matter, a business man in Georgia or, for that matter a business man in the State of Washington, represented by the Senator into whose face I am now looking [Mr. JONES], 3,000 miles away from the Capital, or nearly that, may be visited by one of these so-called inspectors. He demands to see the books; I suppose he gets the combination of the safe; possibly, he tells the proprietor that he can take a little vacation while he looks over his establishment; he reports to the trade commission that there is something wrong with the business of that man, and I suppose that man is notified by the commission to appear in Washington, is he not, to defend himself? I will ask the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. He comes to Washington at his own expense; he is investigated, and if the trade commission finds that the inspector or agent or clerk, or whatever he is, was superserviceable and found something that did not exist—and such agents are very apt to do that: that is the function of the underlings in the departments; they do not get promotion unless they find something somewhere—if he finds that he was mistaken and that there is nothing against this man, as a matter of fact, still the man is under the humiliation of being suspected, of being charged with wrongdoing, of having to come to Washington; his neighbors and his competitors know that fact and even——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me just one more word, and, even though he is cleared of the suspicion or the accusation, as I understand, the Attorney General can call him to account later on for the same alleged offense. Am I right in that, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In my judgment, that is correct, provided the offense, in the opinion of the department, constitutes a restraint of trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. The Senator from Georgia—and I listened to him carefully on that point, and it was a point which I had intended myself to discuss—correctly states that this bill establishes a system of espionage over the business interests of this country such as no other country in all the world has ever undertaken to exercise. I do not think anything like it exists in Russia, and I do not think anything like it exists in any other civilized or uncivilized nation. I can not help feeling that this is unwise legislation.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I started to say, if the Senator from Connecticut will permit me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. WEST. That the individual who is brought here from the State of Washington at his own expense may be in the direst need of every dollar he can command in his business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true, Mr. President. Of course, it is one thing for Members of Congress who may not be men of large business affairs and perhaps for many of us lawyers to sit down and to put words upon paper upon this subject, having a theory in our minds as to how the provisions which we may draft will work. It is quite a different thing when the whole system gets into action and it becomes a practice rather than a theory. Of course, those who bring forward a measure which they think is going to improve conditions always become overenthusiastic as to the beneficial effect to be produced. That is human nature; that is inevitable.

Mr. President, to illustrate, the same rosy predictions were made by our friends when they undertook to revise the tariff. I do not refer to that now in a spirit at all of political controversy and most certainly not in a spirit of boasting, but in a spirit of regret more than anything else. We remember the rosy and enthusiastic prophecies that were made by Members of the majority who passed the last tariff law; we remember the hosannas, the pæans of victory, and the congratulations to the country that issued from the portals of the White House; we remember the gorgeous—I will not say pompous, but perhaps regal—phrases in which those exultations were couched. Apparently the result anticipated did not arrive on schedule time, whereupon the same prophecies and the same procedure were indulged in with reference to the legislation providing for the creation of the Federal Reserve Board. The same or similar results having obtained, now some other fillip, accompanied by the usual optimistic and joyous acclamations, is to accomplish the purpose which the other two measures did not accomplish. So I say it is natural that the people who propose this particular legislation at this time in their desire to see it enacted, in their autointoxication of enthusiasm, are altogether too optimistic as to the results which will be obtained by it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Connecticut overlooks one fact when he is imputing this legislation to the Executive Office. I have been quite as insistent as I think any other Senator has been in endeavoring to keep separate and independent the several functions of the respective branches of the Government, but for three or four years there have been pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee bills, introduced in part by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber and in part by Senators upon this side of the Chamber, which embodied all the principles of the pending legislation and which in their details were strikingly similar to it.

I had it in my mind some time before the debate closed to call the attention of the Senate to the bills which have been introduced by Senators upon this side of the Chamber touching the general subject. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and the Senator—well, I can not now recall more, but I have a list of them which shows that the greater number of these bills have emanated from the Republican side of the Chamber. I hope that the Senator from Connecticut will not believe that in favoring some part of this legislation his associates upon this side of the Chamber have been coerced into their position through the interference of any other department of the Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I did not mean to say that, and I do not think I did say that. What I intended to say was that I thought the proponents of this legislation were indulging in too hopeful a view of the beneficial results that would probably ensue from it, and I instanced the rosy prophecies that to my mind have been woefully lacking in fulfillment with relation to the beneficial results that were to flow from the Democratic tariff revision and from the enactment of the bill providing for the Federal Reserve Board.

I know perfectly well, of course, that there are various Republicans who have in years past and up to the present time been, and now are, in favor of a Federal trade commission, differing among themselves as to the exact powers that it should have. Of course I class those Republicans with the Democratic promoters of this bill as among those who, I think, are overenthusiastic about the beneficial results that will flow from the enactment of the bill.

What I do say is that were it not for the firm insistence, an insistence amounting to domination, of the gentleman who now is in the White House, the President of the United States, Congress would not now be considering this bill or any other bill; Congress would be home; and the country would be more at peace than it is at present.

The business of the country and the business men who are doing their best to hang on and escape from failure and disaster are not demanding this legislation. With the institutions of the old world crashing in anarchy and chaos, with our own exchanges closed all over the United States, with Congress issuing a half billion dollars' worth of emergency currency and passing bills every day taking millions of dollars out of the Treasury to provide relief funds to get our citizens back—I say that under these circumstances there is no demand whatever in this country for this Congress, which has now been in session consecutively and continuously for nearly 20 months, to sit here debating over the establishment of a Federal trade commission to boss private business and individuals all over this country and to employ a horde of inspectors and field examiners and informers to spy upon the business of this country. I say that it is inconceivable to me that a sane mind, in view of the questions that have been raised here on this floor, which are not to be waved aside or treated with disdain, because they have troubled the most eminent lawyers of this body, men who have sat upon the highest courts in their respective States, can conceive that this legislation is certain or that it removes any uncertainty that now exists. It is perfectly evident to everybody that it creates uncertainty; that it stirs up and invites the very troubles it hypocritically and falsely advertises to relieve.

There is not a word in the whole trade-commission bill that is a help to business of any kind. It is said, "Oh, business needs help." Why, there is nothing in this bill to help it in any way. Whose business is going to be helped by turning a horde of Government inspectors upon it in times like these?

As I have said before, the men who are quoted as favoring this bill either do not understand it or are grossly deceived about it. I have just put into the RECORD a telegram from the Merchants' Association of New York, a body of 3,300 of the most eminent merchants in this country, saying the mere discussion of the bill and the proposition to pass it, and the other bills also, is a blight upon the industry of the country and an additional source of anxiety. Who will pretend but that for the arbitrary insistence of the President of the United States, who declines to let his party adjourn Congress until they have passed laws which he says should be passed, Congress would have adjourned before now?

They talk about his legislative program. Well, I am sorry I ever lived to hear such words on the floor of the Senate of the United States. Congress should have its legislative program; the President is entitled to his Executive program, but, in my opinion, should confine his attention to that.

It is perfectly proper for him in his message, as he did six months ago, to suggest legislation to which he desired to direct the attention of Congress and to advise Congress to pass it, but for him to take the position practically that he will regard it as a betrayal of him or of the Democratic Party if the great Congress of the United States presumes to adjourn without passing such laws as he demands they shall pass as the price of his consent that they shall adjourn, he exceeds his jurisdiction; he goes too far. Such conditions are not healthy in a free, democratic Republic; and it is by submitting to such dictation as this that Congress is losing the confidence of the country, and the power is gradually being concentrated in the hands of the Executive at Washington.

I ask permission to insert in my remarks the three articles which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PERSONAL GOVERNMENT.

To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING POST.

SIR: May I say a word in your columns about the new theory of government embodied in the so-called Stevens amendment to the trade commission bill? Its epochal character has not, I believe, received the attention it deserves. It presents, in substance, Mr. Perkins's plan for a business court. Its governing principle was first urged by Mr. Roosevelt, when, as President, he asked, in effect, for a law broad enough and elastic enough to enable the Executive to pick the sheep from the goats in its enforcement. That is the principle of the Stevens amendment, which prohibits unfair competition without defining it, and empowers the commission to prohibit any act which it finds to be unlawful. It requires the court to enforce the order of the commission. Concededly, the court will not enforce an order that is arbitrary or unwarranted. That is not the point. The point is that there is no law except the Executive mandate. The statute—the so-called law—is merely a club to be wielded at will among those who come within the broad domain of "unfair competition." There is, in effect, no crime except the failure to obey an order, if, when, and as received. It is personal government, pure and simple, subject only to review by the courts where the order is not within the broad power conferred on the commission. It is opposed to the cardinal precepts of a democracy, which, in the words of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, is "a government of laws, and not of men." It means Executive control of private business, which the United States Supreme Court, speaking by Justice Matthews, in the Yick Wo case, characterized as "intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself."

It is natural that this proposal should appeal to some business men as a less painful alternative to a statutory code of business ethics. That, also, is not the point. It is better to suffer for a while from foolish laws, incapable of enforcement, than to change our principles of government and surrender our business freedom to the control of a Federal bureau. We know the possibilities of favoritism and worse under such a system. But that, again, is not the point. The point, I repeat, is business freedom, and it affects not only the welfare of to-day but the future of American civilization. Let me add, that I see no harm in a Federal commission, charged with the highly important duty of investigating actual violations of the law, and directing its enforcement by the Attorney General and several district attorneys.

It may be said that the enforcement of every law, as a practical matter, involves discretion, and that this discretion is notoriously abused, so that an express statute, putting the law entirely in the control of a commission, merely recognizes an existing practice. I would say in reply that this change makes an institution out of an abuse in our present system, and that the essence of this institution is to vest in the Executive the right to prohibit anything that comes within a broadly defined field of legislation. Its logical development must be a general prohibition of everything wrong, with power in the Executive to issue an order of prohibition whenever he finds a particular act to be wrong, the courts to punish any disobedience of the Executive order. The legislature might just as well go out of existence, leaving the courts in power both to enforce obedience to the Executive will, and to keep the Executive within the constitutional restrictions still remaining of the protection of the individual. How long these restrictions would remain under such conditions, I leave to the good judgment of the reader.

With due respect to President Wilson, the fact is that, distrusting, and, in a measure, controlling Congress and yielding to outside influences he should reject, he is seeking to compel Congress to surrender its legislative powers over interstate commerce to his nominees. That is the substance of the situation in Washington.

ROBERT R. REED.

NEW YORK, July 13.

THINKS NATION NEEDS LESS "PSYCHOLOGY"—REED TELLS BANK SUPERVISORS FEWER NEW LAWS WILL AID PROSPERITY—SEES DEMOCRACY IN PERIL—BELIEVES BLOWS TO INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY BY ACTS ENDANGER FREEDOM.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., July 7.

"We are, I hope, about to emerge from a psychological depression. Our successful emergence is dependent on many things, not the least of which is a decrease in psychological legislation; that is, legislation for popular effect, as opposed to legislation directed to a real public good. The enterprises of the country, of your several States, are waiting, and the investment banker is waiting."

This hope was expressed to-day by Robert R. Reed, general counsel to the Investment Bankers' Association of America, in an address before the National Association of Supervisors of State Banks at its convention in the Marlborough-Blenheim Hotel. His subject was "Regulation of the business of the investment banker in the issuance and sale of securities."

"The securities which the investment banker wishes to distribute to the investors of the States," Mr. Reed said, "are the securities sold by the public utilities and industries of the States. Both the enterprises and the investors look to him to purchase competitively at wholesale and sell competitively at retail, to reach the best market with each security, to get the needed capital for industry on the best possible terms. That he can do and will do if the freedom of interstate business is maintained. He can not hope to do it adequately if that freedom is seriously impaired."

SEES DISASTER IN MANY LAWS.

He said that the original purpose of "blue-sky" legislation had been to reach the "get-rich-quick" concern, and expressed the view that legislation confined to such concerns was practical and constitutional. Many of the laws adopted apply to dealers in high-grade investment securities, he continued, and subject the whole business to executive control, which he declared was unconstitutional and disastrous on industry and investment.

"A relatively few constructive and democratic reforms intelligently applied," he said, "would do the work intended by the mass of unintelligent, largely unconstitutional statutes from which the whole country is suffering. I wish to emphasize the vice of extending Executive control by the Executive or by commissions over the essentially private transactions and callings of the individual. There are limits beyond which the legislature may not go, either constitutionally or safely, in interfering with the freedom of the individual."

Mr. Reed said he believed the proper administrative activities of Government can be better carried on by trained bodies divorced so far as possible from political influence and holding office for a considerable term of years

"The real issue to-day is not government by commission," he said. "It is the preservation of the efficiency of such government on the one hand by confining it to the great objects of administrative action and the preservation of democracy on the other hand against the unwarranted encroachment of Executive control over the individual.

ENDS DEMOCRACY, HE SAYS.

"Democracy consists in the essential liberty of the individual. The privilege of running a railroad or a bank or of being a corporation is not a part of this liberty. It is accepted and exercised subject to administrative control.

"But the right to buy and sell lawful property, to lend and borrow, is a part of individual liberty. This liberty may be subjected to general laws to prevent abuses. It may not, however, be prohibited, and it may not be subjected to the will or discretion or control of the Executive. It ends, and democracy ends, where personal government begins.

"The American people believe in democracy and in their constitutional safeguards," he added. "They do not, and never will, believe in paternalism as a political principle. Such a change, if it comes, will come gradually, and in a sense unconsciously, as we progress or retrogress in the effort of our legislatures to solve each difficulty by the classic dictum, 'Let George do it.' Just now the fashion is, 'Let Woodrow' or 'Let Teddy do it.'

"We can not legislate human perfection under a democracy, nor can any monarch on earth create it by word of mouth. We can and we should, however, correct the great evils that have for many years enjoyed immunity from successful attack."

WANTS NO "PRIVATE BANKS."

"Private banks have outlived their usefulness," said E. H. Doyle, Banking Commissioner of Michigan, in an address to-day. He urged that private banks be abolished.

A resolution to that effect will be presented at to-morrow's sessions. Many of the bank supervisors indorsed the proposition.

"Public interest in private banks is becoming more tense from year to year," said Mr. Doyle "It is emphasized with each recurring failure.

"In private banks, as the word implies, everything is 'private.' In many such banks only one man knows where and how funds are invested. Why should they not be subjected to the same restrictions and limitations as incorporated banks or abolished? No one will deny that the days of the private bank are numbered.

"I am in favor of supervision of private banks only when it is so far-reaching as that required of State and national banks. It would drive the private banker, skidding along the edge of bankruptcy and concealing his assets, out of business, where he belongs. It would eliminate loan-shark methods, and strengthen the confidence of the public in banks."

The election of officers will take place to-morrow.

REED BURLESQUES TRADE COMMISSION—SUGGESTS BOARD TO PREVENT ALL "UNFAIR" PRACTICES, IN BUSINESS OR OTHERWISE—PERKINS A LIFE MEMBER—TO ABOLISH CONGRESS, AND THE COURTS RETAINED ONLY TO ENFORCE MANDATES OF BRANDEIS, UNTERMYER ET AL.

Robert R. Reed, whose antitrust ideas are embodied in the John Sharp Williams bill, after riddling the latest proposal at Washington for a trade commission, with discretionary powers over business and authority to decide what is "fair" or "unfair," suggested yesterday a substitute which, in his judgment, would carry the theory to its logical conclusion. This is Mr. Reed's substitute:

"A commission is hereby created and established to be known as the Commission on the General Welfare and Social Justice of the United States, composed of five members, including the President, to serve during his term of office; L. D. Brandeis and Samuel Untermyer, to serve until, in the opinion of the other members of the commission, they shall act unfairly, and George W. Perkins and Thomas W. Lawson, to serve for life.

"Every act and thing that is unfair, oppressive, unjust or inequitable, or opposed to the social welfare and justice of the United States, is hereby prohibited. Whenever the commission or any of its members shall have reason to believe that any person, firm, association, or corporation is about to do any act or thing prohibited as aforesaid, the commission or such member shall issue an order prohibiting such act or thing, provided that if one member of such commission shall issue such order without the prior authority of the commission, an appeal shall lie from such order to the commission to be heard at its convenience, but in the meanwhile such order shall be obeyed.

"If any such person, firm, corporation, or association shall disobey such order, or declare their intention so to do, then the commission or such member may apply to the district court, which shall immediately proceed to a determination of the matter, and if it shall appear that such person, firm, corporation, or association has disobeyed such order, or declared an intention so to do, then the court shall impose such sentence as such commission or such member thereof shall deem fair and just.

"All laws heretofore enacted are repealed. The Congress of the United States is adjourned sine die, pending an amendment of the Constitution to abolish it. The courts of the United States are hereby continued, provided that their jurisdictions shall be limited to enforcing the orders of said commission."

"The wisdom of continuing the power of the courts under this proposed law might well be questioned," said Mr. Reed. "Some unfair-minded citizen might obtain from an unregenerate court a decision holding it unconstitutional.

"Decisions such as this naturally tend to postpone the day of executive paternalism. They hold in check what is thought to be the popular desire to take care of Mr. Perkins's children by saving the 'good trusts' from active and pernicious competition. This, I take it, is the idealized aim of executive paternalism to protect and prosper the subservient friend who seems 'good,' to destroy the critical foe who seems 'bad,' to build upon the ruins of democracy an industrial oligarchy of 'Rooseveltian Perkinses.'"

Speaking more seriously of the pending measure, Mr. Reed said:

"The latest antitrust amendment, reported to have met the 'approval and enthusiastic support' of the President, and now adopted by the Senate committee, is epochal in character. It would establish an absolutely personal government over interstate corporations. It would also open the back door of the Sherman law for the 'good trust' to come in. This amendment provides in terms that:

"'Unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful,' and that 'whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair or oppressive method of competition' it shall order a hearing, 'and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act, it shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same.' This order is to be enforced by the courts upon the application of the commission.

"It is to be noted, briefly: First, that while all unfair competition is declared unlawful, it is only those things which the commission finds are prohibited which are in fact to be prevented.

"Second. That no rule is prescribed by which this finding is to be governed; and "Third. That the law and its application are in the hands of the commission, and the only real crime is disobedience of the mandate in the particular case.

"Could anything be more simple and effective? But why limit its operation to so narrow a scope? There are many 'unfair things' in life besides competition. Certainly nothing would seem to be more immediately desirable to a great number of our citizens than a prohibition against the unfair treatment of employees by interstate corporations. But a good thing can not be too good. The substitute I have suggested will do away not only with all the handicaps of a constitutional democracy, but with the democracy itself.

"Incidentally, unfair competition as an aid to monopoly is within the present law, and there is hardly a large combination in the country that dares to practice it so long as that law is enforced. The only unfair competition that is not within the present law is that of the so-called independent concerns, to whom the freedom of business bargaining is perhaps the chief weapon left in their struggle for existence against the trusts.

"The taskmasters of the 'new freedom' are driving a Democratic Congress to the destruction not of monopoly but of democracy."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement that at this hour—

The Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 15613, an act to create an interstate trade commission, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that the vote upon the passage of the bill as amended shall be taken at not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the said day—

The Chair announces that the bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for only a few moments in a general discussion with reference to this measure.

I think we all realize that under the Sherman antitrust law, designed, as it was, primarily to reach combinations, conspiracies, and agreements, those acts which amount to unfair competition but which are dissociated from efforts involving the plan of conspiracy would not be reached by the Sherman antitrust law. I rather agree with the Senator from Nevada that we have reached a point in the development of our industrial and commercial life where probably we shall see less of this process of combination; and the phase of industrial activity to be met now, in a spirit of regulation and restraint, is the practices which constitute unfair competition.

Personally I believe it would have been very much wiser for Congress to have passed a short, brief law, adding unfair competition to the prohibitions already found in connection with the Sherman antitrust law, and to have left the enforcement of that law to the Department of Justice; but it has seemed impossible to secure that addition unless the additional prohibition is coupled with a trade commission. Therefore, while I am not particularly enthusiastic over the plan of a trade commission, rather than not have this added law relating to unfair competition I am willing to support the trade commission as the means of securing that additional prohibition in the laws of this country.

My fear of the trade commission is not that expressed by the Senator from Connecticut. In the first place, this bill, I think, does not create the authorities and powers which he has described. Outside of the creation of a trade commission and the authorization of the employment of that commission by the court as a master in chancery, I undertake to say that there is not a power of inquisition or investigation vested in the trade commission that is not already vested in some of the officials of this Government under existing statutes.

I believe that fact should go forth to the country, in order that this bill may not occasion the alarm and distrust which it might occasion if the view taken of it by the Senator from Connecticut were to be accepted by the public as accurately describing the scope and authority of this commission. My fear is that in departing from the plan of defining an act as unlawful and leaving it to be prosecuted by the Attorney General—and in dividing power and authority we divide responsibility—there will not be that clearly defined thought in the public mind as to who is responsible for failure in the administration of the law that would have existed if the enforcement of the law had been left entirely in the Department of Justice.

Mr. President, that fear may be groundless. Let us hope that the best will come as the fruitage of this legislation. While I am not so optimistic upon the subject as the Senator in charge of the bill or some of his associates upon the Interstate Commerce Committee, I at least share with them the hope that this bill may prove a success; and knowing now that the bill is destined to pass, I for one propose to give it in my advocacy here and in my discussion of the measure in public that support calculated to carry confidence to the people with regard to it and calculated to give force and efficacy to the bill itself, rather than to throw around it that element of distrust and uncertainty which on the one hand may produce a want of confidence upon the part of the people and upon the other a want of confidence in the commission itself.

Realizing that this bill is destined to pass, not for the purpose of bestowing any eulogies upon anyone, but rather as dealing with the philosophy of this bill in its relations to the development of government, I can not forbear saying a word of congratulation and commendation of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

It has been suggested that this subject is new and novel. The thought of a trade commission is neither new nor novel, although the power which this bill seeks to vest in the commission is, I think, to most people a somewhat new, unstudied, and unthought-of proposition. The Senator from Nevada for years, however, has been an ardent champion of this measure and of the scope and purpose of the pending bill, including section 5.

During the time that it was my privilege to preside over that committee as chairman the Senator from Nevada was constantly advocating and putting forward this thought of this kind of a commission. The Senator from Nevada during the years of his service in both Houses has been in the very vanguard of the thought of developing the functions of government, developing a union and unity of purpose between State and Federal Government; developing not only the scope and authority, but developing the method, the plan, the thought of cooperation along governmental lines. He has projected plans embracing broad, fundamental policies, in the advocacy of which he has recognized no petty party lines; and while he has ever regarded the constitutional guaranties, he has taken the broad ground that the function of free government is to advance the common welfare and that the Constitution should be viewed from the standpoint of a guide, rather than as a mere limitation upon that function.

It is seldom that one who has in the main been so far in advance of the great mass of thought of his own day has lived to see so many of his advanced thoughts, purposes, and policies either actually crystallized into legislation or being rapidly accepted by Congress in relation to legislation more or less correlated to the distinct purposes and aims of the Senator's advocacy. It is important and interesting, not so much as a tribute to the Senator from Nevada as to the growth and development of the spirit of the American people in using government as one of the adjuncts, one of the instrumentalities, in the development of the prosperity and welfare of the people. I certainly feel that the Senator from Nevada is to be congratulated upon the near approach of the consummation of his thought and purpose in the adoption of the Federal trade commission bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment of a formal character, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, after line 2, at the end of section 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

Each corporation having a capital of $5,000,000, to determine which fact the amount of its capital stock, surplus, bonded indebtedness, and undivided profits shall be combined, subject to the provisions of this act, shall, within 90 days after the taking effect of this act, designate in writing an agent in the city of Washington, D. C., upon whom service of all notices, orders, and processes issued by the commission may be made for and on behalf of said corporation, and to file such designation in the office of the commission, which designation may from time to time be changed by like writing similarly filed; and thereupon service of all notices, orders, or processes issued by the commission may be made upon such corporation by leaving a copy thereof with such designated agent at his or its office in the city of Washington with like effect as if made personally upon such corporation, and in default of such designation of such agent service of any notice, order, or other process may be made by posting such notice, order, or process in a conspicuous place in the office of the commission.

All notices, orders, or other process to be served upon individuals or other corporations than those having such capital shall be duly served personally on such individuals and upon the president, chief executive officer, or a director of such other corporations, respectively, unless they shall have designated an agent as aforesaid with power and authority to accept service of such notices, orders, or other process.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the object of the amendment is to provide how the notices, orders, and processes of this commission shall be served. In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission the railroads are universally, I believe, represented by an agent on whom process may be served. In order to avoid unnecessary expense in the case of the smaller corporations or individuals who may be brought under the jurisdiction of the commission, provision is made here for requiring only the large-sized corporations to designate such agents, although the smaller corporations and any individual have the privilege of doing so if they desire.

I do not know that any further explanation is necessary.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I notice that the Senator applies his amendment only to corporations. Why not say "individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations"?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Georgia has overlooked the final provision of the amendment.

Mr. WEST. That may be so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That provision states how notice shall be served upon individuals and the smaller corporations, and gives them the right, if they so desire, to designate an agent themselves. I think the Senator will find that all cases are covered.

The wording of the amendment might possibly be improved. The reason for introducing it at this time is that it was left out of the original bill; but if there can be any such improvement made, undoubtedly a conference committee will be enabled, by having this matter in conference, to make such improvement. I am not wedded to any particular form of phrase, but I think this is decidedly necessary; and I may say that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee are in accord with me in offering this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to reserve the right to offer in the Senate the amendment to section 5 which was offered yesterday and defeated by two votes, and I desire to reserve the right, if the amendment as offered is defeated, to offer the amendment in a modified form.

I will say now to the Senate that I do this, not for the purpose of adhering with undue pertinacity to the undertaking in which I have been so much interested, but because I believe that upon maturer consideration in the Senate the result may be different.

I simply make this reservation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill by striking out subdivision (c) of section 3, which reads:

To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations subject to the provisions of this act as the commission may designate, and to fix the time for the filing of such reports, and to require such reports, or any special report, to be made under oath, or otherwise in the discretion of the commission.

I have hitherto taken occasion to call attention to the fact that subdivision (b) of this section is amply sufficient to subserve the purposes for which both subdivision (b) and subdivision (c) are designed. I do not believe the purposes to be accomplished by the provisions of subsection (c) are sufficiently important, in view of the existence of the other subsection, to justify the enormous expense that must be entailed upon corporations required to comply with the provisions of subsection (c) when they are enforced, as they doubtless will be, by the commission.

Every corporation in the United States, I think, is required under the laws of its creation to file annual reports of more or less definiteness and detail. Now, if in addition to that all these corporations are required to file separate annual reports with this commission, and the commission also is able to require definite, special instances of information from time to time concerning their organization, business, financial condition, and so forth, the burden of expense that may be entailed, and probably will be, in the administration of the bill, upon the corporate interests of the country, will be very large indeed.

I therefore move to strike out that provision.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, what is the motion of the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. To strike out subdivision (c) of section 3.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment, or the section proposed to be stricken out, may be read.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator that I have just read it. I will read it again, or the Secretary can read it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the Secretary read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the matter proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 the Senator from Colorado proposes to strike out lines 24 and 25, and on page 18, lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, in the following words:

(c) To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations subject to the provisions of this act as the commission may designate, and to fix the time for the filing of such reports, and to require such reports, or any special report, to be made under oath, or otherwise in the discretion of the commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think this is a necessary power in order to enable the commission to exercise with knowledge the powers conferred upon it by this bill. It will be observed that there is nothing in the bill itself which absolutely compels any corporation or class of corporations to make uniform reports. All that is done by this subdivision is to give the commission the power to prescribe as nearly as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations as the commission may designate. It can designate 1 corporation if it chooses; it can designate 50 corporations if it chooses; it can designate a class of corporations. There is nothing that compels the commission in any way to call upon all corporations or any corporation for either special or annual reports; and no corporation in the land is under obligation to make reports until the commission specially calls for them.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not that true of subsection (b)? Can not the commission which is to be created by this bill utilize the same power and make these specific designations under section (b)?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not understand that section (b) covers all that is covered by section (c).

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I should like to inquire what the office of subsection (b) is?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The office of subsection (b) is to get from time to time information, statements, and records concerning the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, and so forth, of all corporations subject to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator believe that under the provisions of subsection (b) an order could be made by the commission covering a certan class of corporations, a number of corporations, as well as a single corporation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not sure about that. At all events, we made it certain, and if it is unobjectionable there is no reason why we should not make it perfectly certain.

I do not propose to take up time with the discussion of subdivision (c). I will simply say that it was fully considered by the committee, it was put in this form after serious consideration and reflection, and I hope it will remain in the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether the enactment of subsection (c) will result in dumping upon the commission thousands of annual reports for which there is no real use?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think not. I do not think the commission will prescribe rules that will dump upon it a lot of useless reports. It is not compelled to do anything under this provision. It simply has discretionary power. I assume that the men who are fitted for these positions will exercise their power in such a way as to get useful information, and not useless information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The commission has the power to require all corporations under investigation to make reports of any sort, annual or occasional. Why should it require the tens of thousands of other corporations to make annual reports that never will be read, that there is no occasion to make, and that will only be a harassment to the corporations compelled to make them?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The commission is not compelled to require it. As I explained, this is simply a power which the commission may exercise. It may confine its power, if it chooses, to requiring a report from but a single individual; for instance, a corporation that has been disorganized and reconstructed under the antitrust law. The commission might want annual reports for a certain period of time from such a corporation. It has the power to require them, but there is nothing in the bill compelling the commission to require them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] yesterday demonstrated, I think, that if these reports were published—and if they are not published the public will know nothing about them—and the report of each corporation as published occupied but a page of space, the result would be to produce about 130 volumes per annum containing over 1,300 pages each.

Mr. LIPPITT. One hundred and seventy-five volumes.

Mr. THOMAS. One hundred and seventy-five volumes. I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. LIPPITT. I may add, if the Senator will allow me to do so, that those volumes will occupy a bookshelf 32 feet long.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. Of course, we know that an annual report from a corporation of any consequence could not be confined to the small space of one page or of two pages. In my judgment, while this does not operate as a positive statute, while it merely gives power to the commission to require these reports, the probabilities are that they will be required eventually; and apart from the expence, and it seems to me the uselessness of it, notwithstanding the explanation made by the Senator from Nevada, I can not conceive why subsection (b) is not ample for every purpose.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to say just a word at that point, I should like to say that there are only two sources of acquiring information given to this commission. One is to make special investigations; the other is to require annual or special reports.

One of the real difficulties of this commission is that the subject matter with which it is going to deal is so stupendous that it will be impossible for it to handle the matter at all. It will have to have the authority to call for annual reports, because it is only by having some such reports made to it that the commission will have any means of arriving at the existence of violations of law, unless it relies upon the complaints of individuals.

The whole conception of the field of operations that this commission is going to cover, and of the methods that have been laid out for it to cover, as I have studied the proposition, seems absurd, simply because the field is too large, and it is impossible. The method is clumsy and there is only one result that can come from it, and that is favoritism, and the special examination and special prosecution of certain individuals, selected in some haphazard method, according to the will of the commission, or according to the complaint of some envious competitor.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to be inserted after the declaration that "unfair competition is hereby declared to be unlawful." I do not know where it appears in the new print.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 21, after the words "unfair competition," insert the following:

Unfair competition as used herein shall be construed to mean any unfair acts or practices in trade or commerce intended to stifle or destroy competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Section 5 has been adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and the amendment now proposed is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that unless the vote whereby the section was adopted is reconsidered it is not in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment as a separate section, to be numbered section 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after line 22, insert a new section to be known as section 6.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The words "unfair competition" as used herein shall be construed to mean any unfair acts or practices in trade or commerce intended to stifle or destroy competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, had the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which was defeated by only two votes yesterday, carried there would be no occasion of course for proposing this amendment. I would like to vote for a trades commission bill. I would like to vote for a trades commission bill the object of which would be to facilitate trade, insure honest competition, and insure a competition that would be beneficial to the public and not interfere with any competition that does not concern the public at large.

The bill as it stands declares that unfair competition shall be unlawful. The Senator from Nevada having the bill in charge admits that it is always a question not between the public and the competitor, but a question between two competitors as to whether or not the matter charged is unjust or unfair. I wish the Senator to give me, if he will, some good valid reason, if the contention on the part of those who object to any modification is correct, that according to the decisions of the courts that competition only would be interfered with which tends to destroy a competitor. If that is true, if it is to be confined to that, what earthly objection can there be to so declaring? If you are certain that that is the intent and purpose, why not make it certain in the bill itself?

As a matter of fact, I believe the Senator from Nevada will agree with me, that if one competitor in any field in the manufacture or sale of goods declares by an advertisement or otherwise that his goods are manufactured in the same way as his competitor's, that they are worth as much or more, and that he is selling them 15 or 20 or 25 per cent cheaper, that would give a cause of action to the person competed against, if his statements were false and untrue, even though the effect of that competition and that declaration was to compel his competitor to give the public a benefit of 25 per cent in the price of the articles that they are compelled to purchase. I mention this simply to indicate as clearly as I can that there are a great many practices which might be declared to be unfair as between the competitors, the result of which is beneficial to the public, and it only ceases to be beneficial to the public when the effect of the competition is such that it destroys one of the competitors and thereby creates a monopoly.

Why should the Senator object to the definition being made so certain that any business men, any attorney, anyone engaged in the manufacture of any article of commerce can know what acts are unlawful and what acts are not?

For my own part I want to see this confined to the simple question of preventing competition which destroys a competitor by unfair means.

Therefore, while, in the definition, I have not gone into the same detail that the Senator from Missouri has, I think I have covered it clearly by a shorter definition, which declares that any of these acts, which, of course, must be unfair in themselves, and I admit I do not know any better word to describe unfair in a general generic term than the word "unfair," nevertheless the unfair practices must reach toward some definite end, and that definite end must be the stifling or the destruction of competition.

We have our general law, the antitrust law, which declares specifically and positively that no agreement can be made fixing prices for the very purpose of opening wide the field of competition. Then you come right around with this bill, which, in effect, may check all kinds of competition by declaring that the competition must be a fair competition without reference to the effect upon the public.

Let me say to the Senator again, that while we are claiming here in our arguments that the commission will not interfere with any kind of business unless the effect of that business competition is to destroy a competitor, notwithstanding that claim you are compelled to admit, as every attorney here will admit, that any competitor can go before the court under the bill and bring his action, and he can bring his action whether this commission has decided that the case is unlawful or not, because when you declare that unfair competition is unlawful you thereby make it a legal wrong, and where you declare a thing to be a legal wrong there immediately comes into effect the legal remedies under the usual court processes, which may be by injunction or by action in tort for damages. So an injunction would lie in the case of the man who has been compelled to sell his products for 25 per cent less to the public to enjoin his competitor from making this unfair claim against him to the end that he may again raise the price of his product up to 25 per cent higher than the competitor had forced him to go.

In my opinion, Mr. President, there can be no possible question about this matter. Had the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] been adopted, that no right of action should accrue under this law until the committee had passed upon the question by an order, and the commission would keep within what is claimed to be the law, namely, that it must be a competition that will eventually destroy a competitor, then we need not have had any great fear, but as the bill now stands all forms of competition are subject to the revision of the court, and we are nullifying to a great extent the wonderful benefits that we have secured by preventing corporations from entering into trade agreements by making another law that they shall not be competitors if the competition is such that a court would call unfair, not unfair to the public, because the court will not have to consider the rights of the public at all. All the court will have to consider in an action is whether the competition is unfair between one competitor and another competitor, and if the court decides it is fair, that ends it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I ask the Secretary to read the following.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the paper.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the request be granted.

Mr. STONE. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think the question is debatable. I do not want any debate.

Mr. STONE. The point of order is——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order that it is not debatable. It is a matter of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable, but the Senator from Missouri rises to a point of order. The Chair does not know what the point of order is.

Mr. STONE. My point of order is that under the rules no Senator is permitted to make any statement in any form that assails the conduct of any other Senator or any body of Senators as this statement does. I think that this resolution ought not——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not a resolution. It is a request by a Senator, and is a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. STONE. This paper ought not even to be printed in the RECORD, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say so at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this is not a debatable question. I do not care to be dragged into a debate concerning it. I do not want to be dragged into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable question, but it is a question which must be determined by the Chair or by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. It is after 2 o'clock, and we are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a matter of personal privilege residing solely with the Senator desiring to be relieved from service on a committee, and neither the Senate nor the Chair has anything to do with it.

Mr. SMOOT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. The Senate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement, and there is no business in order until after the pending bill is disposed of under that unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the Senate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement, and, upon objection, nothing else can be entertained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before, Mr. President, you pronounce finally on that I should like to be heard upon the point of order. I think I have a right to do that.

It has been universally ruled in the House and I think it has been uniformly ruled in the Senate, that the service of a Senator or of a Representative upon a committee is a matter left with him. I remember that at the beginning of the Fifty-third Congress, when Speaker Crisp appointed Mr. Crane, of Texas, to certain committee assignments, he rose upon the floor and resigned from them all, and stated that he declined to serve. The point of order was then raised—some point; I have forgotten the point that was made—and the Speaker ruled that it was a matter left with the Representative entirely in foro conscientiæ. I can not further afford to serve upon the Foreign Relations Committee with its ideas and mine.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be a stultification of myself. It is a matter left with me and not with either the Senate nor any Senator. There is no rule by unanimous consent or otherwise that shuts off a question of personal privilege. There never has been in either House.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the Senator asking to be relieved from service upon any committee when the Senate is not acting under a unanimous-consent agreement, but the Senator can not point to a case where the Senate has been acting under a unanimous-consent agreement and any business has been allowed to intervene.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. That is the point I make with the Chair right now. There has never been any unanimous-consent agreement in either House that could possibly shut off a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, and unless there is an appeal from the ruling of the Chair the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, with all due respect to the Chair, of course, I appeal from the decision. I think the Chair is absolutely wrong.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. REED. I ask that it may be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after line 22, insert a new section, to be numbered section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. The words "unfair competition" as used herein shall be construed to mean any unfair acts or practices in trade or commerce intended to stifle or destroy competition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask to have the amendment again read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it again.

The Secretary again read Mr. McCUMBER's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL's name was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence on public business of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LIPPITT. I offer an amendment, which I should like to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section, as section 5a, as follows:

SEC. 5a. That if one or more parties to any agreement made or proposed to be entered into between two or more parties, one or more of whom is or are engaged in interstate commerce, or which agreement affects or is intended to affect interstate commerce, shall submit such agreement to the commission by filing with it a copy thereof, together with a duly verified statement in writing, in such form as the commission shall prescribe, giving the names, occupations, and addresses of all parties to such agreement, stating whether the same has or has not been executed, the reasons therefor, and the effect, if any, which such agreement is intended to have upon interstate commerce, and such further information as the commission, by its rules, shall require, the commission shall forthwith consider such agreement, and the effect of the same, and may require any further information, documentary or otherwise, with regard thereto which in its judgment shall seem necessary or proper; and if all requests of the commission for information shall be promptly and fully complied with, it shall, with all convenient speed, make and file a certificate, stating whether or not, in its opinion, such agreement does or would operate in undue restraint of interstate commerce, or tend to the monopolization of any part of such commerce.

No party in any such agreement who shall have submitted or joined in the submission thereof to the commission, during the time the same is under consideration by the commission, shall be prosecuted criminally because of such agreement, or any act done pursuant thereto, under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. If the commission shall be of the opinion, and shall so certify in writing, that any existing agreement or combination is being operated in the interest of the public, and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such operations will not substantially exclude, prevent, or reduce competition in the business affected thereby, then, so long as such certificate remains unrevoked or such agreement shall not have been declared unlawful or against the public interest by some court of competent jurisdiction, no party thereto shall be prosecuted criminally in any court of the United States because of such agreement or any act done pursuant thereto under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

Upon reasonable notice to the parties to such agreement, given in such manner as the commission by its rules may prescribe, and after such parties shall have been given an opportunity to be heard with respect thereto, the commission may revoke any certificate made as aforesaid: Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall operate to prevent or otherwise affect the prosecution of any civil suit or action against the parties to any such agreement by the United States or by any other party.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in some remarks I made on yesterday I undertook to show some theoretical reasons why I thought the great problem which confronts American business and commerce and trade was not being dealt with in a constructive manner by the pending bill and the other bills in regard to trade legislation which are coming before this body. This amendment is designed in some degree to give to people engaged in business in a small and moderate-sized way in the United States some of the benefits and advantages which a large number of people get by combining their resources in what is known as a combination or a trust.

I do not intend to argue the theoretical side of the proposition in the very few minutes that I have at my disposal otherwise than to read the opinion which I quoted yesterday of the gentleman who has perhaps had more experience in applying the antitrust laws and in studying this problem than has any other man in the United States. I refer to Mr. George W. Wickersham, the former Attorney General of the United States. He says:

The problem of the relation of the Federal Government to cooperative industrial business can never be satisfactorily solved until Congress courageously legislates in the affirmative, declares what can be done, and throws the protection of the National Government about those who conform to its laws in acting under it.

The amendment I have proposed is the only method of constructive action looking toward the relief of the people engaged in moderate-sized business in this country that I have been able to discover; and as it is sometimes much easier to understand these questions with a practical illustration than it is by theoretical argument, I simply want, as an illustration of what I mean, to lay before the Senate the process by which the merchandizing of this country is being necessarily absorbed by large organizations and the reason for it and a remedy for it.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, a mail-order house, consists of a number of people who have united their resources into a corporation which now has a capital of $58,000,000. In 1913 it did a business of $91,357,000. In the first four months of this year its business increased from $39,359,000 to $41,808,000, an increase of $2,449,000, or at the rate of $7,347,000 per annum.

Another union or combination of people in the same manner, the Montgomery Ward Co., made sales for 1913 of $39,725,000. The F. W. Woolworth Co., which runs a chain of stores and which at the end of the year 1913 had 675 stores in the United States and 40 stores in Canada, which has a common stock of $50,000,000 and a preferred stock of $14,000,000, made sales in 1908 of $36,000,000 and in 1913 of $66,000,000. In five years the business of that company grew from $36,000,000 to $66,000,000, or at the rate of $5,000,000 a year. Those three corporations to-day are doing a business of over $200,000,000. They have acquired nearly the whole of that business within the last 10 years or so.

Mr. President, where has that business come from? It has come from the small storekeepers and the people engaged in moderate-sized business all over the United States. Why has it come? It has come because those people by their more efficient methods of organization, by their more efficient buying, and through more efficient selling are able to put before their customers, before the buyers, the consumers of the United States, the articles which they have for sale at a lower price than similar articles can be sold for by people who only carry on business in a small way.

My amendment simply allows the smaller business men to cooperate in the form of trade agreements, that shall be passed upon by the trade commission to the extent of saying whether they are or are not in violation of the law or of any public policy, and the action of the commission in passing upon them favorably merely relieves the people entering into such agreements from criminal prosecution. It does not touch upon the question of any civil damages for which they might be liable.

Mr. President, the purpose of such trade agreements is merely to enable the small business men by cooperating to obtain some of the benefits of economy and efficiency which a number of people obtain by forming separate trusts or combinations. It is a question whether we shall encourage cooperation on one side or drive people into combination on the other.

All I ask by this amendment is that the smaller business men shall be allowed to make certain agreements which will tend toward economy and efficiency in their business, agreements that are no different from those which people who constitute the stockholders of large organizations are able to make every day and every minute. When the directors of the Sears, Roebuck Co. or the directors of the Woolworth Co. or the directors of the Montgomery Ward Co. meet in their office and give an order to their salesmen or to their seven hundred and odd stores in this country, they immediately make, in effect, a trade agreement that needs the confirmation of no trade commission and of no officer of the Government; but the smaller business men who are trying to act individually are utterly unable to arrive at the same result that is obtained by combinations.

Mr. President, that situation illustrates, I think, the real problem that is at the bottom of the business situation of to-day. It is a question of whether we are going to force people, on account of the superior efficiency of union and of combination, into great trusts, and are going to drive the business of this country into that form of operation, or whether we shall do something constructively to help retain the smaller and more moderate-sized organizations by enabling them, through reasonable cooperation, to get some of the benefits which come from the other and more intense form of combination which I have been trying to describe.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island has opened up a very interesting subject, but I think it has no place upon this bill. The purpose of this bill is not to interfere in any way with the antitrust act nor to modify in any way its enforcement. The purpose, among other things, however, is to give the proposed trade commission powers of investigation, to inquire into trade practices and conditions of business throughout the country. Doubtless this commission will enter upon an inquiry as to matters concerning which the Senator from Rhode Island has spoken, particularly the mail-order houses, the chain stores, and other phases of intensely organized activity in business which perhaps are interfering materially with its ordinary and accustomed conditions. I do not pretend to say what the evolution of legislation upon that subject will be; but it will, undoubtedly, be the subject of investigation and intelligent consideration by this commission; and under its power to report to Congress it could make its recommendations at any time.

It is true, Mr. President, that whilst we are forbidding combinations of all kinds under the antitrust laws, we are not as yet forbidding that form of combination of dollars which results in the organization of gigantic corporations that are entirely legal. We forbid, under the antitrust law, individuals and corporations, with whom such gigantic corporations are competing, to form combinations in order to meet such competition, and to many that seems unfair. We are also, under the Clayton bill, validating organizations whose purpose is to stabilize or increase the wages of the country. We are also validating combinations of farmers formed to maintain fair prices for their products. We will have, therefore, these three forms of organization—combinations of dollars in the shape of corporations with gigantic capital, labor unions, and farmers' unions—that will be practically sanctioned by public opinion and the laws, none of which will, in the end, so far as their organization is concerned, be in conflict with the antitrust laws.

I think myself that we will have later on to consider the question of the combination of dollars in gigantic corporations, mail-order houses, chain stores, and so forth, organizations that are entirely legal, but which have a very serious economic effect, whether for good or for evil, upon the established industries and business of the country. I regard it as one of the functions of this commission to inquire into these organizations and to make report to Congress. Therefore I oppose any legislation upon the subject looking to the validation of agreements and combinations of their competitors in this bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I know I have not the right to speak twice, but I should like to add, if there is no objection, one single word to what I said. I was not, in anything I said, criticizing the formation of those combinations, because I believe that they enable the farmer and the consumer to buy goods at a cheaper price than they can be sold without some form of efficient organization, but I think to prevent monopoly and to retain the benefits of independent units of moderate size we must let them cooperate to some degree in the interests of economy and efficiency; and further, I want something in this bill that will say to the commission that they have a duty to help and encourage as well as one to punish and destroy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this amendment further than to say that, in my judgment, if it were made a part of this bill, experience would demonstrate that it would constitute the only useful part of the bill. Every provision in the bill thus far is destructive in character and is filled with opportunities for mischief-making. All of the powers conferred upon this commission are in the direction of espionage and interference with the legitimate operations of business; but this amendment proposes to introduce into this measure a proposition which is constructive in character, which will enable this commission to be of some affirmative benefit. If this commission is to be a body such as the Senator from Nevada thinks it will be, of high-class men, men of ability and of integrity, who can be trusted to administer the negative and destructive provisions of this bill, certainly it will be a commission that can be trusted to perform this constructive and affirmative duty.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment, and I sincerely hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, subdivision (g) of section 3 of the bill provides as follows:

(g) If the commission believes from its inquiries and investigations, instituted upon its own initiative or at the suggestion of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress, that any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce, it shall report its findings and the evidence in relation thereto to the Attorney General with its recommendations.

I read that because the Senator from Nevada has stated that the trade commission will have nothing to do with the Sherman law. Of course it is apparent that this specific subdivision (g) imposes upon the commission the duty of investigating and ascertaining whether or not the Sherman law has been violated; and if, in their opinion, it has been violated, it is their duty to report that fact to the Attorney General with their recommendations; and their recommendations can not be anything except that the violation should be prosecuted.

As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has well pointed out and as everybody knows, I assume, by this time at least, every function of this commission as the bill is now drawn is denunciatory, accusatory, and destructive; it penalizes; it will involve constant espionage, detective work, investigation, reporting, and ordering to stop. All this investigation is to be conducted by its own secret agents, and the commission, after inspiring the investigation, is to sit in judgment upon and try the suit which it itself has instituted. Therefore it will combine, of course, the functions of private detective, informer, grand jury, prosecuting officer, judge, and executioner, because after it shall issue its order it will go to the court to get an injunction to compel enforcement.

If the commission is to be composed of men of judgment and knowledge enough to perform those functions without injury to business, it will have sufficient judgment to give temporary approval to agreements such as those suggested in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. That amendment does not authorize any violation of the Sherman law; it does not exempt anybody from the operation of the Sherman law; it does not validate any agreement which may be in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Now, let us see exactly what it does. It provides, among other things, as follows:

> If the commission shall be of the opinion, and shall so certify in writing, that any existing agreement or combination is being operated in the interest of the public, and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such operations will not substantially exclude, prevent, or reduce competition in the business affected thereby, then, so long as such certificate remains unrevoked or such agreement shall not have been declared unlawful or against the public interest by some court of competent jurisdiction, no party thereto shall be prosecuted criminally in any court of the United States because of such agreement or any act done pursuant thereto under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

That simply means, of course, that if the commission thinks that an agreement is in the interest of the public it may issue a certificate saying so, and that will prevent criminal prosecutions of the men who made the agreement approved by the commission until the court decides that the agreement is in violation of the law.

Then the amendment subsequently provides:

> Upon reasonable notice to the parties to such agreement, given in such manner as the commission by its rules may prescribe, and after such parties shall have been given an opportunity to be heard with respect thereto, the commission may revoke any certificate made as aforesaid.

I see no harm to be done by that provision. Then it is provided:

> That nothing in this section contained shall operate to prevent or otherwise affect the prosecution of any civil suit or action against the parties to any such agreement by the United States or by any other party.

So that even if the agreement is approved by the commission and found to be in the interest of the public, the Attorney General can proceed with a civil suit on the ground that it is in violation of the antitrust laws.

The effect of this amendment is that those who enter into trade agreements or continue existing agreements with the approval of the tribunal which the Government itself has set up to decide such questions, shall not be prosecuted criminally, while the agreement has the approval of the commission. Probably if the commission should approve an agreement and the officers of the Department of Justice, the legal experts of the Government, should conclude that the agreement did violate the Sherman law and thought it was worth while to institute a suit to test the question, the commission could immediately, if they wanted to, have a hearing and revoke the certificate they had granted.

The Senator from Utah has said this amendment, if it should be adopted, would be the only feature of this bill that would be of the slightest service to anybody in illuminating what is called the "twilight zone" or in answering any of the interrogation points which the President says now exist in the minds of business men.

The fact that such a provision was not contained in the bill as it came from the committee I do not regard as a serious objection to its consideration now. The hearings before the committee were filled with the testimony of men, including men of such high character as President Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin, who advocated this sort of jurisdiction if a commission was to be created at all.

I can see no reason why the amendment should not be attached to the bill. If I interpret correctly the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], he is not entirely opposed to the principle proposed in the amendment, but thinks it ought not to be put onto this bill. If, however, it would not embarrass the passage of the bill—and I do not think it would; I think on the contrary, it would help it—I can see no reason for not putting it on the bill.

Now, one word as to the bill we have made up. We have been here six weeks trying to perfect a bill which strikes out all of the House bill and throws this whole matter into conference. This bill, of course, will be made by the conference committee, and the Senate will be compelled to accept or reject it in toto when the conference report is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. LIPPITT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL's name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] on public business.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

So Mr. LIPPITT's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the committee amendment, as amended, be agreed to?

Mr. MYERS. I call for a separate vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to section 5 of the bill. I make a reservation to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, has had under consideration a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And has made an amendment thereto.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill is now in the Senate, as I understand?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not quite. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not yet in the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill is subject to amendment, is it not, Mr. President?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the bill in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is nowhere now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the bill is lost——

Mr. THOMAS. I propose to get it somewhere by offering an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope it will not be found. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether the Senator from Colorado wishes to offer his amendment in Committee of the Whole or whether he wishes to offer it in the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to offer it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to know where the bill is, first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet announced it as being anywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator from Colorado can not offer an amendment in Committee of the Whole unless the bill is there.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator must be mistaken, because I offered one a few moments ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill was there then.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand it is there yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not as yet been taken from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then it is in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. THOMAS. That is as I understand. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado proposes that House bill 15613 be amended by striking out all that part thereof reported to the Senate by the committee, and by substituting therefor the bill passed by the House, being pages 1 to 12, inclusive, and lines 1 to 6 on page 13.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the object of the amendment I propose is to concur in the bill which was passed by the House and sent over to the Senate. I do not suppose it will be passed by the Senate or meet with the approval of the majority, but before we abdicate our jurisdiction over interstate commerce in behalf of the commission which is to be armed with these universal powers and jurisdiction, I think the Senate should have an opportunity, at least, of passing upon the merits of the bill, which was very carefully considered in the House committee and which is the ripe result of their investigations and their deliberations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a question of order. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is not in order, for this reason: The committee has proposed to substitute certain provisions for the House bill, or to amend it in certain respects, and we have been acting upon those amendments. The moment the bill passes out of the Committee of the Whole the question will be whether the Senate will concur in those amendments. Now, to offer to amend the bill by restoring the House bill is simply to reverse the entire action of the Senate. Therefore it is not in order in that form.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I never know when I am in order or when I am out of order in the Senate, and my impression is that such is the status of a majority of my associates. We have a body of rules here which, upon their face, are easily understood, but which, when we turn to the various rulings embodied in book form, are not, to put it mildly, quite as clear as they appear to be upon their face.

Generally speaking, a bill considered in Committee of the Whole is open to amendment, and, as I understand, is subject to substitution. I am not going to quote any authorities in support of my position. I have never yet inflicted one upon the Senate, and I do not intend to do so, in view of the fact that so many of my colleagues are learned in those things and speak from authority.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the committee report proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and to insert the part printed in italic.

Mr. THOMAS. My motion is virtually to strike out all that is offered as a substitute and to strike in that which is stricken out. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Senator is merely stating the negative and trying to reverse the procedure, as the Senator from Iowa has said. The pending motion is to strike out and insert. The Senator can vote against it.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the simpler way to get at the subject is to submit it to a vote; and I am not going to detain the Senate another moment, except to ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks an article from the pen of Mr. Robert R. Reed, published in the New York Times on the 15th of March last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, March 15, 1914.]

ROBERT R REED ATTACKS PROPOSED ANTITRUST BILLS—THEY WOULD LEAD INEVITABLY TO THE LEGALIZING OF "GOOD" TRUSTS AND TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF STATE SOCIALISM AT THE HANDS OF A ROOSEVELT OR A DEBS.

That part of President Wilson's supposed policy on the subject of additional antitrust bills, legislation which is embodied in the four bills now pending, is fundamentally opposed to the principles specifically laid down in the Democratic platform in the opinion of Robert R. Reed, who was asked by a Times man to discuss them in the light of the studies he has made in working out the plan for eliminating the corporate evils now embraced in the John Sharp Williams bill.

Mr. Reed attacked the legislation as making unfair competition, rather than combination, the test of violation of the Sherman law and the common law against monopolies, and as leading inevitably to the legalizing of "good" trusts and to the establishment of State socialism at the hands of a Roosevelt or a Debs.

"In what I say on this subject," said Mr. Reed at the outset, "I speak for myself, and not for any client or interest.

"The Democratic platform at the last election pledged the party to the removal of monopoly at its source in the following specific language:

"'A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We * * * demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control of any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.'

"This was the specific party program on the paramount political question of this generation. It can not be brushed aside as less important planks frequently are. It can not be said that it did not enter into the result of the election.

"BASELESS FALLACY.

"Monopoly, we are now told, comes from unfair competition. If we prevent that we will prevent monopoly. A more baseless or a more serviceable fallacy was never perpetrated upon a misled people. There has never been a country or a time in the history of the world in which monopoly sprang from unfair competition or from the acts or agreements of individuals. Temporary advantages, even the destruction of a competitor, may be so effected, but these advantages, however great, are wholly powerless to create a monopoly unless through the instrumentalities of government they may be welded into a permanent institution. This institution has been created in our day through the corporation, and through the corporation alone.

"There is nothing new in this proposition. At the annual convention of the American Bar Association in August, 1911, its president, Edgar H. Farrar, of New Orleans, delivered an address in which he discussed the genesis and growth of our modern monopoly, and declared it to be in legal effect a monopoly created by the State, as fully as was the East India Co. created by royal grant in 1600.

"This does not mean that the corporation is essentially evil. It is, in fact, a public benefit, and owes its origin to a public need. It is the ideal instrumentality for all forms of quasi-public enterprises, such as railroads and public utility businesses, banking, and insurance. All these businesses are subject to public control, and are incorporated largely with a view to that control. But with respect to commercial enterprises, both the use and the effect of the corporation have been different.

"The ordinary business corporation was originally surrounded with adequate safeguards against monopoly. But these were gradually discarded, and finally, unheralded and undesired, came the great evil instinctively feared in the first instance—giant monopolies effected as an established institution under the lax corporation laws of the States. When the Sugar Trust of New York and the Standard Oil of Ohio were declared illegal by the courts back in the early eighties, they went to the Legislature of New Jersey and obtained a statutory grant of the power of monopoly, the creation of holding companies to take the place of the 'trusts' which the courts had dissolved.

"The early commercial and industrial corporations were specially limited both in the amount of their capital and in their duration. No early legislature would have thought of permitting by general law unlimited life and unlimited capital in the enjoyment of corporate privileges in a commercial business.

"To quote Judge Farrar:

"'Great aggregations of capital have been formed, which have seized upon specific industries and driven everybody else out of them. They stand like armed colossi astride the gateways of commerce and destroy every entrant who presumes to compete with them. They have no legal grant or monopoly, but monopoly comes to them by virtue of their size, organizations, and strength, just as surely as monopoly went to the East India Co. by royal grant. The most vicious of all the (statutory) provisions is that authorizing one corporation to own and vote stock in another. This provision is the mother of the holding company and the trust. It provides a method for combining under one management and control corporations from one end of the country to the other.'

"THE REMEDY.

"The remedy for this situation is found in the party platform from which I have quoted. This remedy is, I believe, plain to the average reader. Let him consider the legal facts involved. The first is the character of the corporation. The United States Supreme Court has said that 'the corporation is presumed to be created for the benefit of the public,' and the Democratic Party has declared that it must be so created if it is to engage in interstate trade. That court has also said that a corporation is 'precisely what the incorporating act has made it,' and that it 'carries its charter wherever it goes, for that is the law of its existence.' If there is anything wrong with the corporation, it lies in its charter, in the creating act. If it is a monopoly, it gets that power from the creating act.

"The second thing to be borne in mind is that a corporation has no life or being outside of the creating State except by the kindness or comity of other States, so that a nation can exclude the corporations created by another nation, and will, of course, do so if it finds that they are harmful to its citizens or its commerce.

"If corporations organized under the laws of Brazil or of France were threatening the commerce of the United States, upon whom would the duty fall to protect that commerce by excluding the offending corporation? Upon Congress, of course, not upon the separate States. Instead of Brazil, New Jersey has created corporations, not to do business in New Jersey but to engage in commerce throughout the United States, and has vested them with powers and facilities effectually to throttle and monopolize that commerce.

"Who is to protect that commerce, and how? Ohio, Alabama, and California? They might, indeed, exclude a corporation; but how can they protect their citizens against its national monopoly? The danger is national, and the remedy must be national. It must be the same, in fact, as that asserted against the corporation of Brazil or France. Congress alone must protect the commerce of the Nation against the corporate monopolies that threaten it, whether they are created by a foreign power or by one of the States. Otherwise the commerce of the Nation is without protection against the worst corporation that the worst State may create.

"Is there anything radical in so reasonable and necessary a proposition? Shall the long omission to exercise this power, which is now conceded, commit us irretrievably to the institution of monopoly, to the program of perpetual investigation and control, and to ultimate Socialism? Judge Farrar, as president of the American Bar Association, in his annual address of August, 1911, said:

"'Congress can drive out of interstate and foreign commerce all corporations with fictitious or watered stock, all corporations whose capital stock is so great as to constitute them practical monopolies or suspects of being such, all holding companies, and all companies whose stocks are owned by holding companies or by other corporations.'

"This is a specific statement of the platform remedy, a remedy provided by the John Sharp Williams bill, which was originally introduced in the Senate in April, 1911.

"This bill provided in substance that no industrial or commercial corporation should engage in interstate commerce if it was a holding company, or if it was not safeguarded in its charter against control by a holding company or by competitive interests; also against interlocking directors, watered stock, and excessive capitalization. A number of bills have since been advanced within this original proposal, but that of Senator WILLIAMS is, I believe, the most correct in principle and effective in detail.

"I am speaking only of legislation that has been actually proposed, and have not lost sight of the fact that the President's message leaves the door open for legislation that may accord with the platform pledge and be more Democratic and more effective. He suggests the prevention of the holding company and intercorporate control. This can be accomplished directly by prohibiting any corporation from engaging in interstate commerce which is not safeguarded against control by holding companies or competitive interests.

"Probably the most effective provision would be to demand a charter requirement against the trasnfer of stock to any company or person representing a competitive interest. Such legislation would be effective, understandable, and plainly constitutional. It is based directly on the power to regulate interstate commerce, and to protect commerce and the country against unsafe corporations. It accords strictly with the platform pledge.

"EVILS OF LEGISLATION.

"On the other hand, if the legislative method indicated by the present bills is followed, we may have Federal laws asserting, not power to exclude corporations from commerce, but power to legislate generally as to any corporations engaged in commerce; not requiring voluntary amendments or changes in the corporate rights as a condition of their engaging in commerce, but asserting the power of Congress to change the corporate rights itself.

"Perhaps the distinction is more clear to a lawyer than a layman, but the difference is one of principle, right, and constitutionality, and also of carrying out the party platform specifically. One of the great evils to-day is the habit of legislation without regard to sound principles affecting its constitutionality.

"Assuming that this doubtful method is adopted, I would suggest a law prohibiting the transfer of stock by any corporation engaged in interstate commerce without requiring proof that the transferee is the bona fide purchaser and is not a company or person representing any competing business. Such a law, if constitutional, would go to the root of corporate monopoly. It would make every corporation what it was intended to be—an independent business unit.

"For the present, however, our attention is fixed on the pending bills, which tend directly in the opposite direction, practically ignoring the corporate evil, which is the real evil, and burdening all persons and business in the country.

"ONLY A MAKE-BELIEVE?

"This pending program may be—in a sense I think it is—only a make-believe at this time. It opens the debate, and the result is in the hands of Congress. The business interests are awakening to the actual need of corrective measures, safeguarding commercial and industrial corporations against monopoly. They realize that the continuance of monopoly means the increase of Government interference with all business, and means in the end regulation of prices and wages and effectual socialism.

"One striking instance both of the dangerous facilities accorded to monopoly by the unrestrained use of the corporation in industrial business and of the futility of executive control over monopoly so created is the history of the acquisition of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. by the Steel Trust. Here was a dangerous competitor, the control of which was represented by stock which certain contingencies threw into the power of its great adversary. The situation was a financial, not an industrial, one. With the approval of Mr. Roosevelt, obtained on verbal representations after a short conference, the stock was taken over, and the temporary advantage, the corporate incident, was welded into a corporate right and possession.

"These bills represent the best way to start on the program of socialism under existing conditions, the best way to make the Democratic Party begin the work which a Roosevelt and a Debs must complete. It represents the mission of the extensive interlocking directorate of volunteer patriots, which includes among its members many able and distinguished men—lawyers, capitalists, university presidents, philanthropists, and monopolists belonging to different political parties, all of them desirous in their own way of uplifting society, but believing in the cooperation which comes from combination of industry, disbelieving in the great freedom of democracy, the freedom of competition."

The foregoing discussion by Mr. Reed was given several weeks ago, shortly before he appeared before the House committees at Washington. Later he consented to supplement his former statement.

"Mr. Wilson's work," said Mr. Reed at the second interview, "does not lie in originating party measures, but in directing party action. The so-called pending bills are, it seems, the bills of the men who have introduced them, and the President's policy is to let the committees of Congress and the country thrash them out as a basis for definite action. The situation has evolved a possible program that in a sense would meet the formulated consensus of opinion, and also work out a definite result along the lines of the President's message, and also in substantial accord with the party platform. The effective criticism of these bills has made it fairly plain that the country would not accept a business code of ethics under a Federal law.

"The idea of placing new restrictions upon the individual by remaking the Sherman law or otherwise has, I believe, been practically abandoned. The good sense of the country is the good sense of Congress. The new legislation will be directed against the corporation, and the effort is being made to confine it to the corporations of monopoly. In this situation the Williams bill proposal takes on a new aspect and may be found to be more practicable as a part of the general plan of adjustment than as an independent measure.

"It has already been suggested that corporations whose gross income is less than $3,000,000 shall be exempted from the trade commission bill. The defect of this is twofold. It would exclude small corporations controlled by a common interest in a trust organization and would include larger corporations which are, in fact, independent and competitive. It is possible for any corporation of the latter class to safeguard itself by charter amendment against any possible danger of trust control, and if it does this it should be allowed to maintain its freedom from political control.

"HOW MONOPOLY MAY BE ELIMINATED.

"It is possible for Congress to define the corporate conditions necessary to constitute and safeguard an independent business corporation and to exempt all corporations so constituted and safeguarded from proposed laws. By doing this it will be able more effectively to concentrate these laws and their operation upon the corporations of monopoly, actual or potential, and the final result, with efficient action, should be the elimination of monopoly and the freedom of business. This is the 'new freedom' idealized by Mr. Wilson, toward which he has, with a fine sense of political leadership, directed his party's course.

"It means not, as has been supposed, freedom under the tutelage of a trade commission, but complete freedom attained by business itself, freedom from the corporate evils that play into the hands of monopoly, as the condition to freedom from the Government control that the danger of monopoly makes necessary. In the attainment of this freedom by business lies the solution of monopoly, the end of the institution of monopoly grounded in the corporation, and the end of the danger of national socialism as its final evolution."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This must be the parliamentary situation: The bill came to the Senate from the committee striking out the bill as it came from the House, and with an amendment by way of a substitute. That amendment has now been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, as amended. The Chair paused quite a while in putting the question as to whether the Senate concurred, and thinks three Senators voted "aye" and two "no," as nearly as the Chair could keep count of the vote.

The only way in which the Senator from Colorado could get a vote in Committee of the Whole would be by reconsidering the vote whereby the Senate adopted——

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask if this amendment can be offered in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There would be a vote in the Senate upon identically the same question.

Mr. THOMAS. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate does not concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, of course, the original bill stands.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not particular when it is voted upon, but I should like to have a vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to rule that the amendment offered is not in order at present.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, has had under consideration a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And has made an amendment thereto. The question is on concurring in the amendment. Here is where the Senator from Colorado can have his vote, if he so desires, as to whether or not the amendment shall be concurred in.

Mr. THOMAS. That is, in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the Senate, now.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, do I understand the bill is now in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. REED. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in the Senate for purposes of amendment as yet, but it is in the Senate for the purpose of determining whether the amendment made in Committee of the Whole shall be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if there is any amendment to be proposed in the Senate to the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, it should now be offered, should it not, before that amendment is concurred in? If the amendment is concurred in, then it is disposed of, and is not open to amendment.

I merely wanted to suggest that, because I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] wanted to offer an amendment, and I thought this was the proper time to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has stated, I think correctly, that the question now is whether the Senate will concur in the amendment that has been made in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has reserved one amendment that was rejected in Committee of the Whole, and concurrence in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole would not preclude a vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has reserved an amendment also; and a vote now to concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole would not preclude a vote upon that amendment. I ask whether that is not the parliamentary situation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri reserved an amendment that the Chair believes could not be reserved, because it was defeated in Committee of the Whole; but undoubtedly it can be reoffered in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the only place to do it—in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator's remark.

Mr. SMOOT. The Chair is perfectly correct in that statement. The Senator can offer it when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the only time he can offer it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator reserved the amendment, and that is the only time he can offer it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now in order for me to offer the amendment I reserved in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the impression that it is now in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the amendment of the Senator from Missouri be in order now? It is not in order until the bill is in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought it was still in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is in the Senate now; and the question is, Shall the Senate concur in the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole? Before that vote is taken, either before or after, the Chair thinks amendments can be offered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me the question now is on concurring in the amendment in the Senate, and if we concur in that amendment as an entirety that cuts off other amendments. We must amend, if we amend at all, before we concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ruling that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is now in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I purpose offering the amendment, which was defeated yesterday by two votes, exactly as I offered it at that time, including the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], so that the amendment will embrace the amendment of the Senator. I am striking out the word "calculated," which I employed in a sense to mean "the effect of," and inserting in lieu of it the words "the effect of which is," and I am also inserting the word "discriminations," so that the amendment as I now offer it reads as follows:

The term "unfair competition" is hereby defined to embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, discriminations, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices, whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not, done or used with the intent or the effect of which is to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate further than to say that, in my judgment, the Senate having voted down this definition and all other definitions of the term "unfair competition," the courts, in construing that term, will take that fact into consideration and are much more likely to give the term a limited meaning—that is, a meaning which will make it apply only to the substitution of goods—than they would if the amendments had not been before the Senate. I am asking for this vote, however, because I trust the amendment may be agreed to and because I think it is absolutely essential to make the bill a sound and workable bill.

I ask that the amendment may be read, and upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, pursuant to the assurance which I gave the Senator from Missouri, the Committee on Interstate Commerce was called together this morning with a view of considering this amendment. The conclusion of the committee was to adhere to the language used in section 5, and to oppose this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, to be known as section 6, and to read as follows:

SEC. 6. The term "unfair competition" is hereby defined to embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, discriminations, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices, whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not, done or used with the intent or the effect of which is to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire whether the words "or calculated" were stricken out and others substituted in lieu thereof?

Mr. REED. Yes; they were changed to "or the effect of which is."

Mr. WALSH. That is an improvement; but I am very sure the amendment as now proposed by the Senator from Missouri does not accurately express the idea he has in mind. I move to substitute for the words "is hereby defined to," in the first and second lines, the word "shall," so that it will read:

The term "unfair competition" shall embrace all those acts—

And so forth, leaving it to have such application as the term may be entitled to.

Mr. REED. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the amendment, but I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. The only argument presented by him in opposition to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is the statement that the committee met this morning and decided to adhere to its position. I wish to ask the Senator how many members of the committee were present at the meeting.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Seven.

Mr. JONES. And how many members are there of the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There are 13, I think, but I am not sure.

Mr. JONES. If there are 13 there was a quorum present, but if there are 15 there was not a quorum present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Seven constitutes a quorum of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator from Nevada to hold that the action of a majority of a quorum of the committee is at all conclusive upon the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not at all.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. The Senator from Missouri has argued that the phrase "unfair competition" confers upon the commission legislative authority. Is it not true that the phrase which appears in his amendment on line 4, after the word "business," would also confer legislative authority upon the commission? I read the language:

And all other acts or devices done or used with the intent or the effect of which is to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business.

Would not that confer legislative authority upon the commission, just as much as the phrase "unfair competition"?

Mr. REED. I think not. I think it is a term of definite meaning under the law, and that it does not at all carry the idea of conferring legislative authority. I feel very well satisfied of that.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just a moment? Referring to the remark of the Senator from Nevada, I feel that the meetings of the Interstate Commerce Committee have not been very well attended. The chairman is mistaken in the idea that there are only 13 members of the committee; at least, according to my directory, there are 16.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated that I was not sure about the number. I have given my impression. A number of the members of the committee are absent from the city—five or six; but there was a quorum present.

Mr. GRONNA. I only wish to say another word with regard to this amendment.

I have been considerably troubled in my mind over this particular phrase. Not being a lawyer, I do not know whether it is constitutional or not; but it seems to me that it will be just as difficult to define the language used in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri as it is to define the words "unfair competition."

I do not know whether this bill will be of any substantial benefit to the people of this country or not. Undoubtedly those who have written the bill believe that it will be beneficial. Without casting any reflection upon the courts of our country, however, I do believe that if the provisions of the first section of the antitrust law had been enforced there would be no need for this legislation.

Section 1 of that law provides:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. President, if the penalty of imprisonment had been imposed I take it that this measure would not be before Congress. If the men who have violated this statute had been sent to the penitentiary I believe these conspiracies in restraint of trade would have been eliminated and at least some of the big corporations would have been broken up. In the hope that this law will do no harm, but that the commission will have the authority to call the attention of the people of the country not only to the abuses of the law but to the illegal practices which have been used, and which I suppose will be used in the future, by the great corporations, I shall vote for the bill. I can not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, however, because, as I have stated, it seems to me that it will be just as difficult to define the words which he uses in his amendment as it is to define the words "unfair competition."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will not be adopted. I believe it will weaken the law rather than strengthen it. I believe the terms he has employed in his amendment to define "unfair competition" are more uncertain and indefinite than the words themselves.

I do not intend to repeat the argument I have more than once made during the consideration of the bill with respect to the sufficiency and certainty of the words "unfair competition." I simply record my belief with regard to the effect of the amendment if it should be adopted.

I have another objection to the amendment, however, which hitherto has not been stated, because there was no opportunity to state it. All these devices and acts, such as deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and other things of that kind, must be done or used with the intent or with the effect of destroying or unreasonably hindering the business of another or of preventing another from engaging in business. That is to say, before the Government can enforce this section, if the amendment now proposed is made a part of it, it must prove that these things were done with the intent upon the part of the person who performs or does them to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another. It omits the great public interest. There can be unfair competition in which the public is interested without any intent as described in the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a moment, because I have but a moment.

Mr. REED. I am addressing myself to that particular statement. What interest has the public unless the trade is restrained or unless the act tends to the creation of a monopoly? What other interests can the public have?

Mr. CUMMINS. I come immediately to the latter. The words "or to restrain trade or create a monopoly" are entirely surplusage. They ought not to be here at all. Any acts, whether deceitful or fraudulent or dishonest or false, if done in the way of a restraint of trade or in the way of creating a monopoly, are now denounced and prohibited by the antitrust law. You have included in this amendment the intent to restrain trade and the intent to create a monopoly in order to make the acts which you have described unlawful under the law.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not leave the impression that the intent must be shown when the language is plainly in the alternative. It is the intent or the effect of the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. REED. If it have either the intent or if it have the effect. The Senator ought not to try to make his argument that you must prove the intent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said a moment ago that if the effect is to restrain trade or to create a monopoly we have a complete and perfect prohibition in the antitrust law. If it be simply the intent at some time in the future to restrain trade or create a monopoly, then in order to bring the phrase the Senator from Missouri has used within the prohibition of the law you must prove the intent.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I hope the Senator will not make that argument, particularly when in addition to this there is also the language "calculated to destroy or to unreasonably hinder the business of another or to prevent another from engaging in business." If you stopped there and did not add the words "or to restrain trade or to create monopoly," the statute would not be as broad and as strong and as far-reaching as it is with those words. All the Senator's argument is based upon the theory that these things are cumulative and connected by the article "and."

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not yield if the interruption is to be taken out of my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no way to keep time occupied between Senators.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator——

Mr. REED. I ought not to interrupt the Senator, but will he allow me? The Senator is arguing this as though the bill read "and to" instead of "or to."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I made myself, I think, perfectly clear. There must be an intent, or the act must have the effect of destroying or unreasonably hindering the business of another, or there must be the intent to restrain trade or create a monopoly, or there must be the effect of restraining trade or monopoly. In either event the Senator from Missouri, to use a phrase I heard not long ago in the Chamber, has attempted to elucidate the simple by using the complex, and the adoption of his amendment will, in my opinion, not destroy the law which we propose to make, but will greatly weaken and enfeeble the law. I sincerely hope that it will not be adopted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa by his argument would indicate that he believes the unlawful acts named in the amendment constitutes the sole definition of unfair competition. As I read the amendment it does not prohibit an additional definition being given to those words. It simply says that there shall be embraced within unfair competition the particular acts that are named. Any other act that the court may determine to be unfair competition may be construed to be unlawful and within the definition in addition to the acts that are set out in the amendment. In other words, if a bill of sale should be drawn of this Capitol Building and all the furniture within the building, particularly mentioning the desks within this Chamber, it would not limit the grant in the bill of sale to the desks. All the other furniture in the Capitol Building would be conveyed by the bill of sale, including the particular furniture mentioned in this Chamber, and the mention of the furniture in this Chamber would not limit the grant.

This amendment, if I understand it, and if I did not understand it in that way I would never vote for it, simply specially includes certain acts and the language is placed there for the sole purpose that no matter how a court may construe the law as to other acts, these acts must be construed as unfair competition. That is the reason why I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, one point in connection with this matter, it seems to me, is worthy of consideration. Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act denounces nothing whatever except contracts which are combinations and conspiracies; that is to say, there must be something in the nature of a combination in order to fall within the condemnation of that act. So the amendment covers a field quite separate and apart from that. But I am disposed to believe that the second section of the act in relation to monopoly is quite different in character. It provides as to every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire. Accordingly it seems to me that all the things referred to in the amendment, or any of them, if done with the intent or with the effect to create a monopoly, constitute an offense against the Sherman Antitrust Act and need not be provided for in this bill. So I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that at least the words "or to create a monopoly" ought certainly to go out.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the words "or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly" are cumulative. If we should strike them out, the bill would not be as broad as it would be with them in. It is not required to show restraint of trade or monopoly, but that the acts complained of hinder the business of another, or prohibit another from engaging in business, or restrain trade.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has not appreciated the idea, I think, that I am endeavoring to convey to him. I convey to him the idea that any of these things done with the intent to create a monopoly are already offenses under the Sherman Antitrust Act and should be left to be dealt with under the Sherman Antitrust Act. We are endeavoring in this act to reach cases and instances that are not there dealt with.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator move to strike out those words?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not. I shall vote for it, on reflection.

Mr. REED. If there is objection to those words, I am willing to amend by striking out the words "or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri offers to modify his amendment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment the words "or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly" are now withdrawn, so that the proposed amendment will read:

SEC. 6. The term "unfair competition" shall embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, discriminations, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices, whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not, done or used with the intent, or the effect of which is to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to agree with the construction placed upon his amendment by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], namely, that the phrase "unfair competition" would have the full scope and effect with his amendment as it would have before the amendment was offered?

Mr. REED. I hold to the theory that if the words "unfair competition" have the broad meaning asserted by the Senator from Nevada, these words will not take that meaning away; but if they have the narrow meaning contended for by many of us, these words will breathe life and vitality into the act. That is the position I take.

Mr. WHITE. Then, Mr. President, the scope and meaning of the expression "unfair competition" will not be narrowed by the other words used in connection with it in the amendment, but will have the same scope in the amendment, if adopted, as it would have had in the bill. If this is true, if the amendment be adopted we will not avoid the uncertainty claimed to inhere in the expression by those who are opposed to its use; but we will have to carry the additional burden of proving the specific intent with which the prohibited acts were done—that is, to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another, or that the acts done had the effect of injuring or hindering the business of a rival. The proof of the specific intent with which an act was done is, as all lawyers know, difficult to make. If this intent is not proven, then the injurious effect on the business of the rival must be shown.

Mr. REED. If the Senator addresses that question to me, it is required to prove intent. All these acts stand by themselves, and in addition to the acts is the phrase "done with the intent." That does not apply to those particular practices; it is a general term.

Mr. WHITE. I must insist that, as I construe the amendment, to give effect to the amendment the intent with which the act is done must be shown, or that the act had the effect to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of the rival. It will be observed that the amendment does not provide that if an act done tends to produce the result that will violate the act, but that the result itself must be accomplished.

In law there are certain circumstances where the intent is to be inferred as a matter of law, but in the great majority of cases the specific intent must be proven, and while the intent may be inferred from the act, the contrary may also be inferred. The intent may or may not be inferred, owing entirely to the grasp of the mind of the person who is to consider and construe the evidence.

Mr. REED. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. WHITE. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator wants to argue this exactly as it is and as he sees it.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I am trying to do that.

Mr. REED. I will call his attention to the fact that the language is, "done or used with the intent." We do not stop there—"or the effect of which is." Now, if either is present the statute covers it. Certainly the Senator would not say an act ought to be condemned by a law when the intent is not to destroy or hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business where the intent is absent and also where the effect was absent. Either the effect or intent is fatal. I call the Senator's attention to that.

Mr. WHITE. I understand. I said that the specific intent with which the act was done must be proven, or you must prove that the act had the effect which the amendment requires it to have. I was urging the difficulty in proving a specific intent, and if you did not prove the specific intent required in the amendment, then you must prove that the effect required by the amendment to be produced had been accomplished. It is not sufficient under the amendment to prove that the act tended to accomplish the end.

With all these burdens and difficulties entailed, if the amendment is adopted, we accomplish nothing by the amendment in the way of giving certainty and definiteness to the phrase "unfair competition." It is left by the amendment as uncertain and indefinite as is claimed by the author of the amendment it is in the bill.

As I understand, one of the main objects of this legislation is to prevent a rival in business from using unfair competition to drive his competitor out of business and to prevent this before the business is destroyed. Therefore the provision in the amendment that the unfair acts and practices had to have the effect to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another would neutralize this useful feature of the enactment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask leave to further amend the amendment, at the suggestion of certain of my colleagues, by striking out, in the second line, the words "those acts." It simply smooths the language. I ask that it be read in that shape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the amendment in line 2 by striking out the words "those acts" and the comma after the word "acts"——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, after the word "business," in line 4, I move to strike out the words "and all other acts or devices" and to insert "all other acts, whether of like character with those herein enumerated or not," so that it will read in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as now modified by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 it is proposed to strike out the words "or devices," so that as modified the amendment will read:

SEC. 6. The term "unfair competition" shall embrace all devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, discriminations, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts, whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not, done or used with the intent or the effect of which is to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I did not have the honor of being at the meeting of the Committee on Interstate Commerce this morning in person, although I was there by proxy, for the purpose of making a quorum. I have great respect for the views and the conclusions of that committee, but I desire and intend to vote my individual sentiments in the Senate on this amendment.

I have come to the conclusion that this bill ought to contain some definition of the words "unfair competition." I believe those words ought to be defined as clearly as possible, in order to apprise the people of the country of what is to be expected of them by this proposed law, and all the more so since the amendment to section 5 of the bill, offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], has been adopted, which takes away from the people affected the free and full right of direct appeal from the action of the commission.

It is true that that may be done under circumstances similar to those under which an appeal will lie from the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission; actions may be brought to enforce or set aside the rulings of the commission, but that must be by separate action. As I understand, there is no direct right of appeal or review to a court.

I can see that it would be a great deal more just and necessary to provide for a right of appeal in this bill than in the law creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, because that law relates to interstate railroads, to common carriers and public utilities, quasi-public corporations, creatures of the Government, which can exercise the right of eminent domain and many other rights under the law, while this proposed law applies to the individual. A wholesale grocer in Kansas City, who may do an interstate business, does not owe his right of existence to the Government. Individuals have certain inherent rights which, I think, really ought to be passed upon by the courts when brought into question, and this is the only instance of which I know under our Government where the rights of an individual citizen may be passed upon, construed, or denied to him by a board or a commission or an inferior court without there being accorded to him the full and free right of appeal to a higher court.

I do not think there is any analogy between the denial of the right of appeal in this bill and in the interstate-commerce law. The people who are to be affected and whose rights are to be passed upon by this board not having a full and free right of appeal to a court of law, I think it is all the more essential that they should be as explicitly as possible informed of what is expected of them by this bill and what their conduct may and may not be under it.

Therefore, believing that this amendment explains to a very large degree what is intended by the words "unfair competition," I think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment. I believe that the majority of the Senate wish to perfect this proposed act so that it will prevent the practices against which it is aimed. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has had this matter in charge for two or three months. Every suggestion that has come up has been carefully considered by them. Now that we approach the final stage of the bill, and there is little time for deliberation, it is very dangerous to allow the enemy of the bill to amend it. I say that advisedly; I say it fairly, because it is an undoubted fact from the several elaborate and learned speeches that have been made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that he is hostile to this bill.

I do not charge, I do not claim, that the Senator from Missouri is opposed to antitrust legislation. I believe that he is in favor of proper antitrust legislation. But so long ago as June 25 he made an extended speech, a forceful speech, in which he said he was against this bill because he is against government by commission, and in the several speeches which he has made since I have not heard him take that back or say that he intends to vote for this bill, no matter what its final shape may be.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. REED. Of course, I have not said that I intend to vote for this bill, no matter what its final shape may be.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad, indeed, to hear it.

Mr. REED. A man who said that he intended to vote for a bill, no matter what its final shape might be, would be a fit subject for a lunatic asylum.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yielded for a question. The Senator from Missouri argued this question yesterday.

Mr. REED. The Senator has said——

Mr. HOLLIS. I decline to yield further. The Senator argued this matter for 3 hours yesterday, and I now have only 10 minutes. I am willing to yield for a question, but not for argument.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a correction?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I will yield for a correction.

Mr. REED. Has not the Senator heard me say a number of times within the past few days in these discussions that it was because I was a friend of remedial legislation that I wanted to put in a proper definition of "unfair competition"; that I thought if that definition did not go in the bill would accomplish nothing, and that if it did go in the bill would be a strong bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have heard the Senator say words to that effect, but I have not yet heard him say that he is in favor of government by commission or in favor of this commission. In fact, day after day he has said that he wants to leave things to the courts and not to a commission, just as if a man who put on a robe and sat on a bench was of a superior clay to a man who happened to be called a commissioner. Now, I say that the Senator, if he has shown anything, has shown that he is hostile to the main conception of this bill. Whether he will vote for it finally of course we can not guess and he can not tell us; but I do say that the feeling he has shown against the bill proves that it is dangerous to accept an amendment from him, because it is doubtful if it will improve the bill, and I shall show, if I am not too much interrupted, I think, that this amendment will hurt the bill.

I wish further to say that the Senator is not a safe guide on this measure. In the first speech he made he argued that the bill would be unconstitutional; and I certainly do not suppose that he is going to vote for a bill that he thinks is unconstitutional. He has not yet corrected himself on that, so far as I have heard.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I decline to yield. The Senator has already used up a large part of my time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. HOLLIS. I expect to say a great many things before I get through, if I am not interrupted, which the Senator will not like. He has not liked what I have said, but I am going to say more. In the first speech the Senator made on this bill—and I am going to show now that he is an unsafe guide in this matter, because twice he has proved that he was wrong—in the first speech which he made he based the argument of unconstitutionality on the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. against McChord, a decision by a United States district judge, which it has been shown was overruled and reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator was sincere and earnest in his argument at that time, as he is sincere and earnest now; but he was mistaken then, as he is mistaken now.

In the course of the same speech the Senator announced with all the force and vigor of which he is capable—and that is a great deal—the proposition contained in these words, on page 12161 of the current RECORD:

> Mr. President, I undertake to say that there are no decisions of courts that amount to a rule of law as to what constitutes unfair competition.

Then on the 13th of July, I think it was, he took that back and said there were numerous cases which did define and restrict the term "unfair competition." When he took that second position he was just as honest, just as earnest, just as sincere, just as eloquent, and just as convincing as he has been this week in arguing in behalf of his definition of the term "unfair competition"; and I say that if we had followed him the first two times we would have followed him on unsound arguments and unsound authority, and if we follow him to-day we will be following him into the same wilderness.

The amendment which the Senator has offered has been changed seven times since I first heard of it yesterday. It has been changed in every line save one and it ought to be changed in every line. The members of the committee have had this matter under consideration all these months, and not one of them has presumed to offer a definition of "unfair competition." The term can not be defined without limiting its effect. It is argued that this amendment is now in such shape that it will not limit the scope of the phrase; but we all know the maxim that the expression of one is the exclusion of others. The amendment is a descriptive and, therefore, limiting term, or it amounts to nothing.

If this amendment is adopted the Senator will have succeeded in getting into this bill a provision that will abolish any act in the way of competition. If anyone will read the amendment he will see that that is so, for it proposes to make unlawful—the word "acts" has been cut out—> all devices * * * used with the intent, or the effect of which is, to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another.

That would include every device, no matter how fair it might be, that would tend to drive a man out of business. If you undertook to undersell him honestly or to give better service, you would come under the prohibition of this amendment. Any Senator who reads it can see that that is its effect. If the Senators on the other side are as adroit and as able as I think they are, if this amendment is adopted they will seize on this amendment to defeat the bill by saying that the bill in its present shape prevents any competition, fair or unfair.

This effort to define "unfair competition" without using the word "unfair" or "competition" is like a little game we used to play in childhood, trying to spell a word without using any of the letters that were really in the word. The prize word was "coffee," which would be spelled "k-a-u-p-h-y," not a single letter appearing in that spelling that is really in the word "coffee" in the way it is correctly spelled.

This amendment is merely an attempt to spell "coffee" k-a-u-p-h-y; that is all it is. It is not as good a word; it is not as good a description; it does not accomplish the purpose.

The Senator said yesterday that in all the acts from which he read and to which I referred in my former speech there was not one State statute that attempted to define the expression

"unfair competition." That is true; no member of the committee has undertaken to define it, and I say in all candor that I believe it can not be defined without mangling the bill, without restricting its effect, and without spoiling it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator are so much in the nature of a personal attack that I think I ought to be permitted to say, rather on the ground of privilege, that the Senator well knows that when I was first arguing the question as to the meaning of this term I was arguing it along this line of thought, that the term "unfair competition" did not have the meaning attributed to it. I explained in the next address I made that that was what I meant, and then went on to say that it did, however, have a totally different and specific meaning. The Senator knows that, and if he does not know it his legal adviser ought to be able to tell him.

I think I know, since the Senator has told us of his efforts to spell the word "coffee" without using any letter in the word, where he obtained the natural bent of the intellectual processes which he has ever since followed.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). Upon this particular question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment which is so simple that I hope the committee will accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act" on page 18, line 8, it is proposed to insert:

Including the cost to the corporation of any investigation it may be subjected to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Where is the amendment to be inserted?

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after the word "act" and the comma at the end of line 8, it is proposed to insert:

Including the cost to the corporation of any investigation it may be subjected to.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say, for the enlightenment of the Senator in charge of the bill, that the only purpose of the amendment is this: In the course of my consideration of this subject I was very much struck by the absolute impossibility of finding out the cost of the various investigations that were being made by various commissions all around. I think it would be very desirable to be able to find out, in some one place, how much it costs to carry on this commission form of government.

Inasmuch as we have the cost on one side—that is, the cost to the Government of doing this—and inasmuch as the commission will have full power and authority, under the powers already given to it, to get all these kinds of information, it seems to me it would be a very useful part of the report on any special occasions if they included the cost to the corporation.

I hope the Senator from Nevada will accept that amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I transfer it to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair, and abstain from voting because of the absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). Again transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and allowing that transfer to continue for the balance of the day without repeating it, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I transfer it to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I understand that my pair and I are in accord upon this amendment, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. LIPPITT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to section 5; and before it is read I desire to make a very brief explanation.

This amendment is offered in lieu of section 5 as it was reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, save only the proviso which has been adopted. It is the same amendment I proposed in the Committee of the Whole, with perhaps two modifications.

The so-called Cummins amendment was made to apply to the acts of persons, partnerships, and corporations. The amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole has been modified so as to apply also to the acts of persons, partnerships, and corporations. Also, there was objection made to the methods of review. I have provided, in the proposed amendment, simply for a review of the final decree of the circuit court of appeals by the Supreme Court on certiorari only; and, as Senators who are familiar with the practice in the courts well know, it is a very rare case when a writ of certiorari is issued by the Supreme Court.

My purpose in offering this amendment again is to call attention briefly to the very great difference between the provisions of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and the provisions of that offered by myself in this respect. Under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa there is no provision whereby the complainant before the commission can have any hearing whatsoever if the decision of the commission is against him. I understand that this is not, in any ordinary sense of the term, an adversary proceeding; it is one sui generis. I care not, however, what it may be nominally; as a matter of fact, it will be an adversary proceeding, in that the commission will not be set in operation unless a complaint is made from somewhere, by somebody. Then, under the amendment as it was adopted in the Committee of the Whole, you will have this situation:

It may be that a complaint has been made by a person, a partnership, or a corporation against a person or partnership or corporation; and if the decision of the commission is in favor of the complainant, then the accused party can have the proceedings of the commission reviewed by making an application in the United States district court. If, however, the decision of the commission is against the complaining party, then the complaining party will have no right, under the machinery which is provided here, to a review in the courts above.

It is just as likely that the commission will be wrong in dismissing the complaint as it is that it will be wrong in finding against the accused. To my mind it is un-American to say of two persons to a controversy that one may have a right of review and the other may not; and it is because of my belief that both parties should be entitled to the same hearings that I offer this amendment, and hope for its favorable consideration by the Senate.

Let me say just one word further. The objection was made, when my amendment was first proposed, that there would be the further taking of testimony in the district court. That was eliminated before the amendment was voted upon in Committee of the Whole, and that is eliminated now from the amendment which I propose, so that all of the testimony must be heard before the commission, and the hearing in the district court or the courts above can be only upon the record as it is made by the commission.

I now ask that the amendment may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5, except the provisos at the end thereof, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful. The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, and corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Whenever the commission, either upon information furnished by its agents or employees, or upon complaint of any interested person, partnership, or corporation duly verified by affidavit has reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating any of the provisions of this section it shall issue and cause to be served a notice accompanied with a written statement of the violation charged upon such person, partnership, or corporation, which shall thereupon be called upon within a reasonable time fixed in such notice, not to exceed 30 days thereafter, to appear and show cause why an order should not issue to restrain and prohibit the violation charged, and upon a hearing held pursuant to such notice the commission shall make and file its findings, and if it shall appear that such person, partnership, or corporation is guilty of the violation charged, then the commission shall issue and cause to be served on such person, partnership, or corporation an order commanding forthwith said person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from such violation within the time and in the manner prescribed in such order. Any such order may be modified or set aside at any time by the commission issuing it for good cause shown.

If any person, partnership, or corporation charged with obedience thereto fails or neglects to obey any such order, the said commission by its attorneys, if any it has, or by the appropriate district attorney, acting under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, may apply for an enforcement of such order to the district court of the United States for the district wherein such person, partnership, or corporation has its domicile, or wherein any of the acts complained of were committed, or wherein the said person, partnership, or corporation transacts any business, and therewith transmit to the said court the original record in the proceedings, including all the testimony taken therein and the report and the order of the commission duly attested by it. Upon the filing of the record the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the questions determined therein, and shall have power to make and to enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable. On motion of the commission and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing on the record and testimony so returned. Disobedience to any order or decree which may be made in any such proceeding or any injunction or other process issued therein shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 a day during the continuance of such disobedience or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any party to any proceedings brought under the provisions of this section, including the person, partnership, or corporation upon whose complaint such proceedings shall have been begun, if begun on such complaint, as well as the United States, by and through the Attorney General thereof, may obtain a review of the findings or final order made by such commission in any district court having jurisdiction to enforce any order which might have been made in the proceeding by such commission as hereinbefore provided by serving notice upon the adverse party, if there be one, and filing the same with the said commission at any time within 30 days from the date of the entry of the findings or the order to be reviewed, and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had as are prescribed herein in case of an application for the enforcement of an order made by the commission.

The pendency of such application for review shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the commission, but the district court, in its discretion, may stay or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the order of the commission pending the final hearing and determination by the court. No order or injunction so staying or suspending any such order shall be made by the district court except upon notice and after hearing save that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the applicant, said court may, on hearing, after not less than three days' notice to the commission and the adverse party, if there be such, allow a temporary stay or suspension, in whole or in part, of the operation of the order of the commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the order of such court, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding that such irreparable damage would result to the applicant. The court may, upon like application and showing, continue the temporary stay or suspension, in whole or in part, to such further period as it may deem proper.

Any final order or decree made by any district court in any proceeding brought under this section may be reviewed upon appeal, as in cases in equity, by the circuit court of appeals having jurisdiction to review the judgments and decrees of the district court making such order, provided that such appeal shall be taken within 60 days from the entry of such order or decree, and the judgment of the circuit court of appeals shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari, as provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code.

The commission may provide for the publication of its reports under this section in such form and manner as may be best fitted for public information and use.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the amendment presented by the Senator from Ohio, and I desire to call attention to an obvious danger which will exist unless, as proposed by this amendment, there shall be some appeal on behalf of the complainant or that he may be entitled to a review of a decision of the commission.

If you have men on that commission, as doubtless you will have, of high character who desire that their decisions shall be right, there will be a tendency on the part of these commissioners to decide all complaints which may come before them where there is any question of doubt against the defendant, because in such event the order of the commission may be reviewed by a court. But if, on the other hand, which I hope will not be the case, you might have on the commission men who were satisfied to make any decision which could not be reversed, all they would have to do would be to decide in favor of the defendant, in which event the complainant would have no remedy.

For this obvious reason I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is a good amendment to the bill, and I shall certainly vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS. I was merely going to suggest, if the Senator from Iowa will yield a moment, that if the Senator from Ohio will strike out the last sentence, providing for the publication of the reports of the commission, I shall be inclined to support his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Ohio raises the whole issue between the broad and the limited review of the orders of the commission. It is the same amendment, with one material exception, that he proposed some days ago, which was the subject of a debate running over three or four days and which the Senate finally rejected by a decisive majority.

The material change made in the amendment now offered by the Senator from Ohio as compared with his former one is that the commission is given jurisdiction over persons and partnerships as well as corporations, but in so far as the review of the court is concerned the amendment now proposed is identical with the one he proposed formerly, and it overturns an established policy of the United States. It destroys, in my opinion, all the value of the commission which we are here creating. If his amendment is to prevail we had far better create a less expensive door for entrance into the courts than this commission.

Let us see what it does. In the first place, any individual, or corporation either, wronged by unfair competition practiced by anybody can sue in any court of competent jurisdiction and can recover whatever damages such person or corporation may have suffered by reason of the unfair competition. That is an individual remedy which arises simply because the act declares unfair competition unlawful. The commission is intended to enforce the law for the public welfare. It is not intended to try cases between individuals engaged in business. If you make the commission simply the original trial court as between individuals who may be interested in unfair practices in trade, you will have destroyed, in my judgment, absolutely its usefulness as a public instrumentality for the purposes of correction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Montana will allow me to go on, for I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I merely want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure the Senator from Montana will then have his opportunity.

In 1906, I repeat, we fought this question out and we determined that we would give to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission such power as we constitutionally could give those orders, such effect as we could lawfully confer upon them. If you permit an individual who may be interested in the subject of unfair competition to appeal from the order of the commission to the courts, the courts must try the case de novo. There is no escape from that. The result will be that instead of establishing a code of business morals and enforcing that code upon the people of this country you will have converted the commission simply into a justice of the peace to try cases between individuals.

I earnestly hope that the Senate will not recede from the action it took a few days ago, an action in harmony with the best traditions of the regulation of commerce, an action that I think is commended by the most thoughtful students of this great subject.

I do not, of course, want to impose my individual views upon the Senate in this matter. I am simply appealing for the preservation of the commission as a regulating force in the commerce of this country, guided by the rule that we have established for it, and I am appealing against the broad, unlimited review which is proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, for if it is adopted I will vote and vote heartily in favor of abolishing the commission entirely, I mean so far as this work is concerned, and permit the law to be enforced, in the first instance, by application to the courts instead of invoking the powers and the jurisdiction of the commission.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to two important omissions, I think, in his amendment. In the amendment in section 5, as it passed through the Committee of the Whole, there were two provisos attached. One was the proviso of the Senator from Iowa providing that the order or decision of the court should not be used in any other case under the antitrust law. Another was an amendment offered by myself, and accepted unanimously, providing that any order of the commission or any judgment thereof should not absolve the defendant from any liability under the interstate-commerce law. Those two have been omitted in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to interrupt, I will state that the amendment which I offered was in lieu of all of section 5 save the provisos.

Mr. NELSON. Both the provisos are reserved?

Mr. POMERENE. They are reserved in the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. It seems to me that this is a very vital matter if this commission is to amount to anything at all. If it is to be merely a trap for the unwary, an opportunity to spend money on lawsuits, and for the benefit of lawyers and stenographers, then it would be a good thing to adopt this amendment.

I want to see this commission a success. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a success. It commands the support of the people of this country, who believe in it above any other institution in the country. The sponsors for this bill have been trying to occupy a situation where orders of the Federal trade commission will be analogous in effect and power to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, let us not turn something loose on the country that would not amount to the dignity of a gold brick. If we are to adopt an amendment of this kind, the poor litigant going through court after court will find himself as badly off as Tittlebat Titmouse with his lawsuit in Warren's famous "Ten Thousand a Year."

I do hope that before we adopt this amendment, if there is any danger of adopting it, giving a review of all the orders, a proceeding practically de novo, Senators will think well and ponder long.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I find myself in a position of some embarrassment regarding this amendment. The bill as drawn provided for no court review. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and recently adopted in Committee of the Whole provided for what is termed a narrow court review. The amendment just offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], after the bill was reported to the Senate, constitutes what is called the broad court review. My own view was that it was unnecessary to provide for any court review. The bill as drawn and originally reported provided that the orders of the commission could be enforced only by an application to the court. My view was that the court could, when its power was invoked, give every protection that was necessary to the corporation without specially providing for it. My view was that the court would determine, first, whether the order of the commission invaded the constitutional rights of the corporations affected; second, whether the order was within the authority of the statute giving the commission power to act; and, third, whether the facts stated in the order constituted the offense of unfair competition declared in the statute; and I felt that that was sufficient; that as to the facts themselves the findings of the commission of experts should be conclusive.

When this question came up during the consideration of and debate upon the bill in the Senate as to whether we should have a narrow review or a broad review the matter was considered by the Interstate Commerce Committee. The information which I had was that the entire Judiciary Committee, with the exception of one member, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], was in favor of a broad review, that that committee had been considering a similar question in connection with four provisions of the Clayton bill, one relating to price discrimination, another relating to tying contracts, and another relating to interlocking directorates, and another to holding companies, the enforcement of which provisions were by the terms of the amended Clayton bill, as amended by the Senate committee, intrusted to the future trade commission.

Understanding that to be the case, an understanding which subsequently proved to be erroneous, and finding that the sentiment of the majority of the Interstate Commerce Committee favored a broad view, I acquiesced, and I supported the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] as the expression of the Interstate Commerce Committee, at the same time candidly stating my individual views, just as I have now presented them. That amendment presented by the committee was lost in the Senate when in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was adopted, providing for the narrow court review.

Under these circumstances I feel that I am free to vote my own convictions, which are, first, for the maintenance of the bill as it originally stood, without special provision for a court review; and, second, for a narrow court review. I shall therefore vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I had occasion in the course of some remarks made the other day, when this matter was considered as in Committee of the Whole, to refer to the contention made that by this process of review the proceedings would drag their interminable length through the courts, and the suggestion carried with that remark was that you would get rid of the delay incident to the procedure of that character by the other system. It is reiterated by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] now in this connection, and, of course, any comments that he may make upon this subject are entitled to very special consideration; but he will certainly coincide with the statement that I make, that under the plan proposed by the bill as it now stands the corporation against whom an order is issued may follow the matter through all the courts. It may arrest the operation of that order by beginning a proceeding in the district court; the district court affirming the order of the commission or sustaining it, the corporation may take an appeal to the circuit court of appeals, and that tribunal determining against the corporation, the corporation may carry the case clear through to the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the situation there.

On the same plan, however, the man who makes the complaint is finally and absolutely concluded by the decision of the commission. So you do not hurry the matter one bit by the plan proposed. The right of review exists there, but exists only upon one side. True, the right of review exists only upon the evidence submitted against the contention made by the corporation, individual, or partnership against whom the order goes; but you do not hurry the determination a particle.

Another thing, Mr. President. Reference is continually made to the interesting debate upon the subject of broad review or narrow review in connection with the amendment to the interstate-commerce act in 1906. That, of course, was an historic event; but I endeavored to show to this body the other day that there is an essential difference between the making of a great schedule of rates, embracing perhaps a thousand items and between a thousand different places, and determining one single, simple proposition as to whether a certain practice is or is not unlawful; whether it is or is not unfair competition. The two do not stand in the same relation at all.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that when the interstate-commerce law was originally enacted it was generally believed by its friends that it gave to the commission the power not only to declare unreasonable rates that existed, but it gave them the additional power of prescribing rates for the future; and the commission for a long period of years assumed that power, until eventually the Supreme Court of the United States determined that they had not that power.

The right of review was not given in the original interstate-commerce act, simply because it was believed that authority was given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to prepare a long schedule of rates. Of course, Mr. President, it is altogether unreasonable to repose in a court the power to prescribe a whole schedule of rates that shall govern in the future. When you repose in the commission the power not only to denounce as unreasonable a rate which exists, but also to prescribe the whole schedule of rates that is to govern in the future, you would not give to a court a general power of review in that regard. Indeed, Mr. President, that is so expressly and so clearly an administrative power that it is questionable whether you could repose it in the court; but let us not confuse that with the question that is before us.

We are not going to give to the trade commission the general power to regulate and prescribe rules under which the business of this country shall in the future be conducted; we propose simply to give it the power to denounce as unlawful a particular practice that is pursued by that business. So the question that is now addressed to us is essentially different from that which was considered by this body at that time, and ought to be determined, as it seems to me, upon entirely different grounds. Whatever was said there, it seems to me that we are not considering at the present time the continuation of a policy which has long existed in this country; we are inaugurating an entirely new policy, to be governed by rules applicable to it and to it alone.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the pending measure with a good deal of hesitation. I am aware, as all Senators are, and as the public is, of the evils which have arisen from the practices which have grown up in this country and which this bill seeks to remedy. I am doubtful, as I think all men are who look at the matter in a fair-minded way, whether we shall accomplish all that we desire to accomplish.

I realize there is much in this bill which is new, and I realize the force of the doubt which my friend from Missouri [Mr. REED] has raised in regard to the constitutionality of the delegation of great powers which Congress proposes to delegate to a commission of five men. I also realize how much uncertainty there is in the term "unfair competition," which by this act we have declared to be unlawful; but under this bill we propose to create a commission of five men, with a salary commensurate with the work which they are to perform, a salary of $10,000 each per annum. I want that commission not to be, as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] said, a mere antechamber through which to enter the court room; I want that commission clothed with dignity and authority. I want its decrees respected.

The commission is to determine, under the rule which we have laid down that unfair competition is unlawful, whether certain devices and practices which are brought to its attention fall within that rule. I assume that they will be men capable of dealing with such questions. I have so much confidence in the present administration, or in any administration which may follow it, that I believe men of ability will be chosen. I do not want to see that commission emasculated; I do not want to see it deprived of the power and authority that belong to it.

It will enter, it seems to me, upon similar work to that which the Interstate Commerce Commission has been so well and creditably performing. That commission determines what is unjust discrimination, what practices fall within the ban of the interstate-commerce law, and so will this commission enter upon the great work, with all its complexity, of determining what practices and devices fall under the term "unfair competition." I want the commission to have that authority, and I want its decrees to be respected; therefore I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am even more heartily in favor of this amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] than I was in favor of his last amendment which he offered as in Committee of the Whole, which I supported in the Interstate Commerce Committee and on the floor of the Senate. I am more heartily in favor of this amendment because it provides for one more right of appeal—and a very important one, in my opinion—and that is the right of the complaining party, who is most vitally interested in anything that may arise under this bill and who, as the bill now stands, may be turned down by the commission and denied any relief whatsoever or even a hearing or a right to be heard.

The commissioners will doubtless be able and wise men, but, like all other mortals, they will be subject to error; they will be liable to err on questions of law and questions of fact, as even the best of judges or laymen are, and I think they will respect their own decrees a great deal more if they know they are subject to the free right of review by the courts. Commissioners, like other officials, are liable to become autocratic, and if there be no full right of review they may render their decisions in an arbitrary manner.

While this legislation is intended to preserve the rights of the public primarily, yet the rights of individuals are also involved, and you can not disentangle them from the rights of the public. This proposed law will be invoked by individuals to protect their rights, and you can not separate in the hearings that will arise the rights of the individuals from the rights of the public.

Individuals have certain inherent rights, amongst them the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the right to make a living in a lawful way, and to my mind it is repugnant to the spirit of our institutions to have those rights passed upon, and perhaps denied, without the right of review by the courts. I do not believe it is necessary in order to conserve the rights of the public that the rights of individuals should be crushed. I think they should both be equally preserved. I believe that both may be conserved in a reasonable measure, and that both will be properly safeguarded and conserved by this amendment, which I will heartily support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair, I desire to say that if I were at liberty to vote on this amendment I would vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I desire to state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has requested me to announce that if present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Having a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Reannouncing my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my pair I withdraw my vote.

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk an amendment, to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], it is proposed to strike out the words "upon such hearing" and to insert before the word "if" the words "upon such hearing the commission shall make and file its findings, and."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the amendment as adopted provides for making an order against the accused if such is in accordance with the findings of the commission; but if the findings of the commission in fact should be in favor of the accused, there is no provision in the bill for any record whatsoever.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, although the Senator from Ohio refers to the text of the bill as an amendment proposed by myself, as a matter of fact it has been adopted as in Committee of the Whole. I assume that he intends to refer to the amendment which I offered, but which has been adopted by the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I do. I refer to the amendment adopted by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. With that understanding, I personally see no objection to the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I think it is quite right that the commission should enter its findings, whatever they may be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I also send to the desk another amendment to section 5, and suggest that it should be inserted before the last paragraph, just before the provisos. I will ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply" it is proposed to insert, as a new paragraph, the following:

> Persons, partnerships, or corporations filing or causing to be filed complaints before the commission shall have the right to appear and be made parties to the case and be represented before the courts by counsel, under such regulations as are now permitted in similar circumstances under the rules and practice of equity courts of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to say that, as I understand, under the procedure referred to in section 5 as it has now been adopted there is no provision under which the complainant would have the right to be heard in the event that a suit was brought in the United States district court for the purpose of modifying the order of the commission. The amendment which I have sent to the desk is modeled after the act to regulate commerce. I read from page 45:

> Complainants before the Interstate Commerce Commission interested in a case shall have the right to appear and be made parties to the case and be represented before the courts by counsel, under such regulations as are now permitted in similar circumstances under the rules and practice of equity courts of the United States.

I feel that if there is to be any review whatever, be it a narrow or a broad review, in the courts above, the complainant, who perhaps was instrumental in instituting the proceeding before the commission, ought to be heard in the court above as a matter of right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course I have no power to accept any amendment. I can only express my own view. If I correctly understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, I think it is a very excellent addition to the bill, and I do not oppose it in any way at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I think this amendment improves the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if it is in order, I desire to offer the amendment which I sent to the desk some time ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated to the Senator from Colorado that when the vote is taken on this amendment it will determine the very question that the Senator from Colorado has sent to the desk. If the amendment as adopted in Committee of the Whole and subsequently amended in the Senate be not concurred in by the Senate, then the original bill as reported from the House will be in the Senate for its determination.

Now, the question is, Shall the Senate concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole and as subsequently amended in the Senate?

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill is still open to amendment in the Senate, I presume?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not further open to amendment.

Mr. REED. Assuming that the bill will not be further amended, I want to say just one word.

I believe this bill as it is now framed is utterly a bad bill. I intend to vote for it, however, for this special reason: The House of Representatives has passed a bill and sent it here. If we entirely defeat that bill, then there will be no legislation effected, probably, at this session of Congress, and I believe we ought to have legislation. I believe it ought to be sound legislation. I am unwilling now to defeat this bill, because if it were defeated here, then the measure would be dead. If it is passed here, it will go before the House of Representatives again.

I say now, without qualification, that I think the bill that came from the House was in every respect and particular a better bill than this, and I hope it will be insisted upon by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri that the bill as framed by the Senate is utterly bad, and I shall vote against it. I wish, however, to assure the Senator from Missouri that he, being of the same opinion, can record his honest conviction and vote against the bill without the slightest danger of defeating it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr President, I wish also to assure the Senator from Missouri that the bill we are about to pass now will not be the law. The bill will be written in conference, and when it comes back here, in my opinion, there will be a great many provisions in it that we have never thought of. I will simply state that as far as I am concerned, the way the bill is now, I do not believe in its provisions, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have already stated that I shall vote against the bill. I feel that the people of the country and the business interests of the country have not become acquainted with this measure, and I think they ought to have an opportunity to do so. For that reason I offer the motion which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the motion.

The Secretary read as follows:

> It is moved that the further consideration of House bill 15613, to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, be postponed until the next session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to rule the motion out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Upon what ground, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in the nature of an amendment to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. It deals with the bill. It disposes of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair will put the question.

The question being put, the motion was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite content, Mr. President; but that the motion was in order is apparent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. NEWLANDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Reannouncing my pair, I desire to say that if at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires me to announce that were he able to be present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is in Europe and therefore unavoidably absent. I wish to announce, however, that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). I am requested by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to say that if he were present he would vote "nay" on the bill.

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). I am requested to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I wish to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as previously announced to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I am informed by the pair clerk that I can not obtain a transfer. Being ignorant as to how the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote if he were present, I must withhold my vote. If he were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] on account of sickness in his family, and the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] for the same cause. I was requested to state that if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I must withhold my vote. Except for the reason I have just stated, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—53.

Ashurst	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ga.

So may we live and hope and trust in the overruling of Thy providence for the good of Thy children; in Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF AND PROTECTION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN EUROPE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report the House joint resolution 314, for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House joint resolution 314 (H. Rept. 1075).

Resolved, etc., That for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, and for personal services, rent, and other expenses which may be incurred in the District of Columbia or elsewhere in connection with or growing out of the existing political disturbance in Europe, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President: Provided, That American citizens to whom relief is extended or transportation is furnished hereunder shall pay to or reimburse the United States all reasonable expenses so incurred, respectively, on their account, if financially able to do so. In the execution of the provisions hereof the President is authorized to employ any officers, employees, and vessels of the United States and use any supplies of the Naval or Military Establishments, and to charter and employ any vessels that may be required.

A detailed statement of all expenditures hereunder, and under the appropriation of $250,000 made in the joint resolution approved August 3, 1914, and of all amounts reimbursable to the United States of such expenditures shall be made to Congress on or before the beginning of its next regular session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the gentleman comes to a vote on this, I would like to ask him if this includes the purpose of bringing Americans home?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is one of the chief purposes of the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. Aid can be extended to Americans over there without that. Aid can be extended to an American marooned there who can not get home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can be. If he is financially able to reimburse the Government he must do so, but if he is unable to meet the expenses the purpose is to bring American citizens to this country at the expense of the Government.

Mr. MURDOCK. And it is the plan to send ships there for that purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; if I can get consent for the present consideration of the resolution I will make a brief statement.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to suggest, if the gentleman thinks it not incompatible with his duty, that it is highly important that some statement should be made for the benefit of those citizens who have relatives on the other side. Many of them are in a state of unrest, because they do not know how to proceed, and perhaps the gentleman by a statement can relieve that situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when the President sent his previous message to Congress asking an appropriation of $250,000 to extend relief to and to provide transportation for American citizens in those countries in Europe involved in war, the amount requested was based upon a mere hazard as to what sum might be required.

Since the earlier message was transmitted to Congress conferences have been held by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Strong, president of the Bankers' Trust Co. in New York City, and Mr. Patterson, the general counsel of the American Express Co., the two last gentlemen representing the banks and other concerns more intimately connected with the issuance of letters of credit to persons traveling abroad, and also with Mr. Miller, who is to be named as a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

As a result of the conference and from the information which has been sought and obtained as rapidly as possible, it is estimated that there are at least 50 000 American citizens now traveling in Europe. A large number of them are persons who have carefully calculated in advance the cost of their trip and the amount of money required to make the itinerary laid out in advance. Letters of credit are no longer being honored. Checks upon American banks are no longer being cashed. Many persons find themselves out of funds and unable to get any. In addition, the declaration of war between a number of the great continental powers has largely increased the cost of foodstuffs, and the cost of living all through Europe has increased at a very rapid rate. A large number of American citizens now find themselves without funds, unable to obtain money and unable to obtain transportation to this country because of the interruption of operations by the steamship companies usually carrying passengers.

As the result of conferences held within the last day or two certain banking houses in the city of New York are arranging to send to Europe at least $5,000 000 in gold. In addition, it is proposed to send $2 500 000, to be appropriated here, in order to provide as far as necessary funds for American citizens in foreign countries, and also to provide means for transportation for those persons to the United States.

In addition, to meet such expenses as arise from the fact that nearly all of the Governments now involved in war have requested the United States to assume charge of their embassies in the various capitals of the countries from which their representatives have been given their passports provision has been made in the pending resolution.

There has been a tremendous increase in the volume of work placed upon American representatives in foreign capitals. It will necessitate the employment of additional help and the incurring of expenses that could not have been foreseen nor anticipated.

While $2,500,000 has been requested, the officials of the Government have no accurate information upon which to form any accurate estimate of how much will be required. It was believed, however, that the appropriation of such a sum would perhaps do more than anything else to carry assurance to American citizens abroad, as well as to relieve the anxiety of their relatives and friends in this country, that the Government would leave nothing undone to protect and to relieve those of our citizens who happen to be in the countries now unhappily afflicted by war Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the President to say that it is the purpose of the administration—and he believes that in so doing the administration will have the earnest, sincere, and patriotic support of men, regardless of political beliefs—to do everything within his power, within the power of the United States, to extend relief and protection to American citizens now in those countries. [Applause.]

The necessity for immediate action upon this resolution is due to the fact that arrangements have been made to send the money to Europe to-morrow night upon the armored cruiser Tennessee. The importance of providing the funds speedily necessitates hasty action. Already friends and relatives of American citizens now abroad are depositing with the Secretary of State money to cover the expenses that may be incurred in removing those friends and relatives to this country. Yesterday over $40,000 was deposited with the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, it must be borne in mind that in taking this action we are not acting merely for the benefit of our citizens who happen to be abroad at this time. With a great conflict about to be waged between most of the powers of Europe, the presence of large numbers of Americans in the countries engaged in war is a constant menace to the peace and policy of this Government. It is believed to be advisable and desirable—and notice is to be issued to that effect—that American citizens should leave all of the countries which happen to be in a state of war, in hope that being absent from the theater of activities no untoward incidents may arise that will bring about any unpleasantness between this country and any of the nations unhappily engaged in the conflict. In asking for consideration of the resolution at this time I have done so with the knowledge and with the belief that in a matter of this kind, where the welfare of the citizens of the United States and the honor and the dignity of the Government are at stake, there is no division politically, and that this House will present a united front and act in the manner designed to effect most emphatically the purposes in view. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who desires to have incorporated in the RECORD at this time a statement which he has from the War Department.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from New York has said touching arrangements about financing American citizens abroad, the War Department has issued the following memorandum:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR,
August 5.

[Memorandum.]

Private individuals or firms desiring to ship gold to Europe for the relief of distress can do so by delivering the same either to Col. A. L. Smith or Maj. J. A. Logan at the U. S. S. Tennessee at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Specific directions as to the desired disposition of this gold must accompany the deposits. Receipts will be given. Custody will be taken and an earnest effort made to deliver according to directions. If delivery proves impossible, the gold will be returned.

No fund will be received in any other medium than gold.

One of the before-named officers is now on the U. S. S. Tennessee to receive deposits. Deposits will be received up to the time of the sailing of the vessel, which is not yet definitely determined, but it will be probably late to-night (Wednesday) or to-morrow (Thursday).

It is desired that this statement of the War Department may be given full publicity in order that persons inquiring touching this matter may know how to proceed without any delay or loss of time.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers are carrying an item to the effect that at the present time American citizens in Germany are forbidden to leave that country for some reason. I believe that the gentleman has in his possession information as to whether that prohibition is likely to be a permanent or only a temporary matter. Would it not be well to include that information in the RECORD, in order to allay the feelings of people who have friends now in the German Empire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to make any authoritative statement in behalf of the administration regarding that matter, but I am under the impression, justified by my knowledge of the situation through other than official sources, and I believe I am warranted in saying that the action of the German Government in announcing that aliens will not be permitted to leave their domain at this time is believed to be intended to cover only the period of the mobilization of the army, the purpose evidently being to prevent the disclosure of information that might be of benefit to other nations with whom Germany is at war. After the mobilization has been completed the probabilities are that aliens in Germany will have no particular difficulty other than those which arise from the fact that there is a state of war in leaving to return to their own countries.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in this connection it may be of interest to the Members of the House who, like myself, have received telegrams from some of their constituents respecting absent relatives abroad, to say that the Secretary of State before the committee this morning stated that while he was generally successful in locating Americans, the State Department had little difficulty in reaching people who live at some distance from the consulates of the United States in the affected portions of Europe. He stated further that he was prepared to say that he expected to be able to locate all of the Americans who are near enough to communicate with our representatives in the war-stricken sections of Europe. I desire to emphasize Secretary Bryan's statement in order to allay the fears of Americans whose relatives and friends happen to be located in any country now unhappily engaged in war.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, pertaining to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD], can the gentleman from New York indicate to what extent the State Department will cooperate in sending cablegrams which a great many citizens here have found that they can not have delivered upon the other side in the regular way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the State Department is doing everything possible to cooperate with people in this country in locating their friends in Europe and is using all of the resources at its command to do so.

I was about to call attention to the fact that the verbiage of the pending resolution differs somewhat from that of the one adopted the other day, in order to broaden out the authority of the President in the expenditure of this money to cover every conceivable expense that might possibly be incurred in connection with these matters.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to say that having a number of inquiries along this line, and having been to the State Department this morning, I found that the State Department was willing where advance payments were made to forward cablegrams through our representatives abroad, and thus relieve the anxiety of individuals who are trying to send cablegrams in the regular way and can not do so. I want to say that the State Department has indicated that it was willing to send cablegrams where individuals could not get a satisfactory response, an advance being made to the department.

Mr. CALDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to my colleague I was out of the Chamber for a moment, and I want to know if he brought to the attention of the House whether the State Department or the Treasury Department had arranged for the deposit of funds by citizens in any part of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had already stated so, and that as rapidly as the funds are deposited and information given the department will endeavor to reach the persons to be aided.

Mr. CALDER. Where can the people deposit these funds?

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the State Department; they can be wired to the Secretary of State.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman permit me again? The disbursing clerk of the Consular Bureau is accepting such money now. There were many anxious people at the department whose money was being received to-day.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield for one moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to state for the information of the House, and I think it ought to be stated in connection with the notice that has been given by the gentleman from Kentucky, that the State Department does not close now at the usual hour in the afternoon, but it is open at night. I had occasion to call there last evening at 8 o'clock and I found the department open and receiving money and attending to business the same as it does during usual business hours

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps it ought to be stated that the three departments which will probably be most intimately connected with the work—the State Department, the War Department, and the Navy Department—will have some one present on duty at all hours, day and night.

The position of the President, perhaps, is best explained in a letter written by him under date of August 3, 1914. It is desirable that our own people and the rest of the world should know that the Congress is acting as one man in supporting the President in the present difficult situation. It has done so to the present; I am confident it will do so to the end. The letter, which I shall insert in the RECORD, may aid in making the situation clearer:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 3, 1914.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: We are receiving so many messages showing the extreme distress of Americans in Europe and the immediate necessity of doing something for their assistance and relief that I am going to take the liberty of sending a message to Congress proposing some such action as would be embodied in a joint resolution of the following tenor:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, for personal services, and for other expenses which may be incurred in connection with or growing out of the existing political disturbances in Europe, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President."

I have every confidence that we could manage this in such a way that the whole sum, or practically all of it, would eventually be paid back by the persons concerned, but it seems to me imperatively necessary that the Government should for the time being have funds at its command for these uses.

I sincerely hope I am acting in a way in this matter which you approve.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the resolution came up I was rather in hopes that it might pass without a word of discussion in order to show the unanimous feeling of the people, yet I can see that the discussion which has taken place so far was valuable, because it furnished information to Members of the House and to the country. I think there ought to be no hesitation about appropriating such sums as the administration may desire for use in connection with our fellow citizens, brothers, and sisters abroad. [Applause.] And I hope that the administration will not be too careful or too cautious about the expenditure of the money, because even if they make mistakes and spend more money than is afterwards ascertained was necessary in particular cases the country will not criticize such action. [Applause.] In times like these this side of the House, all of the Republicans in the House, and I believe all of the Progressives in the House, will join in the appropriation of any sum which may be necessary in order that the administration may give such aid and protection and help as is possible to any American citizen. [Applause.]

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may print as part of my remarks the letter addressed to me by the President in connection with this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PARCEL POST.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose did the gentleman from Colorado rise about 30 minutes ago?

Mr. KINDEL. To get unanimous consent to address the House for one hour on the question of the parcel post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to address the House for one hour.

Mr. HAMILL. On what subject?

Mr. KINDEL. On the subject of parcel post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I had first intended to address the House on a question of personal privilege, to answer my colleague [Mr. KEATING], who saw fit, in a way, to reiterate what he had said before. I am glad that the House has seen fit to grant me an hour to bring out the question of the parcel post, and that I am spared the criticism I should have to make of Mr. KEATING'S conduct toward me. The question of parcel post, gentlemen, is a matter of evolution, and you will wonder why I, a manufacturer, have made it a business to become a student of this all-important question—transportation. It is because I was obliged to do so. I have here several maps, on which I shall point out many inconsistencies that have prevailed and that are still prevailing, and how the parcel post of to-day came about. In 1891 I was a manufacturer of a comforter finding ready sale, but the transportation question entered therein, so that I was obliged to pay from Denver to California points $3 per hundredweight, while at the same time they brought like goods from New York via Denver to San Francisco for only $1. That was the start of my trouble with freight rates, and it has finally landed me here in Congress, and perhaps next I will go to the poorhouse, if I keep on.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is usually reached by Congressmen.

Mr. KINDEL. Now, of course, in the hour that is allowed me I can only hit the high points of this all-important question. I want to call attention to this fact, and I doubt if there are any gentlemen in the House who knew that there had been any arbitrary and imaginary line, designated transcontinental line, from Duluth, Minn., to Sabine Pass, Tex., in effect, and under which all the territory east of that line was permitted to ship comforters and other goods through to California for $1, while all the people west of that line were made to pay $3.

I brought suit with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, of course, I won. It cost me several years of time and many thousands of dollars to win, but I won. That same unjust discrimination has fallen to the lot of others in our section. We had a cotton mill, a paper mill, and numerous other manufactories that had to give up, dismantle, and go elsewhere because of that great question of unjust transportation rates. This arbitrary line from Duluth, Minn., to Sabine Pass, Tex., is what I attacked in 1898 and succeeded in wiping out. It is no more at Duluth and Sabine Pass, but there is still an imaginary line at the Mississippi River to-day, so that you can ship from New York to Chicago or St. Louis, store the goods there, and in one month or one year thereafter you can reship to any points west of the one hundred and fifth meridian without any extra cost, the sum of the locals being the same as the through rate; but if you do that in my State or my city of Denver, we are made to pay 87 cents penalty per 100 pounds on first-class for reshipping it. I told the President recently that this discriminative line would have to be wiped out or there would be a revolution, and it would not be at the Mason & Dixon line, either.

What we want is equality. We propose to have a 2-cent postage stamp the same as everybody else, and not pay 4 cents when the rest of the world pays 2. In effect, however, the 2-cent postage stamp and the import duty and everything else, except the transportation rate, are satisfactory, while the express and parcel-post rates are like the freight rates—out of tune with rates in other sections by from 100 to 300 per cent.

Now, this territory in red [indicating] is called the "official classification," and by the express companies "territory 1." I will demonstrate that on the next map. You see, it is outlined here in red. That territory is given an express rate of 10 cents, the unit, while immediately across this imaginary line near St. Louis it is 19 cents the unit.

I challenge any interstate-commerce commissioner or anybody on our Interstate Commerce Committee or on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, if you please, to defend that sort of discrimination. When you get to Denver it is 23 cents the unit as against 10 cents east of Chicago and St. Louis. How can you expect us to develop with the rest of the world with such a handicap? I want to state right here that the greatest statesmen of the world have ever been devoted to the expansion of commerce and cheap transportation.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not understand exactly what the gentleman means by the unit.

Mr. KINDEL. The unit is 50 miles—10 cents to carry 100 pounds over it, but from Denver westward we pay 23 cents.

Mr. BAILEY. For 50 miles?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes, sir. The moment you get past St. Louis, the favored point, it is raised from 10 cents to 19 cents per unit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman is stating the unit for the basis of the express rate and not the freight rate?

Mr. KINDEL. I am talking about the express rate now. I have shown you on the previous map how this section here, designated the official territory, is territory No. 1 by the express company, which give its patrons in said section the same relative advantage that prevails on freight shipments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman intend to give the view of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the reason for that differentiation?

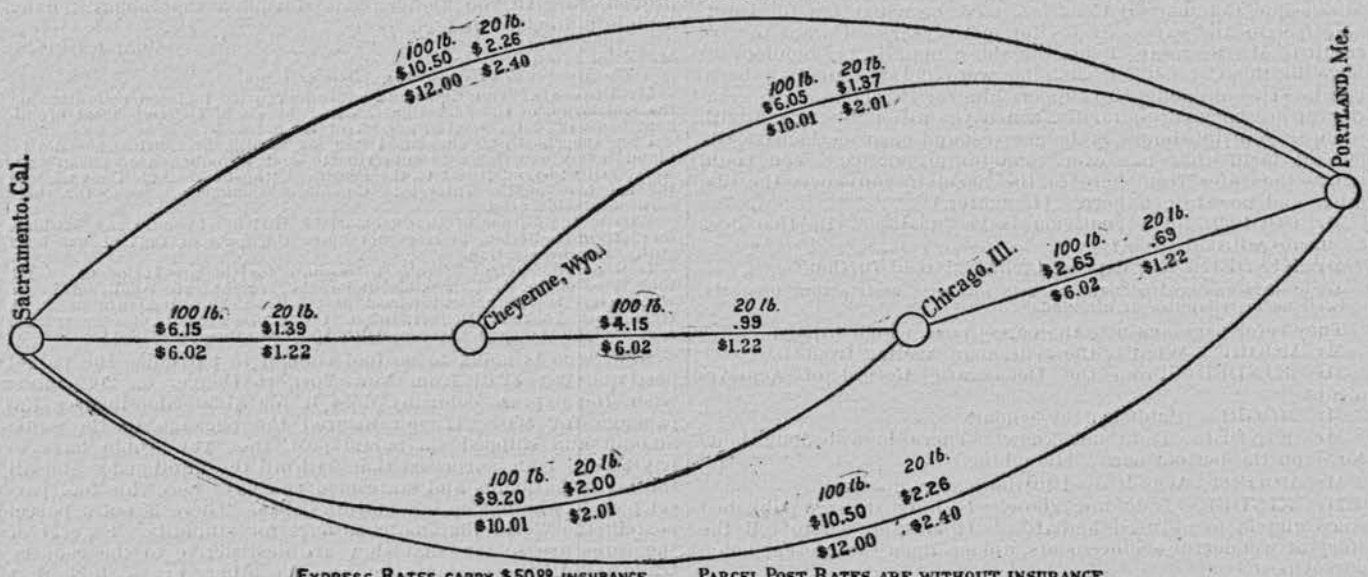
Mr. KINDEL. No. I do not know any reason.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the reason as given to me by representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission is that the density of traffic is so much greater in the first section that the express company can correspondingly carry at a less rate than in the districts where the traffic is less.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes. I agree with that, too; but it does not amount to 100 per cent or 200 per cent higher. To illustrate, I have indicated by circles here, Portland, Me.; Chicago; Cheyenne; and Sacramento. [See chart on next page.]

The express rate per hundred from Portland, Me., to Chicago is $2.65, while from Cheyenne to Sacramento, this being exactly the same mileage, it is $6.15, a difference of $3.50, or 133 per cent higher. You will notice in the express rate there is a gradual rise until you strike our section, the one hundred and fifth meridian, but the discrimination is lessened between the line dividing California and Nevada. [Indicating.] And here in northwestern Texas the Interstate Commerce Commission cut out that little jag. Why? For no other reason or purpose than that El Paso, Tex., is located here, and they would not stand for it. They knew they had a first-class railroad commission in Texas, and they cut it out deliberately to give El Paso a better rate. So it is not what the traffic will bear, but rather what the chumps will stand. [Laughter.] That is what we are getting out in the one hundred and fifth meridian section.

These circular lines indicate the parcel-post zones. I will before I get through demonstrate to you that the parcel post is based on the express rates as found west of the one hundred and fifth meridian, and not, as it ought to be, on central or eastern territory.



Mr. GOOD. What is the rate from New York to San Francisco by express?

Mr. KINDEL. It is $10.40. This is a map showing freight rates. [Indicating.] I want to show to you gentlemen these illustrations, because, as our minister once said in Denver, the Rev. Myron Reed, "An arc light is conducive to good morals." It is the exposure of these wrongs that has brought about many reforms. I have been a thorn in their side for a good many years. But when I came here with the Democrats and tried to help, they would not let me get in so that I could help them. These rates are not true to-day. They have been changed since, from New York to San Francisco, from $3 to $3.70 per hundredweight, first class. It was $3 from New York to San Francisco, but if you stop freight from New York at Denver it was and is $2.48; and if you stop at Grand Junction, in the western part of our State, which my colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR] represents, it is $3.88. Tell me why it should cost 88 cents more to drop it off at Grand Junction than to carry it through to San Francisco. I say that Colorado is the apex of transportation rates. We use that word "apex" because we are at the highest point. Colorado is the highest point in discriminative freight rates. At Trinidad, in Mr. KEATING'S district, they are paying 96 cents more than they do to Omaha from New York via Galveston, though Omaha is several hundred miles longer haul.

When they ride east in a coach they pay $2 plus, a penalty for getting on a passenger train and riding east, and yet they would accuse me of being a hired man of an express company.

If they can not get a better champion than Mr. KEATING to help me right these wrongs they deserve no better than they are getting. [Applause.]

Now, these charts were prepared for the purpose of reducing them in order to get slides so that I can have lantern-slide talks with the people of Colorado; and I also intended to go to Kansas in the interest of Senator BRISTOW, but will be denied this pleasure because the Senator was defeated for the nomination yesterday. I want to say of Senator BRISTOW that he and Senator BRYAN, of Florida, are the two best posted men on the question of parcel post in either House. I have not seen the like of them anywhere in discussing this subject.

You may think that the parcel post is an insignificant thing, yet if you stop to think of it you will realize that the 2-cent stamp has given you the biggest business on earth—the $300,000,000 United States post office. It was supposed the parcel post was established for the purpose of making living cheaper, but I defy anyone to show me where you can ship 5 pounds and insure it for $50 beyond a 150-mile circle in competition with express east of the Rocky Mountains.

As to Mr. LEWIS, who is the alleged authority on parcel post, I have great sympathy for his misguided efforts. He has done much to bring this question before the public, but he has been shooting over your heads. There is not a graduate or comparative rate that you can check up in Mr. LEWIS's exposition of parcel post. If any one of you has attempted to check it up, you will have noticed how he makes up his tariff on half a cent a hundred miles and stops at 10 zones. And why? Because his rates were going up like a rocket and coming down like a stick. [Laughter.] At those rates he can not get the business without committing petty larceny on an unsophisticated public.

Now, I have talked with many people, with the President and with the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with anyone who has shown a disposition to discuss the matter, and asked them to show me where I am wrong. I want to retire from this job of trying to educate people concerning a matter that seems so plain to me and which is apparently not of sufficient interest for others to take up. I may perhaps lack elegance in presenting the facts in this desultory fashion, but what I say will all go into the RECORD, and I hope people will read it and think it over.

The one thing that made me a Congressman is not that I am an avowed politician; I do not care for that. I voted for Teddy Roosevelt when he promised to strengthen the interstate-commerce act. I have been a Populist because of the railroad plank in their platform. I have been a Democrat, and would be glad to fight with the Democrats, but they turned it down at every turn and put a man like Mr. Burleson at the head of the Post Office Department, a man who does not know A from B when it comes to rate making, and admits it, and he rejects advice. What is the good of it? [Laughter and applause.] The one thing that brought me 5,000 more votes than anybody else received in my district was this plank in the State Democratic platform:

KINDEL'S PLANK IN DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

We favor the opening of the Galveston gateway and equalizing of freight, passenger, express, and Pullman rates, and that all rates be made "between" instead of "to and from" in order to facilitate the development of our inexhaustible resources and to materially reduce the high cost of living.

That is what got me 5,000 more votes than the President, the governor, and other State officers received running on the same ticket with me. It was not on account of my good looks, or my talk, or anything else that I may be possessed of. [Laughter.] The one particular paragraph that riled me in this recently distributed little brochure that I hold in my hand—Mr. Wilson's photograph on the front page, entitled "Record of Achievement"—is the sixteenth paragraph, which says:

The development of the parcel-post system to a high state of perfection, which has resulted in the reduction of rates and the extension of the limit and size of packages.

The package is still 72 inches, but the weight has been increased from 11 pounds to 50 pounds in the second zone, and 20 pounds all over the United States. It proceeds:

So that the life of the city man as well as the farmer has been made easier and cheaper. Another result has been that the express companies have reduced rates all along the line.

That was done before you had a parcel post. We, the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, have been fighting for equitable freight and express rates for many years. I want to give credit to Mr. Secretary Lane, the ablest man, in my opinion, we have in the Cabinet. I wish he were not a Canadian born, because I would delight to support him for President. His creation of present express tariffs, which you all ought to read with profit in your idle hours, is the greatest and most mathematically perfect tariff that has ever come to my notice. You could figure the rates from here to the moon if you knew the distance and how to get there. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says "tariffs." By that does he mean railroad rates?

Mr. KINDEL. No; express tariffs. I read further:

All of this has created new markets for farm and factory products, as well as merchandise of all kinds

They refer back again to the parcel post, which I deny.

Mr. MOORE. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. KINDEL. From the Democratic Record of Achievements.

Mr. MOORE. Published by whom?

Mr. KINDEL. I do not know. There is a bedbug label No. 7 on the bottom here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Was it used in the last campaign?

Mr. KINDEL. I do not know. I think it was published since and is to be used hereafter. It is supposed to tell the story of wonderful achievements, among them the present botch parcel post.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman thinks it is not to be relied upon?

Mr. KINDEL. Decidedly not; at least that paragraph relating to the benefits of our present parcel post.

One of the surprising things that I encountered recently was a letter, accompanied by a resolution, from the Denver Clearing House Association, of Denver, Colo., in which they say:

DENVER CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION,
Denver, Colo., June 2, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed resolution, passed by the Denver Clearing House Association, speaks for itself, and we trust that it may appeal to you. The members of the association feel that the matter referred to is entitled to the most earnest consideration of those to whom the memorial is addressed. Copies of the resolution have been sent to the President of the United States, the Postmaster General, the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Senators and Representatives from the State of Colorado.

Respectfully, yours, E. S. IRISH, Secretary.

Whereas the Postmaster General is empowered by law, at his discretion, to determine the weight limit of parcels which may be transmitted by mail, to make regulations thereto, and to fix and change the rates therefor; and

Whereas the parcel post, although useful and desirable within its present limits, is, by reason of numerous limitations, unfitted effectively to meet all the demands of commerce for quick transportation; and

Whereas the express service fully provides for these needs in a highly efficient manner and at rates fairly proportioned to the cost of rendering the service; and

Whereas the extension of the parcel-post weight limit to 100 pounds would, as we believe, so deplete the volume of traffic available to the express companies as to make their operation profitless and force their retirement; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the Retail Association of the Denver Chamber of Commerce and of numerous other commercial organizations that the destruction of the express service would be a step backward and highly detrimental to the business interests of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Denver Clearing House Association no social or economic benefit will result by substituting the parcel post for the express service beyond the limits now established, but that, on the contrary, serious harm to the country's traffic facilities will ensue with a probable loss resulting from the parcel-post operation to be borne by the Public Treasury; and be it further

Resolved, That the influence of the Denver Clearing House Association be exerted to oppose any further extension of the parcel post at the present time, and that the reasons for such opposition be stated in full by a proper memorial addressed to the Postmaster General of the United States, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to the representatives of Colorado in both House of Congress at Washington.

They want me to desist from my attempts to improve and expand the parcel post. My aim and theory is to increase the parcel post to at least 50 pounds and to make the rates competitive with express rates, and not what they are to-day, from 100 to 200 per cent higher. [Applause.] I contend that the Government to-day is guilty of petty larceny every time it takes a package from anybody and charges him more than he would be charged next door by the express company [Applause.]

Now I will show you some data that I have here. I think it would be well to read my letter in answer to the bankers' protest, to give you an idea how I routed that opposition by a plain statement of facts:

JUNE 6, 1914.

Mr. E. S. IRISH,
The Denver Clearing House, Denver, Colo.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter dated June 2, with inclosed resolution on the restriction of the parcel post, signed by six of Denver's most prominent bankers, duly received and carefully noted.

I am surprised and chagrined that six intelligent gentlemen could be found in my own town to subscribe to such a foolish proposition and, worse still, to send it out to the President, the Postmaster General, and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, etc., for their earnest consideration.

Who is the author of that memorial? Briefly, I would say, without fear of contradiction, he does not know the facts or that he has been guilty of prevarication.

Is it not the height of folly to resolute for the prevention of an act that is so obviously impossible under the present rate conditions? Of what avail is the present parcel post with a 20-pound rate of $2.01 from New York to Denver, when the express companies carry the same weight the same distance with $50 insurance for $1.30?

Now, who is going to be fool enough to patronize the parcel post and pay $2.01 from New York to Denver on 20 pounds when the express company does it for $1.30, and insures the package for $50? If you insured the package to the same amount and shipped via parcel post, then you would have to pay $2.11. I am surprised that with all the intelligence and all the mathematicians and statesmen you have here this fool parcel post has gotten on our statute books. There is not a parcel post in the world that matches ours for stupidity. Several of the rates are so low that they are destructive to the country trade within the second zone, and the others are so high that they are prohibitory. Nobody but the express companies and mail-order houses can use the present parcel post to advantage.

The rates and rules governing our parcel post are absolutely foolish and idiotic.

I read further:

What would be the object in raising the weight limit to 100 pounds, which would make the parcel-post rate $10.01 New York to Denver as against the express rate of $5.70 under existing rates? Would any sane man ship by parcel post under such conditions, and do you think that the express companies would be forced into retirement? I hardly think so. I would ask also if any of the signers of the memorial can reconcile the comparative eastern and western rates of the express companies whom they seem to defend and who charge us 23 cents per unit as against the price charged the people of the East, which is 10 cents per unit?

As for the service of the express companies, are you aware of the fact that 20,000,000 or more of people in these United States are being served by the parcel post who can not be served by the express companies? Is it not then the duty of every patriotic American citizen to use his influence to have our parcel-post rates fixed on a saner basis and the weight extended to a 100 or 110 pound limit as the Europeans have it rather than to waste good ink and paper on resolutions to restrict the people's carrier to its present wholly inadequate limits?

I inclose marked copies of my speech on express and parcel-post rates for your further information.

Yours, very truly, GEO. J. KINDEL.

These busy and well-meaning men of my city do not know, that is all. Some express company representative has gone to them and said, "We want this resolution," and these men foolishly, as many do, have signed it and forwarded it to me; but fortunately for the masses of the people it did not find a warm reception with me.

Our Government is paying more to the railroads for hauling than the express companies charge, including pickup and delivery. I have been expecting the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and his committee to devise some rule of pay for the railroads that would have some effect and cheapen our parcel post, but they tell me the newly proposed rates will not have any effect at all on the parcel post; that it is simply a matter of improving mail and not of parcel post.

The figures that I enumerate here are figures given by the authorities, by the people in power. These are published by the Post Office and by the express companies.

On following page is Table No. 2 of 5, 10, 20, 50, and 100 pound rates. I have presumed to increase the weights up to 100 pounds.

The cost of transporting a 20-pound parcel-post package from New York to Newark, N. J., is 24 cents. The parcel post has an advantage there. For distances 50 miles and 150 miles the parcel post beats the express company; but here in this table, No. 2, is shown what the Government pays the railroads for hauling. In the zone from New York to Boston the parcel-post rate on 20 pounds is 44 cents. The Post Office officials say they pay the railroads 33 cents; but the express company picks up the package, insures it for $50, and delivers it at the other end, and does it all for 36 cents. Is it not petty larceny to accept 44 cents for the service, when a man can go next door and get it done for 36 cents? And as you go down the line it gets more violent.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It gets to be grand larceny as you go down the line?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

In the Saturday Evening Post of January 31, 1914, appeared an advertisement of the express company, showing new and old express rates. Instead of reproducing the old express rates I have substituted the parcel-post rates for comparison and the enlightenment of the public, which is being fluked by both the express company and the United States post office.

The new express and parcel-post rates, effective February 1, 1914, were both in conformity with the Interstate Commerce Commission. When was or is the Interstate Commerce Commission right? When they ordered in the present express rates or when they sanctioned and approved of present parcel-post rates?

The following tables are illustrative of some of the differences between the express and parcel-post rates as now in effect.

Express rates on food products are 25 per cent less.
No reduction by parcel post on same.
Express rates carry $50 insurance.
Parcel post is 10 cents extra for $50 insurance.

Mr. Ripley, president of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway, in the Saturday Evening Post of July 18 last said:

> The treatment of the railroads in connection with the parcel post is a blot on democratic government, which can not be and is not justified by any honest student of the situation.

I challenge that statement, and in answer thereto publish the following comparative table of rates. The Kindel rates are based on express rates, and on paying the railroad companies 50 per cent higher for haulage than received by the railroads from the express companies, and then adding the present alleged cost of pick-up and delivery by the post office.

Can and will Mr. Ripley explain why the rate charged to the post office on a hundred pounds from New York to Denver should be $9.03, when the railroads are performing this service for the express companies for $2.85?

Had Mr. Ripley stated the facts as they exist, he would have been obliged to admit that our entire transportation system—freight, express, and parcel post—is as erratic and inharmonious as a grandmother's crazy quilt.

In so far as the parcel-post rates to the second zone are concerned, I admit Mr. Ripley is correct, and beyond the second zone it is the public that is fleeced by the Post Office, while the Government in turn is made to pay a penalty for doing parcel-post business in the last zone. For proof of my statement I refer to table No. 2.

Mr. MOORE. Take your rate from New York to Boston; the parcel-post rate is 44 cents.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; on 20 pounds.

Mr. MOORE. But the Government pays 33 cents for railroad carriage.

Mr. KINDEL. That is what they claim.

Mr. MOORE. That makes the Government cost 77 cents.

Mr. KINDEL. No; that is not the way of it. Forty-four cents is what the Government receives from the sender of the package, and the Government, according to the statement of the post-office people, pays the railroads 33 cents out of the 44 cents, leaving a difference of 11 cents to pay for handling and delivering.

Mr. MOORE. But the present rate from New York to Boston on a package of 20 pounds by express would be 36 cents, which is 8 cents less than the parcel-post rate.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. The difference between 44 cents and 33 cents is used in paying the employees who do the work, and so on.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes. They are trying to figure it out that way. They have had four men figuring on parcel post, and not one of them knows exactly what the railroad pay is.

Mr. MOORE. Does the Government employ more men to perform the service than the express companies employ?

Mr. KINDEL. I do not know.

Mr. MOORE. The proportion of pay to employees of the express companies would be less than by the Government.

Mr. KINDEL. I have a table showing statistics from the express companies that I have not got on the map here, whereby I take the express rates——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will you tell us how you find what the railroads collect—where you get your figures as to what the Government pays the railroads?

Mr. KINDEL. That was furnished me by the Post Office Department.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is there any printed statement showing that?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. In their regular report?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; and contained in my speech of January 16.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then you mean to say that the railroads get a higher rate out of the Government for transporting the parcel-post matter than the express companies pay?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. That would be true as to Pittsburgh, would it not?

Mr. KINDEL. On 100 pounds from New York to Denver the express companies haul it for $5.70. The parcel post charges $10.01, or would if that same table were carried out logically. They do not carry that weight. They carry the 20-pound packages only, or are supposed to, but the payment by the Government to the railroads is $9.03, while the express companies perform the whole service and insure for $50, and do it for $5.70. That is what I am complaining about. You can not convince any sane person about making the cost of living cheaper by the parcel post at present exorbitant rates. The two will not dovetail together. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Take it from New York to Pittsburgh.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The payment by the Government to the railroad is 63 cents on a 20-pound package, for which the post office charges 83 cents.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. And the express rate without regard to the railroad pay is 46 cents.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Therefore it would be cheaper to send from New York to Pittsburgh by express than by parcel post.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; by half. In other words, the parcel-post rate in that instance, if insured to the same amount, would be more than 100 per cent higher than express. The relation would be then 93 cents parcel post and 46 cents express; and, again, if the parcel was composed of some eatable—prunes, milk, and so forth—the express rate would be cut automatically 25 per cent, thus making the express package cost 35 cents instead of the parcel-post rate of 83 cents.

Mr. DONOVAN. One more interruption.

Mr. KINDEL. Go ahead; but do not waste time.

Mr. DONOVAN. How can we expect the Government to give a lower rate when the railroads get so much out of the total? For instance, the Government pays the railroads $9.03. The express carries the same weight in the same package for $5.70. Is that right?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. How could the Government carry it for any less?

Mr. KINDEL. I will show the gentleman. I will give you a better illustration, where the figures will square. The rate on 100 pounds from Baltimore or St. Paul to New Orleans is $4 express, and it is $6.02 and $8.01, respectively, by parcel post for the same package. Now, of that $4 the express companies pay approximately one-half to the railroad to carry it. If I were the Government I would say: "Mr. Railroad, in order that you shall not have any complaint and since you did not dare to attack the rates that were fixed for you by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and you knew you had no standing in court if you challenged the prescribed rates, instead of giving you $2 I will pay you 50 per cent more; I will pay you $3, and add the Burleson rate that he figures for the delivery of the package, namely, 30 cents." That would then produce a parcel-post rate of $3.30 instead of $6.02 and $8.01, respectively. I would make the railroads happy because I was paying them 50 per cent more than express companies are now paying them. Now, you can not get away from that. It is simple and plain and a primary-school lad can understand it. I like to talk to the high-school boys. They all understand it, because they are apt mathematicians, and I am sure the next generation will have a parcel post if this one does not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Why is it possible for the express companies to make that low rate while the Government seems to pay so much more for railroad service?

Mr. KINDEL. Because they were forced to by our Interstate Commerce Commission. It used to be $8.50 per hundredweight, New York to Denver, but I have reduced it in two efforts to $5.70 per hundredweight.

Mr. MOORE. That is a remarkable difference. Why is preference given to the express companies at the expense of the Government in railroad rates?

Mr. KINDEL. It is rank discrimination, of course. Now, here is a case of 100-pound rate. New York to Boston, where it is $1 by express and $2.04 by parcel post.

Mr. MOORE. Why is that?

Mr. KINDEL. That is what I want to know. It is said that we are all statesmen here, but I think this proves we are all false alarms. [Laughter.] It is the fault of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was created by Congress. The commission says to the express companies, "You must put in that rate," and then it says to Mr. Burleson, our Postmaster General, "You can put in these rates." The rates could not be effective but for the Interstate Commerce Commission, as the law provides that all rates must be passed on by the commission, for which we pay $2,000,000 a year.

Mr. MOORE. If there is a special privilege to express companies it is not due to the law-making body but to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; directly and indirectly it is due, in a measure, to this law-making body, which is responsible for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOORE. What is the gentleman's answer?

Mr. KINDEL. Most assuredly, it is the fault of the law-making body that stands for this sort of a thing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman any information that he can give the House as to what amount the railroads pay the express companies when they charge the Government so much higher than they charge the express company. I mean, what do the express companies pay the railroad company?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; that is well known; the express companies pay the railroad company, on the average, 50 per cent of the rate or total receipts.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not 47½ per cent?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; some 55 per cent, and some less than 50 per cent, but the average is about 50 per cent.

Mr. FOWLER. They retain 52½ per cent and pay the railroad company 47½ per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Take the express rate, New York to Denver, on 50 pounds—$2.95. The railroad company gets one-half of that, and yet they charge the Government $4.53 for the same package and the same weight. Whose fault is that?

Mr. KINDEL. It is the fault of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of Congress, that stands for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And the gentleman thinks that Congress ought to do something in relation to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; Congress ought to have a committee to investigate it and do what any business concern would do—discharge or impeach them for inefficiency or dereliction of duty.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado shows by his map that the parcel-post rate on 100 pounds from New York to Denver would be $10.01, while the charge of the railroad for carrying is $9.03; thus the Government only gets 98 cents out of the transaction; that is in next to the last column. Of course you can not expect the Government to lose money, and the move should be to force the railroad to give the Government a proper rate.

Mr. KINDEL. I am not complaining about the rate so much as I am complaining that the Government should be a party to a scheme of taking money under a make-believe from the unsophisticated people.

Mr. DONOVAN. Let me make myself understood.

Mr. KINDEL. I think I understand the gentleman.

Mr. DONOVAN. You can not expect the Government to lose money. If the railroads collect $9.03, you can not expect the Government to transport that merchandise for less than $9.03. The trouble is with the railroads.

Mr. KINDEL. That sort of argument, in the face of the express company rate of $5.70, is so silly that I do not want to talk about it.

Mr. PLATT. Let me ask the gentleman, Does not the $9.03 include the transportation of all classes of mail?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; it is the cost to the post office.

Mr. PLATT. It is not fourth-class matter, but it is also first and second class.

Mr. KINDEL. It is what they claim they pay the railroads, and it includes the parcel post.

Mr. PLATT. I think the gentleman will find that it covers all classes, and that is where the difference comes in.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. If I understand, these rates of the parcel post have been established so as to protect the express company business?

Mr. KINDEL. Apparently. The express companies do the long-haul business, and they unload the short-haul and unprofitable business on the post office. If the express companies had a champion on the floor of this House, he could not devise any better tariff than that in effect to-day. [Applause.] It is an insult to the intelligence of the House and the people generally. Some gentleman asked me what is the authority for present mail pay. I have a table here—No. 4—which I will put in the RECORD.

The first amount in each of the above blocks indicates the proposed postage; the other the estimated cost.

The average haul is based on the radial distance of the zones, except the eighth, where it is fixed at 2,200 miles.

I published many of these facts in a previous speech. I know that you folks do not have time to look into and study these matters as they should be, for you have too many things to do. I specialized on this subject of transportation. I gave most of my time to checking up rates, which makes my speech full of meat and well worth the time and study of all students of transportation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What is the date of that speech?

Mr. KINDEL. January 16, 1914; and I had to insert it under leave to print, because I repeatedly was denied time on the floor of the House, and that is one reason why I am now an independent.

Now to proceed. Here on this table No. 5 I have a different proposition—rates east and west—and I have taken 10 points and compared them with each other:

Parcel-post rate	$264.97
Express rate	145.05
Kindel and Burleson rate	120.15
Kindel zone rate	178.35

Take the $6.02 rate from St. Paul to Buffalo. The express rate is $3, while the rate charged by the railroad to the Post Office Department is $4.90. If you do not think this is going to make some difference about sending Democrats here in the next election, then you will miss a guess, because I am going to make it a business to get out, advertise the facts, and show the people. I take this express rate and divide it to get the railroad cost, and then I add 50 per cent extra pay to the railroad. Then add Mr. Burleson's rate of pick-up and delivery and the rate foots up $2.55, instead of $3 express rate and $6.02 parcel-post rate. Mind you, I give Mr. Burleson all that he claims that he is entitled to and I pay the railroads 50 per cent more than the express companies are paying them, and yet I reduce that rate to $2.55, as against the present parcel-post rate of $6.02. Of course this is all supposing if I were in charge to do that, but the actual facts are that the rate is $3 for the express, as against $6.02 for the parcel post, and that is not all. If you wish to send something to eat or drink, except candy, the express company is good enough to help reduce the cost of living by giving you a reduction of 25 per cent.

Mr. HULINGS. Is that given for candy?

Mr. KINDEL. No; candy is considered a luxury, therefore merchandise; but all other eatables are 25 per cent less than regular express rates; but the parcel post, which I complain of, ignores eatables or drinkables, and you are forced to pay the straight one-price prohibitive rate.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. In other words, as I understand the gentleman's proposition, you pay the railroad company the exact price that they are now receiving from the express company, but in addition to that you give them 50 per cent more than they are getting from the express companies, and to that extra 50 per cent you add the 30 cents which the Postmaster General claims is the cost for the handling of the business——

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; the pick up and delivery charge; that is it.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. So that under your proposition you would be giving the railroad company 50 per cent more than they are now getting from the express companies?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. And taking care of the Government charge of 30 cents for collection and delivery, and yet give the people a rate of $2.55 from Buffalo to St. Paul as against the present rate of $6.02.

Mr. KINDEL. That is correct. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. KINDEL. I do not know whether I ought to or not; but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. I thank my colleague for his courtesy. I want to ask my colleague if he means to say to the House that all that is necessary in order that the Government may secure the same rate for the parcels post that the express companies pay the railroad for carrying express matter is for the Interstate Commerce Commission to issue an order to that effect?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; substantially, that is true.

Mr. KEATING. I do not want it substantially. I take it for granted that the gentleman, being an expert upon this subject, is prepared to make a definite answer and I want him to make a yes or no answer. As I understand it, the whole point of his attack is that the parcel post or the Post Office Department is charging a higher rate, outside of the second zone, than the express companies are charging. The answer made by the Post Office Department is that if it were to meet the rates made by the express companies, it would bankrupt the Treasury.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say that Congress would have to take some action upon this matter.

Mr. KINDEL. Sure. If not, why would I bring the matter up here?

Mr. KEATING. That is the point.

Mr. KINDEL. Oh, tell me what you want and get through.

Mr. KEATING. I want to get a yes or no answer from the gentleman on that proposition. The impression which he has left upon me and I think upon a good many others, is that all the Interstate Commerce Commission has to do is to say to the railroads, "give the Government the benefit of the express rates," and the railroads must comply. As a matter of fact, is not legislation by this House necessary, and what steps has the gentleman taken to secure such legislation?

Mr. KINDEL. Oh, I have endeavored to convince the several members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, also introduced a bill, which is still in the pigeonhole. [Applause.] I have proposed a number of resolutions and not one of them has seen daylight in the House, and that is why I became very much disgruntled, and I wanted to know what was the use of longer parading under a Democratic banner if we can not get a hearing and get vital matters like this righted.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?—and this is the last interruption.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I can not get it out of my head that you have not been fair as between the express company and the Government. That rate that you showed of $10.01, and the Government paid to the railroad $9.03 and the express company had it carried for $2.85. Now, the express company got net out of that proposition one-half of $5.70 rate, or $2.85. The whole trouble lies with the railroads, and the railroads all over the country have appealed that they should have a higher rate, and your indictment should be against the railroads.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the question that the gentleman asks My proposition would give the railroad company 50 per cent more for carrying than they are getting to-day. For the clarification of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], I insert here the rate on 100 pounds from New York to Denver:

Parcel post	$10.01
Railroad cost	9.03
Express	5.70
One-half express charge for railroad pay	2.85
Kindel 50 per cent added	1.42
Pick-up and delivery charge	.30
Kindel proposed rate	4.57

Why should the citizen pay $10.01 for service which could be done at a profit for $4.57? Why overcharge him $5.44?

If anybody but the United States Post Office did rob the public like that, he would undoubtedly be arrested for larceny or for violation of the Sherman Act.

The charges of the railroad to the United States Government for carrying parcel post from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast points is 14 cents the pound. In this case the Post Office pays a penalty of 2 cents on every pound of parcel post it carries.

The New York postmaster, in his report to the Senate Postal Committee for the week ending May 2, 1914, shows he carried over 100,000 pounds to and from the eighth zone.

It is only fair to presume that one-half this amount went to the thickly populated Pacific coast towns. Hence I make this deduction that the post office carried 50,000 pounds parcel post in one week in this instance at a direct loss of $1,000; this multiplied by 52 weeks in the year would be $52,000. Dare the Postmaster General or the New York postmaster challenge my statement? Then if I am correct in this one example of foolish and disastrous post-office management, how much more could be added if all the Atlantic coast offices were added to this computation?

Mr. Morgan, New York City's postmaster, is a very fine gentleman, but according to his own report he flagrantly violated the parcel-post laws eighty-five times in one week, yet I have seen no report of his being called on the carpet and fined by the Postmaster General $4,000, or even $4. Though I greatly respect the New York postmaster, I confess I "snitched" on him, believing it was my sworn duty to do so.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Your idea is that the Government should not pay any more to the railroads than the express companies do at this time?

Mr. KINDEL. I told you before that I make this proposition, that I would pay the railroads 50 per cent more than the express companies do and then cut present parcel-post rates from 20 to 50 per cent.

Mr. LOBECK. Why should you pay more?

Mr. KINDEL. I could give it to the railroads out of sympathy, and then I could show you how I could make money for the people, the Government, and the railroads, and make the cost of living really cheaper, which was, and is, the purpose of parcel post.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. I would if I could, and I regret that I can not yield if I am expected to finish in the allotted time.

Mr. BARTON. I simply want to say that we want to hear the rest of the gentleman's statement, and I suggest that the gentleman does not yield any more.

Mr. KINDEL. I want to show the computation under these several prepared tables. On these 10 points—and this is figured on a Burroughs adding machine, and there can not be any question about the figures—the parcel-post rate totaled as $266.95. To similar points east it is $264.97. Now, there is but $2 difference on parcel post, but when you get to the express rates over the same territory it is $146.05 in the East and $246.22 in the West. How are we supposed to do business and compete with the rest of the world. The Kindel-Burleson rate, which I have shown you, pays the railroads 50 per cent more, makes it $197 West and $120 East. That is based on the express rate. Now, the first thing I did when I was notified of my election to Congress and while I was tied up in bed with a broken leg I perfected an automatic graduate of nine zones. To figure a rate you multiply the number of zone by the number of pounds and add three and you automatically get the rate. For instance, you desire the rate from New York to Denver, which is in the seventh zone. Now, what is the rate on 10 pounds? [See Table No. 10.] It is 10 times 7 plus 3, equaling 73 cents. It works out beautifully, and up to 50 pounds nobody has beaten it so far. For simplicity and excellence it beats Secretary Lane's $225,000 tariff to the express company, and for which I compliment him most highly. My graduate is so simple and perfect that I have had it copyrighted and dedicated to President Wilson and presented through him to the people of the United States, and I again announce it here that it is yours if you want to use it. I now take up another table, No. 6:

Legend.—The food rates are 25 per cent less than merchandise—by express. The K. & B. rates are combination of Kindel and Burleson rates.

Here (see Table No. 6) I have taken three points—that is, one point with three points—and I show you the parcel-post rates there are $6.02, $8.01, and $10.01 on the 100 pounds. I am giving the mileage between points for convenience sake. Here [pointing] is Denver to Cincinnati, the second example on the diagram. The rate by parcel post, 100 pounds, would be $8.01, or by express $4.30. Now, if it is a food product or a drinkable product—except candy—then it is allowed 25 per cent less, or $3.23 by express. If you apply the Kindel-Burleson system of mine to the latter, it is $2.71 on food products as against $8.01, the parcel-post rate. The merchandise express rate is $4.30, which, under the Kindel-Burleson system—which pays the railroads 50 per cent more than express companies—it would be $3.52 as against $8.01. And you tell me it can not be done? The parcel post is a big thing: it is the biggest thing that has been sadly ignored and neglected in this House, and I am amazed that four hundred and thirty-odd Members sit here and let this Post Office mismanagement go on unchallenged.

From Portland, Me., to St. Louis the express rate for 100 pounds is $3.15.

Now, that is the territory east, where they are paying 10 cents the unit, where we in the West, of the one hundred and fifth meridian, pay 23 cents the unit. It is a shame that the people of my section are treated in this unjust fashion. I warrant you they will not stand for it complacently any longer. Watch the coming election returns.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINDEL. I will.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Has the gentleman asked for a hearing on this proposition before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes. I have; and I have been denied.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. When?

Mr. KINDEL. Some time ago, and Mr. MOON, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, told me that he had no time, that he had to attend to other matters. How long do you think the American people are going to be fooled by the present parcel post once their attention is called to these inconsistencies? Now, you can take the comparative parcel-post and express rates. (See Table No. 7.)

Table No. 7.

On this chart it is to be observed that the parcel-post rates are the same in both sections, while the express rates run over 50 per cent higher west than east; also that the Kindel-Burleson rates are 30 per cent less than express rates, which are 50 per cent less than parcel-post rates east of Norton, Kans.

Remember, too, Kindel rates are based on paying railroad companies 50 per cent more than express contract calls for.

Can you beat it? Why not adopt Kindel's proposed rates?

Norton, Kans., as you will observe, is a center point between New York and San Francisco. I remember, getting back to freight rates, that from Kansas City to Norton, Kans., the freight rate on 100 pounds first class is 44 cents; for the second half, Norton, Kans., to Denver, it is 1.18. Can anybody figure out how the man at Norton, Kans., can buy a dollar's worth in Denver with that kind of unjust and discriminative rates? I want to make this charge and challenge right here; I have done it in Denver, and I will do it here now. I am ready to debate with anybody that my city of Denver pays 100 per cent higher transportation rates per ton per mile than any city of its size in the Union, and I will take the affirmative side, my opponents can select the judges, and I will promise to convince my hearers. In reference to Table No. 3 I have taken their exact copy, except that I have substituted parcel-post rates for old express rates, as a warning to the public to beware of the parcel post. [Applause.] Now, do you not believe parcel-post patrons are getting fooled? You remember some time ago the Postmaster General threatened to sue me for $4,000 for putting a rubber stamp on my previous parcel-post speech, but he has not collected yet, I am glad to say. [Laughter.]

The parcel-post rates beyond the second zone are invariably higher than express rates from East to West, and if shippers only knew and had this information they surely would ship via express and save money. And yet there are Democratic champions who contend that this present parcel post has done much to cheapen the cost of living. I deny it. It is a fool thing all the way through, in size, in weight, and in rates. I have reports here from various cities, but time and space forbid my using them in this argument. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. KINDEL. Now, these rates that I have figured from Denver to these several points you can study at your leisure.

Every State having two Senators, I selected two cities in each State that were on railroad and enjoyed both express and post office, with the following result.

The rates are on 20 pounds, the present weight limit beyond the second zone.

Now, if you take New York City, with all the other points, and you want to find out the rate on 20 pounds between any point near any other point given in table within 150 miles, simply add 24 cents to it. That is what the express companies and mail-order houses are doing. You can ship 100 pounds from New York to Des Moines, Iowa, by express, and reship in five 20-pound packages at Des Moines via parcel post and save $5 a hundred pounds by combination express and parcel post as against all parcel post from the initial point to destination points. The New York Suit & Cloak Co. and others are doing that very thing to-day. The mail-order houses in Buffalo, Chicago, and New York are doing the same thing, to the detriment of the little dealer and the Government, and that is why I wanted to go to Kansas and show the people, especially the small storekeepers out there, and help Senator BRISTOW, who has proposed in the Senate my parcel-post graduate, which is a reasonable and simple graduate. I do not know Senator BRISTOW intimately, but I admire him, not because he is a Republican, but because he has the courage to stand for what he thinks is right. He is an energetic and intelligent worker. The people of Kansas and the United States will miss his valuable services.

All over the West the complaint is made that the parcel-post rates to the second zone are entirely too low and have played havoc with our freight trains and stage coaches. Our Government in numerous instances is forced to pay several hundred per cent higher for hauling than it receives for carrying packages. Many of our freight trains and stage lines have already or are about to quit business because they can not possibly carry parcels post on overland routes at the price that is paid them by the Government. To illustrate: First-class railroad freight rates from Denver to Steamboat Springs is $1.60 a hundred. The parcel post, in two packages, is $1.08, out of which the railroad company is paid only 80 cents for fast-train haulage. On the stage routes these comparisons become increasingly greater.

Note how our post office will carry 8 ounces of books from New York to San Francisco at 4 cents, but for 9 ounces of books it charges 12 cents; in other words, you must pay 8 cents for the additional ounce weight. On an additional ounce above the pound you must pay 12 cents in each instance between the same points. Has there ever been so arbitrary and idiotic a tariff proposed or in use anywhere but in this great and glorious country of ours?

HOW IT WORKS OUT.

DENVER, COLO., July 29, 1914.

Hon. GEO. J. KINDEL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GEORGE: I read your last remarks anent parcel-post charges to Mexico and must congratulate you on your fine work. You have been dealing sledge-hammer blows at the incompetency and the inequitable charges—all more or less in the interests of railroads and express companies.

Let me give you a detail in my own experience. God only knows why photographs are not merchandise, but unless a package weighs 4 pounds we must send as "printed matter," and consequently when a package of photographs would ordinarily demand 15, 20, 25, or 30 cents (anything at all over 8 cents) we simply add boards and heavy cardboard, a piece of iron or a nail or two and bring the weight up to 4 pounds or over. Then it goes for the lowest possible rate. Last week I had a package that weighed 3½ pounds. The rate would be 32 cents, but by adding a few heavy cardboards I brought it up to 4 pounds and it went for 8 cents.

Can you beat it? The heavier the package the less it costs to ship.

I hope you will run again for Congress.

Yours, truly, C. A. NAST.

Another sample of freakish interstate-commerce ruling which happened right here in Washington recently was when Judge Will R. King, general counsel of the United States Reclamation Service, concluded he would return a borrowed steamer trunk to a friend of his living in Hyattsville, Md., 10 miles distant, which was too large in size to ship by parcel post. He had it taken to the depot, paid 17 cents for a passenger ticket, and then asked the agent to check the trunk on said ticket. The agent discovered the trunk was unlocked, although it was roped. He stated he could not check it unless Judge King would assume the risk of damage to its contents. This the judge readily consented to do, with a ha! ha! remarking that as nothing was in the trunk he would assume the risk. Upon being informed that the trunk was empty the agent stated that under the rules established by the Interstate Commerce Commission he could not check an empty trunk. Thereupon the judge brought forth a penny, wrapped it in a newspaper in ball fashion, and placed it in the trunk. Here the agent again protested, and reminded the judge that money was not wearing apparel, also that the rules inhibit a trunk being checked unless it contained bona fide wearing apparel. The resourceful Judge King instantly proceeded to take off one of his socks, wrapped it in paper addressed to himself, attached a parcel-post stamp, and placed same in the trunk with the defi, "Now, I trust you will comply with the imperialistic orders of your railroad and the Interstate Commerce Commission and check that trunk." The agent with a look of scorn and defeat sullenly performed his function and checked the trunk. Needless to say the trunk arrived at its destination, the law was vindicated, and the judge was satisfied when his sock was returned to him by parcel post.

Referring now to Table No. 10, I show rates between 33 points with each other on 50-pound parcel-post, express, and Kindel graduate rates; also the Kindel graduate table, with key and suggestion. In many instances it cost 275 per cent higher by parcel post than by express.

Why boast of our intelligence and brag about our parcel post? Our Postmaster General goes on to tell you what legislation we need as to architecture of post-office buildings. If he is no better authority on architecture than on parcel-post rates, God help the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. In the small parcels, up to 5 and 10 pounds, is not the parcel-post rate much cheaper than the express rates?

Mr. KINDEL. If the same insurance of packages is carried, no. In the 150-mile radius, up to 5 pounds only, in some cases, yes—depending on geography.

Here is the cause of it all:

[Mr. KINDEL here exhibited a parcel-post map, on which the residence of the 21 members of the committee are indicated by marks.]

Every one of the 14 Democratic members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee resides within the circle of 650 miles, which is east of the ninety-seventh meridian. Every Democratic member of the committee is a lawyer by profession, and that is why I told them in Democratic caucus there was not a man among them that knew the difference between a bill of lading and a bill of fare. The three members of the committee that are shown west of the ninety-seventh meridian are Republicans.

Denver is located over here—one hundred and fifth meridian [indicating]. We had a representative on this committee in the last Congress, and before I came here. Every one of my colleagues, with the Senators, came to my bedside and promised me they would get me on that committee; but I did not get on, and that is why I am ready to tell on the floor of the House instead of in committee what I know about transportation rates. This shows the apparent discrimination. I regret that permission to insert the following maps in reduced size has been denied me.

There [indicating] is the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, within a circle of 600 miles. The fourteenth one is down in Texas—a Democrat—and the sixteenth is the Republican gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. No wonder we are paying these outrageous transportation rates. Talk about getting a square deal——

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman claim that a revision of the laws along the lines he has submitted, so as to give a lower parcel-post rate, would reduce the cost of living?

Mr. KINDEL. Surely.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Does the book from which he read, called "Democratic Achievement," point out the lowering of the cost of living in any way?

Mr. KINDEL. That is what they infer, but there is no proof of it. I am showing you by proof that there is not.

The Ways and Means Committee is within that circle of 650 miles. Denver is located out here. There is one Democrat, No. 10—Mr. GARNER from Texas—and No. 21 is the Progressive gentleman, Mr. VICTOR MURDOCK, our esteemed friend from Kansas. He is out here on line of ninety-seventh meridian [indicating]. Outside of those two we have not a soul from the trans-Mississippi West on that committee.

Here is the Appropriations Committee. Here is Denver [pointing]. The only committeeman on this important committee west of ninety-seventh meridian is the Republican gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. We of the West are not considered when it comes to making up committees. We might as well be off the map. Here is the Agricultural Committee. We are the recognized bread basket of the universe in this the trans-Mississippi West [pointing]. We have been fighting for relief from discriminative rates for years. That is why I consented to get into politics, and why I led the Democratic victory in Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the Agricultural Committee all the forest reserves are outside of the charmed circle, are they not?

Mr. KINDEL. I believe they are. I have not had the time to find out. I do know that all the committeemen on the Agricultural Committee reside within a circle of 650 miles and east of the one hundredth meridian. Denver, as usual, is out here in the cold. Next here is the Committee on Military Affairs, which does not interest us because we are a peace-loving people, notwithstanding Colorado coal-strike killings by United Mine dynamiters. What we want to show in this instance, as in all the others, is that the Democratic members, as usual, live all within the charmed circle of 650 miles east of the ninety-seventh meridian. The same applies to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Of the chairmanships of the House, of which there are 57 in all, all Democrats, of course, and all of whom live within the circle of 800 miles and east of the one hundredth meridian. Of these 57 committee chairmen the greater and more important of the number are 17 committees, composed of 21 members each, and they are distributed as follows: Four in Virginia, the home of our Presidents; 2 in Missouri, the home of our Speaker; 2 in Alabama, the home of the Democratic leader; and 2 in Tennessee, the home of the chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee; but none west of the one hundredth meridian.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What else do northern and western Democrats expect?

Mr. KINDEL. Nothing. And, striking as it may seem, the committees number 57 exactly, like Heinz's varieties. [Laughter and applause.] They are all included in that circle—east of the one-hundredth meridian, as shown here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean to say that all that country west of the Missouri River has not a chairmanship?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes. It has not a chairmanship; not one; while the State of Virginia has four.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. What conclusion do you draw from the making up of committees as you represent them?

Mr. KINDEL. I draw this conclusion: That it is on a line of "taxation without representation." We ought to have some representation on these committees, but we have not got it, and there is nobody to represent us; and they will not let me get into the committee room to present the facts. I am anxious and ready to show them that I am not, as I have been charged by my colleague, Mr. KEATING, the hired champion of any railroad or express company or other corporation, and, least of all, the champion of John D. Rockefeller, whom, I want to say, I fought on his oil fight many years ago, long before Mr. KEATING was thought of. I helped, too, in 1895, to get the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. freight rates reduced from $1.60 per hundredweight down to 45 cents to Pacific coast points; but that is no reason why I should not support Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., and others when in the right.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he will couple with that the request that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] may have 30 minutes after he has had 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] couples with that the request that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] may have 30 minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Colorado will proceed for 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Maryland will have 30 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I am deeply interested in the maps which the gentleman has shown. Has the gentleman made a map showing the representation on the Committee on Public Lands, and on the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and on the Committee on Mines and Mining, and those other committees in which the West is particularly interested?

Mr. KINDEL. No. I ran out of maps. [Laughter.] If you want, and will furnish me with blank maps, I will make them for you. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I want to show you what the result would be if Mr. LEWIS's scheme of rates should be carried out literally. I want to say that he has been the adviser of the Postmaster General and in effect his scheme is carried out, but in 400-mile jumps instead of 100 miles, and he gets that irreconcilable result in rates that I have demonstrated.

Now, the black circular lines indicate going westward and the red lines coming east would be 100 miles apart in Mr. LEWIS's proposition. One trouble I find with the present rates as they are to-day is that if we extended the weight limit from 20 pounds to 100 pounds, you could, beyond the third zone, save 95 cents a hundred. Does anybody know how to do that? No; not even the chairman of the Post Office Committee knows it, although I have shown how he could do it from his home, Chattanooga. In transportation that should not be permissible—that you reship at less than the sum of the through rate. It should never be permitted.

Now, my first scheme included 9 zones instead of 24, as Mr. LEWIS suggests. By the way, I will be glad at any time to accommodate Mr. LEWIS or anybody else and have this discussion in five-minute or longer turns, alternating, if he will do it. We can then the better explain and get the best results out of it. I have never worked so hard in my life as I have done in the past 18 months, and I have apparently got nowhere. [Laughter.]

This is the graduate that I perfected—see Table No. 10. To figure a rate, multiply zone by the pound and add 3. For example, take 8 zone and multiply by 10 pounds and add 3, and that makes 83 cents. Now, you ask why I say "add 3"? That was determined by the Post Office Committee as the overhead charge. All rates ought to show a declension as the distance increases. If 100 miles should be, say, $1 rate, 200 hundred miles should not be $2 simply because it is twice the distance. There should be a declension, which is recognized throughout the civilized and commercial world.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has one map which shows the rates, called the "Kindel-Burleson rates." It is a little confusing. I was led to believe from the statement of the map that the Postmaster General had accepted it and was a party in making up the list. Is it a fact that he does not agree with your rate?

Mr. KINDEL. Oh, no; he does not know enough to do it. [Laughter.] So far he has shown no inclination to understand. He told me so, distinctly; and even the President himself, when I showed him some of these things and also the map, he first wanted to argue, but I soon convinced him that he did not know much if anything about transportation. He made the excuse, "I can not know all these things." I said to him, "My dear Mr. President, I know that. That is why I came down here to help."

The RECORD shows this morning that I offered a resolution that was instigated by a man in New York by the name of Wolf.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Lamar.

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; that is the name. I do not know the man. The resolution I introduced was brought out by the Antitrust League, of which I have the honor to be a member, some of which members I have known for many years. It was the league and myself and another man who brought about the Stanley Steel Trust investigation several years ago. What the President did say on that matter of my resolution to investigate was that I was mistaken. I got my data from the courts and the papers, and when the error was brought to my attention I cut out that particular paragraph. But the rest is still there. It is the matter of the dissolution of the Union and Southern Pacific Railroads.

Then I was called before "His highness, the Secretary of State." [Laughter.] He wanted to know if I was a Democrat. I said, "Yes; I voted for you several times, and would vote for you again if I thought you were right, and if not I would not vote for you." I said, "I do not care for your politics, it is men and measures that count with me. If we can not get these things fixed—things that are so simple and vital like this parcel post—then I want to go home and attend to my knitting. Besides that, I do not want to linger in this heat, waiting in vain, and finally be Oslerized." [Laughter.]

Gentleman, I thank you for your attention. I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDEL. In addition to the above, without any desire to encroach upon the patience of the House, I think I should further state a few more facts regarding the parcel post that are not generally known. As everybody is aware, the parcel post has been increased since the incumbency of the Democratic Party in weight from 11 pounds to as much as 50 pounds in the second zone and 20 pounds in all zones beyond. With the 11-pound maximum weight was adopted the European dimension, or size, of package, making 72 inches total. Of what benefit is the enlargment of the parcel post in cases—and there are many of them—where it is impossible for 72 inches to encompass the pounds of the goods to be shipped, without destroying the value of the same to a greater or less degree?

I had prepared for me by the Bureau of Standards a table of weights, under the 72-inch measure, of certain products of the soil. I will mention a few:

A cubic foot of apples contains 31 pounds. How can you ship 50 pounds of apples under the 72-inch measure?

A cubic foot of blueberries contains 27 pounds? How can you ship 50 pounds of blueberries by parcel post?

A cubic foot of grass seed weighs 11 pounds. How can you ship 50 pounds by parcel post?

A cubic foot of bolted corn meal weighs 35 pounds. How can you ship 50 pounds of corn meal by parcel post?

A cubic foot of onion sets weighs 18 pounds. How can you ship 50 pounds by parcel post?

A cubic foot of peanuts weighs 14 pounds. How can you ship 50 pounds by parcel post?

And so on.

OUR FOREIGN PARCEL POST.

Lord & Taylor, of New York City, have plants both in this country and in Germany. The rate on their 11-pound parcel from Germany to Cuba is 50 cents; to Costa Rica, 55 cents; to Mexico, 55 cents; to Nicaragua, 85 cents; to Panama, 60 cents; to Uruguay, 85 cents; to Colombia, 90 cents. The tax levied on parcels posted from their American plants to all countries with which we have parcel-post conventions is 11 pounds, $1.32.

100 pounds.

This graduate can be extended to any weight without discriminations.

The rate is found by multiplying the pounds by the zone and adding 3, the overhead charge, except in the local zone, where the rate is found by dividing the weight in pounds by 2 and adding 3. Thus the rate on 10 pounds in the local zone is 10÷2=5+3=8. Fractions are disregarded. The rate on 10 pounds to the eighth zone is 10×8=80+3=83.

The weight limit to be extended to all zones to 50 pounds.

The weight limit to be extended to 150-mile zone to 100 pounds.

The ounce rates to be ½ cent per ounce until the pound rate is reached, when the pound rate shall apply.

All food products should take 25 per cent less rate than merchandise, which is now the rule of express companies.

For packages of unusual or excessive dimensions the charge shall be made upon a basis of 10 pounds per cubic foot.

From their German plant Lord & Taylor can post 11 pounds of merchandise as far as San Francisco for 81 cents, while from the New York plant the tax or rate on parcels posted to San Francisco is $1.32, in other words, 50 per cent more from New York than from Germany. Surely, this does not speak well for American ingenuity and enterprise in our Post Office Department.

Much has been published of late so that the ider is prevelant, as I illustrate by the letters sent me by my townsman, that the parcel post was destroying the express companies, and in proof of that they point to the dissolution of the United States Express Co. If the public but knew the inside of this dissolution they would spare their pity for a worthier cause.

First, I will treat this subject from the economic viewpoint. In my own city of Denver we had about 6 express companies operating, one of which was the United States Express Co. I do not believe that at any time there has been enough express business in my city of Denver, excepting during the holiday season, to give any one express company, if they had all of the business, a hot box. Therefore, from the economic point of view there should be less express companies, less overhead charges, less duplication, and so forth.

The real reason for a dissolution of the United States Express Co. is that for years the United States Express Co. had a contract with the United States Government, under which all the funds were carried from place to place on a stipulated contract that the regular rates should apply to Government business. The public generally is not aware that sworn evidence has been before the Attorney General for some years, and is being pressed for investigation, and now on the eve of this exposure the United States Express Co has taken time by the forelock, and like ether would disappear, so that there will be nothing tangible to attack or collect from the overcharges which amount to millions of dollars that have been fleeced from our Government. The public generally does not know that there was a side contract between the Adams Express Co. and the United States Express Co. which monopolize the Government business in a manner so that none other could compete, and in violation of the law.

My resolution, House resolution 569, of July 14, 1914, now before the Judiciary Committee, reads as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas the United States Government is now calling for bids from express companies for the purpose of transporting Government funds; and

Whereas a monopoly has existed for 20 years, enjoyed by certain express companies; and

Whereas certain blue-print copies of contracts between certain express companies have been furnished to the United States Government more than a year ago; and

Whereas no action is known to have been taken to compel restitution by said companies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives whether the Department of Justice has in contemplation any action for compelling the United States and Adams Express Cos. to refund to the United States Government any moneys collected in excess of rates charged to individual shippers.

To substantiate the charges I have presented the sworn evidence of a well-known citizen. I hope soon to bring about a thorough investigation and the recovery of the millions of overcharges that have been perpetrated on the Government on the transportation of funds, and so forth.

The competition of the parcel post beyond the second zone is so absurd that it becomes nothing more or less than a monopoly for the express company and a license for the Government to fleece the unsophisticated who are patronizing the parcel post beyond a 5-pound parcel and the second zone.

In a printed circular dated January 25, 1913, I sent broadcast my parcel-post graduate that, I believed, ought to be adopted, if no better was offered, with the following notation:

P. S.—This perfected graduate is dedicated to the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, our esteemed and learned President elect, whose aim and desire is to serve all the people, which stamps him a second Lincoln.

KINDEL.

I was inspired by all that I had read and heard of Mr. Wilson from the declarations made by the President before the election. I was in hopes that the country might depend upon him for wise and conservative action, and thus endeavor to promote legislation that would take into certain consideration the general welfare of the entire body of merchants, manufacturers, and laborers of the country; but regret to find that the tendencies that have thus far been shown are more scholastic than businesslike, as is evidenced by this botch parcel post and the restrictive orders now prevailing in the coal fields of my State. Wherefor, I regret the loss of time that I could not convince him and the Democratic Party of its suicidal policy. Our President is undoubtedly a good and well-meaning man, but it would have been a blessing to the country if he had had more business experience before he assumed the grave responsibility of the office with which he has been honored and which I took great delight to assist him in. It is but proper to say that on all but two propositions I have accepted Democratic advice and voted with them. What I have said here is not in the spirit of malice or unfriendliness, and I am only repeating in public what I have said in private repeatedly. I have no other ambition than to be right, and, if possible, to convince others of that fact.

In conclusion, I have been asked to explain some things relative to the charges made against me by my colleague, Mr. KEATING. I do not think it is necessary. I would rather adopt the method of our heroic and illustrious Speaker, who was assailed on the floor of the House several months ago, and which, in his becoming and dignified manner, he dismissed with a "S-h-o-o f-l-y"; or, to quote a doggerel valentine rhyme:

Avaunt! thou snickering fop,
E'er nature made thee, she thought she would stop;
But having some useless scraps on hand,
These she baked, and thus we became annoyed by you—

And so forth.

But, better still, to apply to him a Spanish adage:

It is a waste of lather to shave an ass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I have taken advantage of the patience of the House in the last two or three years so frequently on this subject that I do so this morning with considerable misgiving. I should not do so except at the suggestion of others, who think that the relation of the Postmaster General to this very interesting question should be fairly stated to the House.

First let me assure you that I do not think I know all about this subject. I am quite sure I do not. But there are some elements of the subject that are sufficiently dominant and segregated in character as to be capable of oral statement to this House, and with its patience I shall try to present them.

First, let me say that in the very nature of things the making of transportation rates is an administrative function. There may be individual Members of this House who can take the data of astronomy and figure out exactly when the next comet is going to approach some member of our solar system, but I am satisfied that as an aggregate body we would not be able to encompass such a mass of detail. The illustration fits the subject of transportation rates and transportation conditions. It is a subject that requires the expert attention of administrative talent, dealing with it not for a day or an hour, as we act in legislative matters, but giving prolonged attention, running from week to week and month to month, and, indeed, from year to year.

Now, the House parcel-post bill absolutely recognized this administrative principle, and gives the Postmaster General the power, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to determine all the conditions of parcel-post traffic, the weight limit, the rates, the conditions of mailability, the zones, and every incident attached to the shipment of parcels. I believe you will agree that we have wisely left to administrative authority the disposition of this subject, requiring so much minutiæ of attention.

Now, the question is, Has the Postmaster General acted with reason and with fair public spirit in the exercise of the power which Congress has given him? If my judgment is of any value, I should say that he has, and that he is entitled to the commendation of his country for his services in that respect, and not to criticism from any quarter. [Applause.]

Now, what is the business, the function, of the parcel post? Clearly it is to move the potential traffic in parcels, in express matter. I mean by that any traffic that normally ought to move by express from consignor to consignee.

It is a mere truism to say that you ought to make the rate as low as you can in order to move that potential traffic; but it is just as much a truism to add that the Postmaster General would be guilty of a grave infraction of public duty if he were to make those rates lower than the cost of service. The parcel-post statute explicitly instructs him to make the rates adequate to pay the cost of service, and of course he would be under every impulse to make them as low as he can within the mandate of the law.

Now, what are the costs of service? Briefly speaking, you have two facts before you with reference to the cost of service. One of them is the payment of the railways for the service they render. When the House passed the parcel-post bill, its substitute for the Bourne bill, it included in it a provision that the Postmaster General could go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get the same rates of railway pay that the express companies have; that is, 50 per cent of the rate charged the express shipper, but unfortunately, in my opinion, that clause was stricken out in conference at the request of the Senate conferees. That leaves the Postmaster General helpless under the law. He has to take an old statute that was passed for the payment of the railways for carrying the mails, letters, and papers, and not naturally applicable to the parcel or express traffic; and finding what it costs to move a pound of letters, a pound of papers, and the like, for 200 miles the Postmaster General had to load his parcel rates at a cent a pound for each 200 miles to pay the railways for the movement of such parcels.

Let me repeat this: Now, the Post Office has found that under the present railway mail pay laws it costs 10 cents a ton-mile for the movement of mail matter, which includes parcels. That is equivalent to 1 cent a pound for every 200 miles the pound moves. When, therefore, he is making a rate for 100 pounds that is going to move 200 miles or within a zone of that range, he must add $1 to that rate for the mere purpose of paying the railways. He is using this old railway postal pay law, the only one he has, and he is doing the best he can under the circumstances.

Now, the express makes its own rates, and pays the railway one-half of the rate. But let us see what that means. It means various things. On the very short journey from here to Baltimore the express company charges 21 cents for a parcel of 5 pounds. That is its minimum rate. Half of that sum, or 10 cents, it pays to the railways. That 10 cents actually for a 40-mile journey amounts to a dollar a ton-mile, paid by the express company to the railway. But in that particular instance, it so happens that our old postal railway mail pay law works beautifully for the Government. The parcel-post rate is 7 cents for 5 pounds from here to Baltimore. We pay out of that 7 cents just 1 cent to the railroad under that law, or 9 cents less than the express companies have to pay on that particular shipment. That is one extreme, and I am using extremes for the purpose of illustrative clarity. Now, take the other extreme. Here is a package of 100 pounds moving from Baltimore to San Francisco. On that shipment the express rate is $10.50. The railroads get half of that, or about $5. That works out about 3 cents a ton-mile, or less than one-thirtieth of the ton-mile rate on the 5-pound express shipment from Washington to Baltimore.

Meanwhile on our postal 100-pound shipment, when the weight limit reaches that point, we shall have to pay under the present railway pay law $15 to the railways, or three times what the express company pays the railways in that instance. Of course a great noise can be made about these inconsistencies, but actually nobody is to blame. The railway mail pay law provides rates that were adapted to the movement of letters and papers, was passed years ago, and has its roots away back in the history of the subject. The rates of pay that the express companies give the railways have their roots away back in the history of express railway contracts. In any voluntary sense neither the Government, the railways, nor the express companies are to blame for these inconsistencies. You simply have a set of traffic conditions before you that requires readjustment to a new system. Now, obviously anybody can see that the thing that requires adjustment in the parcel-post rates is the payment the Government has to make to the railways for carrying these express parcels.

We have had a commission on that subject for a year and a half; and if they have not yet made a formal report, they have at least agreed upon the principle of the report. The Moon bill represents the principle of that report and is pending before this House, and will be reached for discussion to-morrow. Under that measure readjustment of postal railroad pay will be made, and then the Postmaster General will be able to make parcel-post rates, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on terms of payments to the railways of rates as reasonable as those of express companies.

There is no occasion for maligning the present conditions. As long as we have to pay the railways these relatively high rates on long distances and heavy weights, we can not have a long-distance or heavy-weight parcel post. Having to pay but very little on short distances and small weights, we have now, gentlemen of the House, a tremendously efficient little-parcel post. It means this in effect: We have got a 150-mile parcel post up to about 20 pounds, a 10-pound parcel post up to 300 miles, and we have a 5-pound parcel post good for the whole country.

When the railway mail pay conditions are adjusted we shall be able to make rates as good, at least, as the express companies for all weights and distances, and then I trust that the ideal with which I started out in this work, namely, a complete system of postal express, will be finally realized.

I am going to give you now some of the economic reasons that justify a complete postal-express system. A census of the parcel post taken for the Post Office Department in April last, the third census that has been taken—and let me say parenthetically that the Postmaster General and the Post Office Department know more about our parcel-post activities from these censuses than any other country in the world—this census shows that the flow of the traffic in April last was at the rate of about 250,000,000 parcels a year; that is, counting the parcels from 1 pound and up and ignoring the smaller weights as belonging to the old business. Two hundred and fifty million parcels mean two and one-half per capita. In Germany the parcel post amounts to a little over four per capita, but it is an older system and the rates have been worked out to better adjustment. In Switzerland the parcel post has actually attained a traffic of eight parcels per capita; and so we can take the experience of that country as indicating what we are likely to have here.

Mr. MANN. I did not quite catch the figures which the gentleman gave as to this country.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Two hundred and fifty million parcels per year, or about two and a half per capita. That is, if the two weeks of April traffic can be taken as indicative of the entire year.

One remarkable thing about the 250,000,000 parcels ought not to go without observation. About 75,000,000 of them have been taken from the express traffic, as nearly as we can judge. The other 175,000,000 parcels have been absolutely created by the parcel-post rates and increased weight limits which Mr. Burleson has inaugurated and to the present state of high efficiency which the parcel post has attained under his management. In short, there are 175,000,000 parcels moved annually in this country now that were penalized out of existence by the inefficient and ill-adapted express rates that formerly obtained, and for 40 years in this country, due to the neglect of our statesmanship, a magnificent service like that has been denied to the people.

Another thing that we learn about the parcel post is very interesting. None of us, I think, fully realize that even before we passed the parcel-post law our postal system was the greatest express agency on earth. In 1912 it moved some eighteen billions of express shipments. I mean the letter, paper, and average mail pieces. For every one of them is an express shipment in all its incidents, except the matter of weight. It requires a consignor and consignee; it requires a rate; and it requires locomotive service and all the acts of attention that express shipments receive, barring a few minor ones. Therefore when the Postal Establishment lifted the prohibitive conditions of weight limit and irrational rates and admitted to the mail parcels now moving it was but adding another shelf to its mammoth express establishment. Now, the effect of that is this: We are handling the parcel to-day, barring the cost of railway pay, at a cost of about 5 cents a piece from 3 pounds up. The 1 and 2 pound parcels cost less, because they do not have to go on the delivery wagon. The parcel averaging about 4 pounds and up we are handling for less than 5 cents. What is the express company's experience? Its experience is that its parcel is 33 pounds in average weight, and that it costs about 24 cents to handle it, barring the cost of railway pay. Now, that means if we add the collection service to our delivery service and such other facilities as the express companies give, we can handle the express parcel at less than 15 cents per parcel, while the express companies pay some 24 cents, or half their receipts. The express revenues, after they pay the railway this year, are about $78,000,000. There can be no question, I can say with the confidence of a student on this subject, that this mammoth Postal Establishment, as the greatest express agency on earth, can take the whole express business at rates that now obtain and clear from thirty to forty million dollars as an annual surplus by its superior economic efficiency in handling the parcels. We are entitled morally, as well as on economic grounds, to the whole express business. We have more than a million miles of rural route, and can thus give a service that the express companies can never give.

We can handle the shipments for one-half of the cost that the individually organized express companies can handle them. Meanwhile we are suffering a loss of some $35,000,000 a year on the rural routes, maintaining a million miles of express transportation structure, and on ethical grounds, besides the economic grounds, we are entitled to the whole express traffic, to make good on the rails the losses suffered in service to people on the rural routes of the country.

A word or two now about the Postmaster General and parcel-post development. I regret that I am not his spokesman upon this floor. I believe, however, that he has stated to the public that his purpose is, when conditions of railway pay are adjusted, to lift the weight limit to 100 pounds and then make rates that will move the traffic; that is, make rates that are at least as good as the rates made by the express companies of the country. In that event we shall practically have included in the postal establishment the whole express transportation system. I have a great deal of admiration for the Postmaster General, in one respect especially. The postal establishment employs 300,000 men. Its revenues will be something like $300,000,000 in the coming year. It is very rare that you get a Postmaster General who is not afraid of his great horse; afraid to make changes, afraid to make progress, afraid to try out those innovations that even the most absolute science and common sense would suggest. It is from that circumstance, that weakness of human nature, that we derive the inertia of big institutions, an inertia, however, that inheres in big private establishments with nearly the same force that it does in Government institutions. Be it said for Albert Burleson, the Postmaster General of the United States, that he is not afraid of his horse. Be it said for him, too, that he is not proceeding in this matter with the idea of bankrupting the Treasury of the United States. He has wiped out the postal deficit and secured a substantial surplus.

If the rates were made that he has been asked to make, he would bankrupt the Treasury, sure and clean. If a rate of 9 cents a pound at this moment were made from coast to coast on traffic that is costing us up to 15 cents a pound for railway pay alone, I need not tell you the consequence of folly like that.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. If it is true that the Government can do this service at less price than the express companies, why, then, should not the rates for the service be as low as the express company rates?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. They are as low.

Mr. HULINGS. In some places only.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. In the small parcels.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. But when you come to the longer distances and higher weights, the loading for railway pay, which is a cent a pound more for every 200 miles, makes that rate what you find it to be, much higher than the express rate——

Mr. HULINGS. What reason is there that the United States Government can not get its freight hauled at the same price that the express companies do?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Because we have a statute which provides a specific rate of pay to the railways for carrying the mails, and we are carrying the parcels under that statute. Judge MOON, of Tennessee, has a bill which will be up for consideration to-morrow, intending to meet those conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. And in any event it must be admitted that in order to adjust the rates so that they will be equitable we must take time.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. It takes time, plenty of time, and administrative talent as well.

With regard to the zones, you can have a thousand kinds of zones; they can be as numerous as the possibilities of the circle. Obviously one law of fact that the zones must respect is the matter of cost, and zones made without reference to the law of cost would be erroneously made and bring disaster upon the institution. You can draw any kind of circles on a piece of paper. A circle has something of occult suggestion in it, but the facts ought to write the law and determine the zones, and when the Interstate Commerce Commission had the question up with regard to express rates it did not draw any 9 or 10 circles at all, but it developed a rate structure, a lot more complex than that—a rate structure that was fitted to move the express traffic. If you have a jump of a cent a pound—that is, if you fashion your zones so large that your rate has a jump of a cent a pound with each zone—that means that on the hundred-pound parcels the rate has got a jump of $1 per zone. Between two stations 5 or 6 miles apart you might have a difference of a dollar in the rate on the parcel; and so the Interstate Commerce Commission in working out the express-rate structure looked at the facts of express commerce, and the result is that the rate on the hundred pounds under the express tariffs jumps only 5 cents at a time. I think perhaps that is too minute; that the hundred-pound parcel could stand a jump of 25 cents for changing distances; but, at all events, Members here should be satisfied that all of this immense minutiæ be worked out by the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that as a legislative body we are manifestly unfitted to encompass the vast detail essential to a sane result on that subject.

I thank the House for the patient attention it has given me. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 314. Joint resolution for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 11822. An act to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. ROTHERMEL (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, being Report No. 500, and Calendar No. 87.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman desires, but the report was presented to the House on April 4, 1914, and has been printed. The gentleman can not now present it to the House.

The SPEAKER. There is not anything to do about it that the Chair knows of. Of course if any gentleman desires to call it up for discussion, that is another question.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Then, Mr. Speaker, if there is nothing further to do, we will pass it.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 314. Joint resolution for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following House joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 314. Joint resolution for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15959. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 11822. An act to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va.;

H. R. 16345. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 17482. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6031. An act authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

REMOVAL OF THE BOTANIC GARDEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN (when the Committee on the Library was called). Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the bill H. R. 12796, which is Calendar No. 90, and put it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12796) to provide for the removal of the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park and for the transfer of its control to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This is a Union Calendar bill and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12796, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to know if the Clerk is now reading the bill for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is being read for the first time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12796) to provide for the removal of the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park and for its transfer to the control of the Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a national arboretum and botanical garden in Rock Creek Park the Botanic Garden is hereby transferred from the direction and control of the Joint Committee on the Library to the direction and control of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to remove to Rock Creek Park or otherwise dispose of the plants, structures, and all that pertains to the Botanic Garden in its present location, as he may deem proper.

SEC. 2. That so much of Rock Creek Park, not in excess of 400 acres, as may be needed for the purposes of an arboretum and botanic garden, not including the National Zoological Park, is hereby transferred from the joint direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army to the direction and control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library and the chairman of the House Committee on the Library, and the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall select and cause to be surveyed that portion of Rock Creek Park, not in excess of 400 acres, herein set apart for a botanic garden and arboretum.

SEC. 4. That all unexpended appropriations in relation to the Botanic Garden which shall be available at the time this act takes effect shall be available for expenditure for the transfer of the Botanic Garden to the new site and for other purposes incident to its removal and maintenance.

SEC. 5. That all laws or parts of laws not consistent with or that are repugnant to this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman in the House wants an explanation of the bill and its purposes, or any statement of the reasons why the committee reached the conclusion that it did in its report and recommendation, I will be happy, to the best of my ability, to give it. I have been away for some time——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I have only had a chance to hear the bill read, but I observe there are 400 acres mentioned as being the probable area that would be required in Rock Creek Park.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My recollection is it says not more than 400 acres.

Mr. MOORE. Is any particular 400 acres in view?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; Rock Creek Park has been investigated by a number of people connected with other branches of the Government, the Smithsonian Institution, the Department of Agriculture, and botanical experts from New York, Boston, and various places around, and the consensus of opinion seems to be that it should begin about one block west of Sixteenth Street, as I remember those streets, near the reservoir. There are open places now, where there are no trees, and with sufficient area to accommodate the plants, and there is an undulation which botanical experts say is desirable to have; running water, which they say we should have; elevation above the city, which is desirable; and a comparative remoteness from the gases that come from the burning of coal and things of that kind which are injurious to plants and plant life.

Mr. MOORE. This land already belongs to the District of Columbia?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; there are about 1,600 or 1,800 acres in Rock Creek Park. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, this will not interfere with the park, but it will contribute to its beauty rather than detract from it, and it is not intended, of course, to make a garden, rectangular walks, and vitrified pavements, and things of that kind. Only so much of that will be done as is necessary for the convenience and use of the people who visit the park.

Mr. MOORE. Is the purchase of new land for this purpose contemplated?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No.

Mr. MOORE. We have had that question before, the gentleman understands.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is nothing whatever of that sort contemplated.

Mr. MOORE. May I inquire for information as to the present jurisdiction in which the Botanic Garden finds itself?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is in the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on the Library, and they are relinquishing that prerogative.

Mr. MOORE. How are appropriations made?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Appropriations are made in one of the regular appropriation bills—the sundry civil appropriation, I think it is.

Mr. MOORE. To be visèed by the Joint Committee on the Library?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; we have nothing to do with that; we make no appropriations.

Mr. MOORE. The committee simply has jurisdiction over the present Botanic Garden?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Over legislation concerning it, and have executive control as it now exists. We appoint the superintendent and employees.

Mr. MOORE. The Committee on the Library desires to be relieved and have the responsibility placed on the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Joint Committee on the Library consists of patriots who are perfectly willing in the public interest to relinquish their control of the Botanic Garden.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to inquire as to the need of having any congressional representation on that board of managers. The gentleman is aware that the Department of Agriculture has agricultural experimental stations in the neighborhood of Washington, and will the gentleman favor us with the need of having the chairmen of the Committees on the Library of the Senate and House——

Mr. SLAYDEN. To what part of the bill does the gentleman from Wisconsin refer?

Mr. STAFFORD. To section 3.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, it is only for the purpose of selecting the site; that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any need, even for that purpose, to have congressional representation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The site could be selected, but it is desirable that Congress should have a voice in the selection of it rather than turn it absolutely and completely over to the executive officers. There is some little jealousy with regard to the privileges of Congress, and certainly no harm can come from it, and there should be some representation of this body.

Mr. STAFFORD. Another query I would like to propound is as to whether the gentleman has any acquaintance with national botanic gardens in foreign countries?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I can give the gentleman some information.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand it is proposed to increase to a large extent the present Botanic Garden.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I can give the gentleman the information he wants. The Royal Botanic Garden at Kew, London, contains 260 acres. I will give the gentleman the larger ones: The Dutch garden at Batavia, in Java—the Buitenzorg—has 336 acres. It belongs to the General Government. The Arnold Arboretum, in Boston, which is under control of the Harvard University and city of Boston, has 220 acres, the Bussey Farm, in Massachusetts, has 394 acres, and the New York Botanical Garden has 250 acres. If the gentleman desires, here is information given in detail as to practically all the botanical gardens in the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. Some of those the gentleman has mentioned are under the control of private institutions. The Bussey institution is under the control of Harvard University. I question whether there is any Government that has such a large space dedicated to this special work as that which we are now proposing to establish in Rock Creek Park.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think there are any that have so large an acreage.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was surprised at the report of the gentleman that it would not involve any larger expenditures than now exist for any botanical garden.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I said it made no provision for the purchase of land, but the gentleman must understand that if the Botanic Garden develops, if it expands in its work, if it becomes the educative institution which we think it possibly may come to be and desirable that it should become, naturally the moderate expenditures which have heretofore been made in connection with the work will be increased. Everybody knows that this so-called Botanic Garden down here is a travesty, really, on the name of botanical garden; and although there would be some increase in expenditures from time to time, yet they would not be great. The appropriations are small now, and they will continue small.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why was Rock Creek Park selected as a place to which this Botanic Garden was to be removed?

Mr. SLAYDEN. First, in the order of the reasons, I am going to mention that it involves no appropriation for ground. Secondly, it meets the conditions which the director in chief of the New York Botanical Garden, who is highly trained in the work and qualified to pass upon it as an expert, says we should have in order to have a desirable botanical garden.

Pardon me for saying in that connection to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the idea in fixing the area at so much of 400 acres as may be necessary, but not in excess of that amount, was with a view of the ultimate growth of the garden.

Now, if the gentleman will pardon me one moment, I will tell him what are the conditions that this expert says should obtain:

First, a reasonable accessibility from the city, either by existing transportation lines or lines to be established.

Now, there is a car line that goes to the park for one fare, and six tickets for 25 cents, that is one or two blocks removed. I am told that another line will go near there on the other side of the ground if this bill passes.

Second, a sufficient distance from the center of the city to insure reasonable freedom from smoke and the gases of combustion. This is especially important in case bituminous coals are likely to be used in any considerable amount in a city.

Third, diversified soil conditions and diversified exposures, an undulating district being more desirable than a plain. Certain portions of the area should have deep soil, while in other portions the soil should be light, and either a natural or an artificial water system should be included.

Now, there are running streams and springs on these grounds. It is easy to get these things.

The idea of this recommendation is to provide as many different natural conditions as possible. An area of natural woodland is very desirable as supplying a place for wild flowers which do not respond readily to cultivation.

You have the area of woodland there, and, operating an arboretum in connection with it, there is abundant opportunity for cultivation of trees.

Fourth. The practicability of supplying an irrigation system under pressure sufficient to reach the roofs of the highest greenhouses constructed, and to provide the possibility of hosing plantations in times of drought should be considered.

Now, I am not certain, as that is a question to be determined by level, that that condition obtains, although I am told it does.

Fifth. As to the acreage to be included, that would depend on the scope of the institution. If, as is certainly most desirable, a considerable number of trees are to be grown as an arboretum the area can not very well be too large, and I should think it might properly run up to 1,000 acres; if only a few trees are to be grown, the area required would naturally be very much less.

I will say to the gentleman from Kansas in that connection, Mr. Chairman, that in all human probability those officials who have charge of the park now, and who will have charge of the park hereafter, except in the event this bill passes, certainly would not object to having the waste and vacant places planted with desirable trees, trees that are ornamental, and will add to the beauty of the park, and that will be a part of the work of the Botanic Garden, although the land is to be controlled by another party.

In order, however, to give elasticity to the institution in the future I think it desirable to provide as much land as possible at the outset, even if it should not be completely developed for many years.

Some members of the committee were urged to recommend that a much larger area should be included.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What area do you contemplate now?

Mr. SLAYDEN. An area not in excess of 400 acres.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, I have been over Rock Creek Park. I think it is one of the greatest parks in the world; but it never occurred to me that it was a good place in which to make a botanical garden.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to my friend from Kansas that he differs from gentlemen who are engaged in botanical garden work in the home city of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER], and New York and other places.

Mr. THACHER. Will the gentleman from Kansas tell me, please, if he has been out in this part of the park which it is proposed to take for the Botanic Garden, namely, that section at the reservoir?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have been over Rock Creek Park many times.

Mr. THACHER. The gentleman knows as well as I do that in this end, near the Zoological Garden, it would not be a very suitable place for a botanical garden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Where would you pick out any 400 acres that would be suitable as the park is now?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield so as to clear up a misapprehension? While the bill says, "not to exceed 400 acres," of course, it is not intended to use 400 acres in a botanical garden, but to use the spaces that are not now covered by forest, in between those wooded pieces, for botanical garden purposes, without interfering with the wooded portions that are there now.

Mr. THACHER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is a larger area than would be actually cultivated as a botanical garden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And that would spoil Rock Creek Park as a park, would it not?

Mr. MANN. No; it would really be the making of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. THACHER. I do not think Members of Congress would for a moment want to spoil the beautiful conditions of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In my opinion you would have a conflict at once between the authorities governing the park, the District Commissioners, and the management of the garden.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You would if you occupied every available space.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; besides it will not occupy all the available space.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] referred to the available spaces being occupied.

Mr. MANN. I can explain that to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Botanic Garden, if located in Rock Creek Park, will be under the control of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] if there will be an opportunity to discuss this bill? He will not move the previous question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Not within a reasonable time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I will say that I had an opportunity recently, and availed myself of it, of examining the area of country which is contemplated to be used for this Botanic Garden in the park. It is the far western or northern end of the park, where there is practically no improvement now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. None.

Mr. SIMS. So that if it is to be improved as a park it would call for the expenditure of a large amount of money, whereas this expenditure for the Botanic Garden will save the expense that would otherwise be incurred if improved as a park, and would in no way conflict with the general park purposes and plans for Rock Creek Park, and there would be ample area, and the project wise and advisable.

Why should we move the garden now? The reason is, because it is located where there is not a sufficient area. Why not take that tract of 400 acres and use it when needed, and thus save the expense of improving it as a park that is not now improved, and of acquiring a similar area somewhere else that will have to be improved for park purposes at even greater expense?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; it would have to be improved for park purpose at much greater expense.

Mr. SIMS. That is already public property, and we do not have to condemn it. It is not private property, where men are paid $50 a day to swear as to what it is worth. [Laughter.] I think by all means this garden should be located upon public property that we already own, and I know of no place, so far as I am qualified to judge of such matters, that is better suited for such a purpose than the section of the country that the gentleman from Texas refers to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] a question. The gentleman from Tennessee is an authority on tracts of 400 acres around Rock Creek Park. I was interested to know if this proposition has anything to do with an immediate purchase of new ground?

Mr. SIMS. If we locate it on private property elsewhere, we will have to buy it. We are under no obligation to put this garden on private property when we have an abundance of public property, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, which will have to be improved as a park. But the improvement of the Botanic Garden would be made under this plan upon property that we now own.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Tennessee knows more about 400-acre tracts in the vicinity of Rock Creek Park than anybody else, and I was naturally interested in asking him the question.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman compliments me beyond my deserts. I looked over this land recently in company with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], and looked over that part of the park that has not yet been improved.

Mr. MOORE. I swear by the gentleman's opinion on such matters, and I simply wanted to get his statement. Is the gentleman satisfied that the 400-acre tract referred to in this report does not involve the purchase of new ground?

Mr. SIMS. It does not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have gone over the maps with the engineer commissioner and other gentlemen in connection with it. This land is in the northwest corner of the park, in practically an undeveloped part of it; and if the gentleman will pardon me just a second, I will say that the only argument that I ever heard used against this is that the artificial planting and artificial development of trees and shrubbery in connection with the Botanic Garden will interfere with the natural aspect of the park. There are areas and pieces of ground which are practically fitted for nothing except for the planting of trees and plants. It is not intended to cut down the trees, but to increase the number and variety of the trees, and to add to the beauty of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The 400-acre tract which it is contemplated to divert from park purposes for the Botanic Garden consists now of open spaces and partially open spaces and groups of trees. It is not expected, is it, that in the development of the Botanic Garden the groups of trees or little groves in those spaces will be changed, or that they will need to be changed, I will ask the gentleman?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is true.

Mr. TOWNER. The open spaces may be used as they may be needed for Botanic Garden purposes?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; for planting.

Mr. TOWNER. It will not change the general appearance of the park?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It will change it only for the better.

Mr. TOWNER. It will be a fuller development and really an extension of the uses of the park without changing the purposes?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Undoubtedly; and no restriction would be imposed on the public. It is only a contribution to the interest and beauty of the park and to the education of the people who may get into and enjoy the park.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if no other gentleman desires to speak——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman yields the floor, I would like to be recognized in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield the floor?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I had not yielded it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD. I thought the gentleman had.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much time does the gentleman want to use?

Mr. HOWARD. There are several gentlemen here who are opposed to the bill, and I think we would like to consume an hour. I do not think it is necessary for us to go off halfcocked about this matter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, before my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] takes the floor, I will ask him to yield to his colleague [Mr. TRIBBLE] in order that he may ask leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, owing to the fact that certain papers have misrepresented and misquoted my remarks on naval chaplains, created with rank of captain, I embrace this opportunity to correct such misrepresentations. I am quoted as saying that "this Nation pays from the Public Treasury for a chaplain to conduct what thousands of taxpayers believe to be an idolatrous worship." I am also quoted as saying certain churches have too many chaplains. I made no such statements, nor did I say anything to authorize such inference. My answer to these incorrect statements is the speech itself. These papers have clouded the issue by discussing church and denominational questions. It is not a church or denominational question. The real and only issue involves the very fundamental principle of constitutional liberty and one upon which all churches, Protestant and Catholic, should meet in perfect harmony. Having been misrepresented, I shall republish my remarks on chaplains for distribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to this bill with the present light before me. I am opposed to moving this garden at all.

I have been reliably informed that for years there has been a heated internal contest on in Washington between two sets of real estate owners—those who live out Massachusetts Avenue, who have been insistent upon this garden being removed there, and those who live out Sixteenth Street, who have been insistent upon its being moved out to that section of the city. Incidentally the removal of this garden to either section, with large appropriations by the Government yearly expended upon it, would naturally enhance the value of the real estate in these particular sections.

This particular garden is one of the few relics left that Congress has any control over whatever. The Library Committees of the House and Senate, as I understand it, have jurisdiction over this particular garden. The years of improvements and the money that has been expended upon it have greatly beautified it, but since the agitation has been so heated in the city of Washington for the removal of this garden for financial aggrandizement the appropriations to this particular garden have been neglected. Ever since the magnificent monument to the memory of Gen. Grant was begun to be erected down there it has been understood by people in Washington that some day in the very near future this botanical garden would be abandoned, and that then the Government of the United States would build a boulevard, and I understand they have been so bold as to draw plans and specifications for the Government expending the people's money on a 90-foot boulevard, with Grant's monument to be at one end of it and the Lincoln Memorial, now in process of construction, at the other end. In taking in the magnificent 90-foot boulevard these real estate owners of Washington will get their hands up to their elbows again in the Public Treasury in that the Government will purchase a whole lot of unprofitable real estate down here in the southwest, for which these real estate owners will ask this Government hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In addition to that it is proposed to go out here to magnificent Rock Creek Park and appropriate 400 acres of that park for a botanical garden. I presume the city of Washington is visited by more people in a year from the several States of the Union than any other five cities in the United States. People come here to look at our magnificent buildings, to see their Representatives and their Senators actually upon the job; and I am very sorry that during the heated season they have missed a great many of their Representatives and their Senators who have not been actually on the job. But these visitors come here. They are proud of this city. But when they come they want to see something. They want to see it within a given time. They want to see it in the least possible time, because it is expensive to stay here in Washington. So when they come——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Has the gentleman ever seen an intelligent visitor come to Washington and go to the present little old Botanic Garden, so called, at the foot of this hill, and come away from it without laughing at it?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think I have ever come into contact with anybody who has really visited the present Botanic Garden

Mr. THACHER. You never will.

Mr. HOWARD. And the reason they have never visited it is because of the fact, I am almost tempted to say, that I believe there has been premeditated action to detract from the present Botanic Garden as much as possible, for the purpose of using the very argument that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has just used as to why it should be moved.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman ever visit the Botanic Garden?

Mr. HOWARD. Very often. I come by there every morning that the sun shines. I came by it every morning last week.

Mr. MANN. On the street car?

Mr. HOWARD. No; not on the street car.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman proud of it when he visits it?

Mr. HOWARD. No; I am ashamed of it; and I am ashamed that adequate appropriations have not been made to make that one of the most beautiful spots in Washington.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says it has been allowed to run down. Did the gentleman visit it before it ran down?

Mr. HOWARD. I visited it in 1894-95. I was engaged in certain work in Washington. It was a beautiful place then. Old Mr. Smith was there then, younger than he was when he died by a considerable number of years, and he kept it up.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the Botanic Garden is in just as good a state now as it has been since I have been a Member of Congress, and that is now nearly 18 years.

Mr. HOWARD. The poor inanimate earth and plants are not responsible for that. You gentlemen who have suffered it to deteriorate through lack of adequate appropriations are responsible for that.

Mr. MANN. There is no way for spending much money down there.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I could spend several thousands of dollars in a few weeks, and it would be perfectly satisfactory to my constituents, and they would think it was the most beautiful garden they ever saw after it had been expended.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that in order to spend the money which is now appropriated they give a graft of plants to various Members of Congress. A discriminating Member of Congress will not use them ordinarily.

Mr. HOWARD. In the first place, they have not got a single house under glass down there that is respectable. Now, I know that adequate appropriations could have relieved that situation.

Mr. MANN. They have a number of houses under glass.

Mr. HOWARD. They have got enough acreage down there to spend as much money on as my constituents or the constituents of any other man on the floor of this House want spent upon a botanical garden.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you what the situation is here. I have been here some time. When I came here to Congress it was not the first time I had been in Washington. I used to live here years ago. I know something about Washington, and I know something about internal affairs here. The truth of the business is, as far as appropriations are concerned, that with the exception of a few parks the bulk of the appropriations that are being made by Congress to-day are going to Potomac Park and Rock Creek Park. Now, let us see. We will take Potomac Park. How many poor mothers in the city of Washington, who can not afford an automobile or a conveyance, can take a little teething baby that is burning up with fever in the heated season to Potomac Park to take advantage of the cool breezes and the shade of that park?

Nobody goes to that park who can not afford an automobile. It is too inaccessible to walk to it. Nobody goes to the park who does not know how to ride a jumping horse or play golf. What do the poor people of Washington benefit from Potomac Park? Not a penny. The night they had the fireworks down there thousands of poor people were there, and the rain came up, and those who had automobiles were able to pull down the curtains and raise the cover, and they did not get wet; but 50,000 poor devils like myself were drenched to the skin, because there was no public conveyance to take them home.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman say that they had fireworks down at Potomac Park?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; down near Washington Monument.

Mr. MANN. If 50,000 people were able to get there, could not the poor mother with her teething baby go there?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; if she was able to walk. After being up all night with the teething baby she feels like walking a mile and a half to get down there, or walking to the end of Rock Creek Park, which is about 5 miles from the center of Washington City. Now, I am looking out for myself. I am not blessed with a great deal of wealth; it is all I can do to make both ends meet, or "one end meat the other bread" as is a common expression in my country. Now, when you get this moved to Rock Creek Park, instead of going afoot to show my constituents the Botanic Gardens I shall be held up by the automobile owners in order to take my constituents out to the park and show them this beautiful Botanic Garden that you are fixing up to spend the people's money on.

Now, I am going to make a prediction, and it will be in the RECORD, and it will stay there—that this particular removal will cost the taxpayers of this country by the manipulation of real-estate transactions, by the exorbitant and foolish expenditures for the garden in Rock Creek Park, for the purchase of additional real estate for the 90-foot highway—it is going to cost the people $10,000,000 before they get through with it.

Mr. MANN. Make it a hundred millions.

Mr. HOWARD. If I made such rash statements as the gentleman from Illinois is in the habit of making, I would make it two hundred millions, but I want to be conservative. That is what I predict it will cost. Now, what are you going to do at Rock Creek Park?

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I always yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. I want to get back to the unfortunate mother with the teething baby. I know the gentleman is familiar with mothers and babies——

Mr. HOWARD. I am. I have walked a thousand miles with two of my babies in the nighttime.

Mr. MOORE. And I have walked 5,000 miles; so I am able to compliment the gentleman on his assiduity.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania shows that he has walked more miles than I have. He looks tired yet.

Mr. MOORE. But he is not. Now, how many mothers with teething babies go to the Botanic Garden to get the cooling breezes on an afternoon?

Mr. HOWARD. I was not referring to the Botanic Garden as being a place to go to to get the cooling breezes.

Mr. MOORE. Would that not be a convenient place for mothers with teething babies?

Mr. HOWARD. It would be for the poor foreigners in that section of the city, who live in the crowded sections around Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. MOORE. Do they use the Botanic Garden?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; they go over there—those who want to. The difference between the Botanic Garden and Rock Creek Park is that the poor folks can go to the present one, and they never can go to Rock Creek Park, unless they walk 5 miles.

Mr. MOORE. Leaving out Atlanta, which of course is the most beautiful place——

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; we have located the gateposts of the Garden of Eden in the city of Atlanta.

Mr. MOORE. Leaving out Atlanta, which is the apple of the gentleman's eye, is it not a fact that Washington is possessed of more parks which answer for breathing places than any place in the country?

Mr. HOWARD. I agree with the gentleman, and that is the reason that we ought to keep this Botanic Garden. It is the very place for it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows very well that with an expenditure of a few thousand dollars on the Botanic Garden you can make it the most beautiful spot of its size in Washington. It ought to be converted into a real botanic garden, not for cultivation of the great, big trees such as my friend from Illinois likes to see spreading all over the country, to make beautiful shade, but a place for rare plants from the Tropics, rare shrubbery from all over the country, so that when people come here we can have a man in charge that could go down and pronounce the name half a foot long and show them a little persimmon-like bush with red leaves and tell them that it came from Ceylon, and let them open their eyes and wonder at the bright flowers and go away and talk about it. Now, you are going to put it out where nobody can enjoy it but Washingtonians.

Mr. Chairman, it does look like this Congress has done enough for these people here. It looks like you never can satisfy them. They are always wanting something else; they are always wanting more of the people's money expended on their plots to raid the Treasury. They always want something from Congress, and now they want to take this poor little old Botanic Garden away from us and move it out here into Rock Creek and spend piles of money on it. It is the only place that I know of that we have got left where we can go down and feel at home near the Capitol and show our people. I hope the bill will not pass, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman understand that with the removal of the Botanic Gardens, this little space at the foot of the hill, it is proposed to do away with that iron fence and brick wall?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, yes; that was built when they had goats and cows running on the streets of Washington. They have a stock law here now, I understand.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman understood that, and did the gentleman understand that it was proposed to make that into a little square, to be called Union Square, with seats in it, and so forth, so that these women and children for whom the gentleman seems to have such tender solicitude could go there at any time they pleased, night or day, which is not the case now with the Botanic Gardens, which are closed up usually at 6 o'clock in the evening, and the mothers with the teething children barred out absolutely? Moreover, there is no place for them to sit down there now. It is a garden, and they are not allowed to walk on the grass, not allowed to use it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope my friend will ask me that question that he started out to ask.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman understand that?

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that there are about 100 acres right across a 50-foot street that is already in the park, with plenty of seats in that space, and little squirrels to feed peanuts to, and robins to sing in the trees and fly down occasionally and catch a worm, and once in a while a little English sparrow to let out a discordant note. All of these things are right in the park now.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 16 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill for several reasons. In the first place, it is too important a matter for this House to pass upon without any more consideration than can be given to it at this time. In the second place, this bill provides for establishing a national arboretum and botanical garden in Rock Creek Park. That park has been set aside for park purposes, and no portion of it has been set aside for botanical-garden purposes, and should not be. The bill undertakes to transfer the situs of this Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park without any provision for appropriations to carry it on, without a single solitary dollar to pay for the transfer of the Government property, to pay for clearing the land, or to pay for establishing the necessary appurtenances to a botanic garden. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this garden should be transferred to that section, into absolutely new land, where the land is sour, where it necessarily has got to be treated, and treated at great expense, before the shrubs or plants and flowers and trees will grow as they ought to grow, it is going to cost this Government much more than my friend from Georgia stated to ever establish a real botanical garden at that place. In addition to that, as he has stated, it is some 3 or 4 miles from the center of this city. It is not accessible by the street railways, and the poor people of the city of Washington and the tourists who come here can only see it at an enormous expense, which they are either unable or unwilling to undergo.

Mr. Chairman, the Government owns land within a stone's throw of this Capitol, almost, 150 acres, beautiful land, land which has been cultivated, which is ready now to receive the plants, the shrubs, and the flowers, with houses constructed upon it sufficient to answer the purpose of a residence for the superintendent and the laborers, land which is being devoted to nothing at all except a disgraceful workhouse, which is a disgrace to the Capital City of the United States. One hundred and fifty acres—lying broadside of the Eastern Branch—a beautiful place. It can be made much more beautiful and is ready right this minute for the reception of all of the plants and all of the shrubs and all of the flowers contained in the Botanic Gardens. The street cars run within one block of this property. It is within easy walking distance of the Capitol. The tourist or the poor citizen of this District who desires to avail himself of the privilege of visiting this garden can either walk there or at a fare of 4 cents can ride there upon the street cars and have the benefit of it. But if you put this out at Rock Creek Park, then no man can take advantage of it unless he belongs to that wealthy class of the District of Columbia, the real estate gang, who have absolutely dominated every single, solitary public improvement in this city for years. They are the people, and the only people, who will get the benefit of this botanic garden if it is put in Rock Creek Park.

And I want to say again, Mr. Chairman, that this is the only time that I know anything about where Congress has ever had the privilege of locating in this city a single, solitary public improvement. We have delegated it to the Fine Arts Commission. They located the Lincoln Memorial. They located every improvement, and for the first time since I have been a Member of this body—nearly 10 years—Congress has now an opportunity to assert its own views and locate one public improvement in the city of Washington. We ought to have time to consider it. It is an important matter. It is a matter that means a great deal to my State, a great deal to all of the States of this Union, because the rarest plants of all the world are collected, propagated, and tested at this Botanic Garden. Nobody has had an opportunity to examine this bill; nobody has had an opportunity to consider it. No provision is made for the maintenance of this Botanic Garden at all under this bill—not a dollar—and I want to warn gentlemen that when they enter upon this enterprise it means the expenditure of millions of dollars if you intend to have a botanical garden commensurate with the reputation, the honor, and standing of this Republic. I want one which will be a credit to the city and a credit to the Nation. We have plenty of land upon which to put it. Down near the Agricultural Department there is plenty of land belonging to the Government, ripe and ready to receive this institution. We can put it there. Why go out to the Rock Creek Park to do it? Why put it beyond the reach of the average citizen of the District and the country?

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the botanical interests of this country, in behalf of the poor people of this District and the poor people all over the land who visit this city, I protest against creating a garden for the sole benefit of the wealthy. Let us put it upon the land we own, that is ready to receive it, and where any man in all the country, no matter how poor he may be, can get the full benefit of it. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used nine minutes.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], in his most interesting remarks, made two statements which I wish to correct. First of all he referred to this land in Rock Creek Park as being very sour. I wish to say that that land there is just as fertile and just as sweet as the speech of my distinguished friend from Florida. Furthermore, he stated that this land was miles away, and that the poor people, to whom my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] referred, could not get there, would not have the opportunity to get out there, because they would need automobiles. Heavens alive, they can get six tickets for a quarter. Can not these people afford to pay 4 cents to go out to the park and visit the Botanic Garden? I do not think that is a big price to pay.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THACHER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not contemplated to establish this park in the extreme northern——

Mr. THACHER. The northwestern end.

Mr. HOWARD. And will not that extreme northern end of Rock Creek Park be over a mile from the street car line?

Mr. THACHER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it will be a block.

Mr. HOWARD. On what line?

Mr. THACHER. The Piney Branch cars and other lines which go to the end of Fourteenth Street, all for one fare. I went out there a few nights ago by trolley. If the gentlemen would give more time to an examination of the exact location and means of transit to the proposed Botanic Garden, and the distinguished gentleman from Georgia put a little more facts into his speech and a little less fancy and a little less talk of teething mothers——

Mr. HOWARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I will not be misquoted. I said nothing about teething mothers.

Mr. THACHER. I apologize to the fathers and mothers of Georgia and teething children. You can take a car which goes out and stops at the circle at the end of Fourteenth Street, which is about a block from the reservoir in the northwestern end of Rock Creek Park. Near the reservoir is splendid farming land—old farming land that is not sour. I do not believe our friend from Florida is a farmer. I am president of an agricultural society and I know something about agriculture, and the land is not sour, but is fertile.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman says he is president of an agricultural society?

Mr. THACHER. I am, and I am a member of the grange.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I belong to the farmers, not to agriculturists.

Mr. THACHER. I belong to the grange——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Agriculturists. I understand, live in towns; farmers work the land out in the country.

Mr. THACHER. The gentleman is trying to throw me off my track. The Barnstable County Agricultural Society, of which I have the honor to be president, will hold the seventy-first annual cattle fair in a few weeks, and I give a cordial invitation to the distinguished gentleman from Florida to visit our fair and see what splendid farmers we raise on Cape Cod and what fine crops these farmers produce. They are some "pumpkins." The eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Georgia said that the visitors to Washington did not visit the present Botanic Garden. I will tell him why; because they would rather go and hear the gentleman from Georgia speak, and when they do this, they do not care about going to any botanic gardens. The gentleman said he was ashamed of our present Botanic Garden. I will tell him what is the trouble with our Botanic Garden. It is in the wrong site. It suffers from the fact of being so near the Capitol, for sometimes there is a hot current of air from the Capitol which damages the flowers and blossoms.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THACHER. I will.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman, getting away from the flowers and speeches that have been made here in this debate——

Mr. THACHER. I apologize for the flowers.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And ask if anybody on the committee of the distinguished gentleman has investigated, so as to have any idea as to how much it will cost to transfer this garden to the point indicated in this bill? The statement has been made by the gentleman from Georgia that it is estimated about $10,000,000.

Mr. THACHER. Five to ten million; but the gentleman was entirely incorrect.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is there to transfer; nothing but a few boxes of glass?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Are they going to put them in the woods?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not the remotest idea what they will move.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit me to reply to the question of the gentleman from North Carolina, which is pertinent and proper, I will say that it is the opinion of botanists and of the scientists in the Department of Agriculture and in the Smithsonian—and there was doubt for some time in the minds of the committee to which of those two branches of the Government this thing should be transferred—that there is comparatively little of value down there. It will cost but a trifle to remove it. Some plants are almost valueless; and here is a copy of a letter from Dr. Galloway, for many years connected with the Department of Agriculture and known to everyone here, and who has, I am told, recently taken a position with Cornell in New York, in which he says:

> As the department is already provided with many experts capable of aiding in the development of the arboretum and garden along the lines indicated, the expense for future development would not be great. We believe that for the next 8 or 10 years it would not be necessary to increase the existing appropriation for the Botanic Garden, which I understand now amounts to approximately $30,000 annually.

I have not yet been able to understand how the gentleman from Georgia arrived at these stupendous figures.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I would like to ask the gentleman if his committee has made any calculation as to the cost of clearing that land——

Mr. SLAYDEN. It will not have to be cleared.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And putting it in shape for cultivation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Florida, with the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], that these open places were formerly fields.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not talking about the open places.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not intended to be cleared.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is it not covered with oak and hickory?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that most of it is as clear as this floor.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The bill mentions 400 acres. Of course there is a small part of the 400 acres that would be used for the cultivation of plants?

Mr. THACHER. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that they put that as the maximum amount. They will not need anything like that amount. I would say that the members of the Committee on the Library have examined this proposed site carefully, and other gentlemen connected with the Government departments, to whom the chairman of our committee [Mr. SLAYDEN] has referred, have done the same. The expense of transporting the limited number of plants, few hothouses, and cold beds now in the Botanic Garden to the new site should not be great. Only a few acres would probably be utilized at first. This garden would start in a small way, and then if the Congress later on wishes to make further appropriations, it is up to them. We are not embarking on any wild scheme here of five or ten million dollars. To hear some of the gentlemen talking about these big projects, you would think we were going to start a botanic garden for all the world.

Go down here and look at the Botanic Garden this afternoon. It was started here as the result of the Wilkes expedition in 1852, and it has been there ever since. For many years Mr. Smith was at the head of the garden, and he died. The present fence was ordered to be removed by Congress two years ago, because you all know the Grant Memorial is going to be finished before long. There will be no room——

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THACHER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman contend that the cost will be a mere bagatelle, when you will have to arrange buildings and pay for landscaping and houses for employees and all that expense? Does the gentleman contend that the Government of the United States is going to make miserly appropriations? Does not the gentleman know that they not only make liberal but extravagant appropriations for this business?

Mr. THACHER. We do not ask for a cent here. We believe there is money enough in the ordinary appropriations for the Botanic Garden to take care of the moving.

Mr. HOWARD. The Government owns the 400 acres?

Mr. THACHER. They belong to the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. In fee?

Mr. THACHER. Yes. Now, I want to get back to the Botanic Garden that exists to-day.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will permit, this land down here now occupied by the Botanic Garden, if the garden is removed, will be of immense value. The Government can use it for public buildings, instead of going around and tearing down buildings, as they did between here and the station?

Mr. THACHER. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I suppose the gentleman has seen this beautiful body of land lying east of the railroad, in Potomac Park, down near the War College?

Mr. THACHER. Down in Potomac Park.

Mr. WEBB. The body of land I speak of is lying east of the railroad, and has recently been skirted by this new road down to the point looking across at the War College. I will ask the gentlemen if they have ever considered the advisability of establishing that botanical garden on that 100 or more acres of land?

Mr. THACHER. I will come to that in a moment. Now, the Botanic Garden will have to be moved soon from its present site. The gentleman from Georgia referred to the goats, and said that the fence was built for them. I want to say last October marauders went in there and the old superintendent in charge chased the boys, and I am sorry to say that as a result he died from heart disease. He was a faithful employee of the Government. The fence is needed for protection to the plants and shrubs. At night the garden is closed.

Now, the Botanic Garden has to be moved. Where will you move it? Down to Potomac Park, if you wish. Now, as to the condition at Potomac Park; the land is low and soggy and close to the river there, with no diversity of soil and no diversity of height at all; no hills, but all flat land. It is not accessible and has no trees to speak of. It is some distance to it. It can be reached only in a roundabout way by the cars. I have considered this site carefully.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman tell me what an arboretum is?

Mr. THACHER. I can tell you. Arbor is from the Latin, and means a tree.

Mr. WEBB. West of the park I speak of there are 5,000 little trees cultivated as a nursery, and if the land west of the railroad is good for a nursery is it not good for an arboretum?

Mr. THACHER. When the trees get to be of any size, the teething babies mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia will be aged and infirm.

The Botanic Garden will have to be moved. The Potomac Park would not seem a suitable place. Shall the Government acquire land at considerable expense or go out to Rock Creek Park? A statement has been made here as to automobiles. You can go out there on the street cars.

The Fourteenth Street line stops one block from the reservoir, and there are fine farming fields out there, and if you continue to the northwestern portion there you will find fertile fields and streams and a splendid place for an arboretum. We are not planning any great arboretum. We are planning to acquire this land without expense, and it is up to Congress. I trust this bill will not be smothered by delay or by arguments about spending $5,000,000, and talk of teething babies and for automobiles. Let us get down to brass tacks and onto the ground floor.

In closing I want to say that two of the members of our committee are not here. One distinguished member has just returned, I understand, from an interesting sea trip abroad, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]; but all of the members have been out there and have spent a lot of time, and so have other distinguished Members of the House who are fond of flowers, and they all believe this is going to be a splendid thing. So we trust that the House will understand this bill and vote intelligently and support this good measure.

I yield back my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman to say the committee is unanimous for the removal?

Mr. THACHER. We have been so.

Mr. PAYNE. None of the committee is interested in the present superintendent?

Mr. THACHER. I have no personal interest beyond the fact that I want to see a good man there.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that he is opposed to the removal.

Mr. THACHER. I can not say. I want to see a good man there. I have no personal interest in it.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that had something to do with the opposition to the project.

Mr. THACHER. I do not want to look for any "negro in the woodpile."

Mr. PAYNE. I thank the gentleman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SLAYDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6031) authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 4969. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5501. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5899. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

REMOVAL OF BOTANIC GARDEN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that I have no time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has time left. He is not using it at this time.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to use time or yield?

Mr. HOWARD. No; I just wanted to understand if I had some time. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my father was a nurseryman and my mother a great lover of flowers and I was raised in a nursery and a flower garden in Illinois, although my parents afterwards removed to Florida, to the district represented, I think, by the distinguished gentleman, Mr. CLARK. I believe it was his district. They had a nursery and a flower garden down there of a somewhat different sort, so that all my life I have been interested in gardening, and for years I have taken my recreation in a garden. Other gentlemen go fishing, or hunting, or play golf, or travel, or go to the seashore, or the woods. I go to the woods when I can. But habitually I go to a garden which I have now in Chicago, and when I get a chance I will soon go home and get hidden in a garden where nobody can find me, actually working with the plants.

Ever since I have been in Washington I have taken a great interest in the Botanic Garden here. I was a very intimate friend of Mr. Smith when he was alive and of Mr. Reynolds when he was alive. I have a better garden in Chicago myself, maintained at very small expense—because I can not afford much—than the Botanic Garden is down here. The Botanic Garden in its inception used to gather up plants from different parts of the world and distribute them through the congressional distribution and otherwise, and hence it was of value and did great service in those days. But for years it has amounted to nothing in that line. The plants that are now gathered from other parts of the world are gathered by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will it interrupt my friend if I ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In that period of the greatest usefulness of the garden, when they were gathering plants from all over the world and distributing them, were the appropriations greater or less than now, or were they about the same as they are now?

Mr. MANN. They were about the same. There never were large appropriations for the Botanic Garden, and probably there will not be any necessity for large appropriations.

The Department of Agriculture now maintains all the time one or two men—sometimes more—picking up plants of different sorts, largely in China and Manchuria and in the eastern countries, although not entirely there. It is not difficult. In my little garden I have planted seed which came from the higher mountains of Africa side by side with seed which came from the Arctic region. There is no great difficulty about it. But the Agricultural Department is maintaining somebody, not entirely for the purpose of getting plants that are useful, but also for getting plants which are ornamental and beautiful. The Botanic Garden naturally does not deal so much with plants which are useful as it does with plants which are ornamental, although if it should be turned in to the Department of Agriculture it may deal with trees which are both useful and ornamental.

Now, the present Botanic Garden is a joke. There is not an English island in the Caribbean Sea that does not itself possess a botanic garden that would make an American citizen who looks at this Botanic Garden down here blush for shame, both as to beauty and use. There is not a nation in the world, I think, civilized or uncivilized, that does not maintain a botanic garden of greater beauty and greater use than the Botanic Garden down here.

I admit that this Botanic Garden has some use. It furnishes each Member of Congress each spring with a box of plants. I believe that within the last two or three years they have endeavored to get a few of the newer kinds of lilacs, philadelphus, and some other plants. Up to a few years ago the varieties which they had and which they furnished to Members of Congress, to be sent out, were in the main varieties which I saw in my mother's garden when I was a boy, 50 years ago or 40 years ago [laughter]——

Mr. THACHER. Say 30.

Mr. MANN. There has been a great change and development of these plants. We are all familiar with ordinary lilacs, for instance, which I have mentioned, but not many of us are familiar with new varieties of double lilacs in great bunches a foot in diameter; and yet wherever you find good gardens now you will find something of that sort, and they are no more difficult, in the main, to propagate by artificial propagation—which is the method—than the old kind. They are beginning to get a few of these down here for your distribution and mine, and for years I have, in the main, taken a box of plants from the Botanic Garden in the spring, defining what I wanted; but I never got a set yet that I did not have better of the same kind in my own garden. They were out of date.

Now, no one wanted to disturb the Botanic Garden while old Mr. Smith was its superintendent. He had the respect, the affection, and the veneration of Members of Congress for, I suppose, 50 years and more. He was very "set" in his ways at the end, when he was over 80 years of age. No one felt like interfering with the Botanic Garden while Mr. Smith was alive, but everyone who had studied the subject at all realized that when he passed away this Botanic Garden down here would pass away with him. Then they located the Grant Monument down here, to which I was opposed. But it was located there. The fence has got to be torn down. That is perfectly evident. There is nothing in the Botanic Garden down here—in the main garden—except a few trees and shrubs, some of them good kinds, and rather valuable plants.

The propagating gardens are over on the other side of the street to the south, where they have a good many plants which they are gathering together for the congressional distribution. They are no longer engaged in sending out, even in the congressional distribution, new kinds of plants. They say they can not afford it. They have not the means nor the room for much increase in the way of propagation. They have to clean up nearly everything they have every year.

Now it is to be moved. It being a fad of mine, without any special reason otherwise, I have been working for a long time on the subject as to where the garden should go. I went with the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds down to the lower end of the Potomac Park extension. Many people think that the Botanic Garden might go there, and the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds thinks that it might go there, and that they might have charge of it.

I believe the present superintendent of the Botanic Garden thinks it might go over where the workhouse used to be. Various people have their opinions as to where it should go. Now, to me it seems perfectly evident that if the Botanic Garden is to be maintained at all it can be maintained with less expense and greater efficiency under the Agricultural Department than in any other way. When the Botanic Garden was first organized there was no Agricultural Department, and when it engaged in the distribution of plants the Agricultural Department had nothing of the sort and did no work of that kind.

The Agricultural Department and the Bureau of Plant Industry are not only engaged in importing plants from abroad, but they are engaged in developing by artificial propagation, and by other means, plants in the United States, making a great improvement. They get trees from Manchuria or China, which it is supposed may at some time be useful. Well, they have no place now where they can plant those trees under their own supervision unless they send them to one of the gardens which they maintain in the warmer climates. They have no place in a climate like this where they can plant a tree, which may not mature for 30, 40, 50, 60, or 70 years, where they have it under their eye and can watch it at all. Of course they can give the trees away, as they do, to private people, and more or less benefit results from that.

They can handle this with practically little expense. Dr. Galloway called together the heads of the divisions in the Department of Agriculture and had them make a search of Washington, at the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], chairman of the Library Committee, and they arrived at the conclusion that they could take the vacant spaces in the north 400 acres in Rock Creek Park, and with very little expense gradually develop a botanic garden there by planting these things which they accumulate from different places throughout the world, and by moving those few things in the present Botanic Garden which are worth saving, that in this way they could develop a botanic garden which would be useful and ornamental, at very little expense.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Just at this particular point, because of the location he has mentioned in connection with the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER] as to the accessibility by street car of this particular place, I know that the gentleman who is now addressing the House is familiar with the geography of that particular district. How far is that from any street-car connection at the present time?

Mr. MANN. The outer edge of the park there is, I think, about two blocks away.

Mr. SIMS. The Fourteenth Street car goes right by there.

Mr. MANN. That is the outer edge of the park. Now, do not make any mistake. A botanic garden which is of any value at all will not be a place of popular resort. The finest botanic garden in America is at Boston. It is not a place of popular resort. The next finest, I think, is at St. Louis. It is not a place of popular resort. People who are interested in these things, people who are interested in plants, whether they be florists, nurserymen, housewives, or the owners of home gardens, when they come to a place where there is a botanic garden will go to see it. I never think of going to a town that has a botanic garden without going to it. That is because I want to go there. I never find very many other people there. It is not so much to have a place of popular resort as it is to have some place where the Government has these things that students can go and examine and at the same time develop by experience work which is of benefit to the country at large. All of that can be done at Rock Creek Park. It can be done at very little expense. One gentleman a while ago said that the soil out there was sour. Well, I will forgive my friend from Florida [Mr. CLARK] for saying that. I own some Florida land and have for a great many years. I know that when you turn over muck land in Florida it is so sour that it would make vinegar taste sweet. It does take time there, but this land up here has been cultivated. It is not sour. It is ready for use at any time to the extent that it will be used.

Now, do not imagine that if a bill like this passes there is going to be any great expense about it now. I do not think there will ever be any great expense. There is very little to move out of the present Botanic Garden that is worth taking. There are some glasshouses down here where they maintain a few plants that they keep inside in the wintertime and move out some of them in the summer time, but nobody ever looks at them. I do not suppose that the glasshouses, the hothouse, or the propagating houses are of any great value, but they can be moved without much additional expense if necessary. Another thing, we have propagating gardens now connected with the Department of Agriculture, over at Fourteenth and B Streets. They can do most of the propagating that will be required in the Botanic Garden without the expense that is now incurred by propagating down here.

Now, I do not know what will happen to the congressional distribution. That is a matter for Congress to determine. If Congress provides in the future, as it has for many years in the past, for the distribution of these plants, we will in the future, at least, get some plants that we are not ashamed to send to our constituents, or that if sent to a discerning constituent will be planted. Each of us every year gets a package of seed in a little yellow envelop from the Botanic Garden. I will defy anyone here to say that he has ever planted any of them or had any of them grow. I will take that back. Some of the flower seeds will grow. But for a number of years they have sent out tree seeds from the Botanic Garden, and those tree seeds having remained at the Botanic Garden all winter in the warm room are sent out to be planted in the spring, and those tree seeds never grow unless they are planted shortly after they are collected in the fall. Well, you have to learn that by experience, and, of course, if you send a package of these seeds to your constituent and he sows the seeds and they do not grow, he probably thinks it is his fault in not knowing how to plant the seeds, or if he does not, you tell him so. But we can make an effective, efficient Botanic Garden in this way. Shall we do it? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. I had before me the bill relocating the Botanic Garden. I watched closely for a discussion of the provision removing the Botanic Garden from the present location to Rock Creek Park, as provided in the bill. I was quite interested, however, in the historical reminiscences of the gentleman from Illinois. Like the gentleman from Illinois I can not keep out of the soil myself. He takes his exercise in the soil; so do I. I neither play golf, go to the mountains, nor to the seashore, but every afternoon along about half past 5 I go to a little piece of ground where there is a garden and I work in it and get my exercise in that way. I had hoped when I started that I could also reduce the cost of living. I have succeeded in getting exercise. But neither my recreation nor that of the gentleman from Illinois is a reason for or against moving the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park.

Since I have been in Congress I have taken an interest in beautifying Washington. There has not been an effort made since I have been a Member that has had for its object making Washington a more beautiful and attractive place within reasonable bounds that I have not supported. I have been in favor of enlarging Rock Creek Park, and have been moved to that position by the arguments in favor of making it a larger park, so that it would be available at all times to all conditions of people in Washington and those who might come here.

There is a proper effort still made that Rock Creek Park be enlarged for park purposes by a suitable connection with Potomac Park. Those who are in favor of enlarging Rock Creek Park are interested in making Washington one of the most beautiful capitals in the world and making Rock Creek Park the greatest park in the world. I sympathize with their efforts. I am opposed to this bill because it takes from Rock Creek Park about 400 acres for park purposes and puts it under the Committee on the Library, or some other committee, or under the Agricultural Department to be used as a botanic garden.

Now it is stated by the gentleman from Illinois, and I believe by the gentleman from Texas and by others, that botanic gardens are not maintained for the ordinary visitor who wants to go to a park; that they are not provided with seats and places for mothers with teething babies. Rock Creek Park was established by Congress for park purposes. The 400 acres now contemplated for a botanic garden in this bill were purchased for the extension of Rock Creek Park, and the arguments that were made in support of that purchase were for an enlarged park for greater Washington. It was not dreamed that a subsequent Congress, or any committee of this House interested in Washington, interested in beautifying it and maintaining parks suitable for the Capital of a great Nation, would report favorably on a bill taking 400 acres out of that and setting it apart as a botanic garden and depriving the public of its use for park purposes. That is what this bill does.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that a botanic garden need in any way to interfere with the park?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am moved by the arguments made by the gentleman from Illinois when he was on the floor to say that it would. It will be used for a botanic garden, and a botanic garden, according to the gentleman from Illinois, is not a park and is not used for a park.

Mr. MANN. All the botanic gardens I have seen were used in the nature of parks, but it may be that I am mistaken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Illinois is usually very happy in his forceful manner of making clear statements, and I think I am not mistaken in saying that within 30 minutes he has said on this floor that botanic gardens were not parks, and that people did not go to botanic gardens as parks; that lovers of trees and shrubs and flowers went to botanic gardens, but people who wanted to lounge in a park went to a park.

Mr. MANN. I said that they were not places of great popular resort. I can not understand why a botanic garden should interfere with the park features now maintained in Rock Creek Park or that should be maintained, except that it would not allow playgrounds where the garden itself is. In other respects it would not interfere at all with the roads or with any of the other park aspects. That is my understanding or I would not be in favor of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My understanding is that the Botanic Garden is under the control of somebody in charge of that garden. I understand that the park commissioner would like to have the garden under his control.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes. He could not have control of that Botanic Garden without having control of the park.

Mr. MANN. No; it is not intended that he shall have control of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Whoever has control of the Botanic Garden will have exclusive control of that portion of the ground covered by the Botanic Garden.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Rock Creek Park will not be under the control of that party, whoever he may be, but the Botanic Garden will be under the control of some one else.

Mr. MANN. The Zoo is in Rock Creek Park, is it not? If the gentleman did not see a fence between them, could he tell when he went from Rock Creek Park into the Zoo?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, it is right there.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is right there; but it is not under the same management.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Probably not.

Mr. MANN. Rock Creek Park is controlled by one set of officials and the Zoo by another, but both having some common sense it is a park in both cases, and this would be the same way. You could not tell when you got out of one and into the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But the Botanic Garden, such as is advocated by the gentleman from Illinois and by others, will make or that portion of Rock Creek Park a garden that will be under the exclusive control of the gardener or man in charge of the botanic gardens, and it would cease to be a park for park purposes. The people go to the Zoo. It is one of the most popular parts of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks, if this garden were put inside the park and made a part of the park, it would be possible for the superintendent of the garden to allow the public generally to stroll through the garden and use it as they do a public park? Could he protect the plants, the flowers, and all that sort of thing, if the public had absolutely free access to it, the same as to a public park?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think so.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. THACHER. Is the gentleman aware that in Boston the Arnold Arboretum, containing about 700 acres, one of the best arboretums in the world, is contiguous to the Boston public park, and at one time formed a part of the park; and is he aware that they have no trouble at all with the people going through there and picking flowers?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what is the difference between an arboretum and a botanic garden.

Mr. THACHER. A distinguished gentleman asked me that question about an hour ago. I told him that the word "arboretum" comes from the Latin word "arbor," meaning a tree. You expect to find trees throughout an arboretum. It is given to the growth of trees, and a botanic garden may contain roses and lilacs and other kinds of flowers. The distinction is that in one you find plants and in the other trees, though you may find both; but that is the distinction.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman's arboretum to get me too far away from my line of thought.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. After I have answered the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have been through the arboretum in Boston. It is a beautiful place, and they have beautiful trees there, but it is as different from my idea of what a botanic garden is as an ordinary vegetable garden is from a botanic garden. There is no danger of destruction of trees if pedestrians will keep in the paths or walks, and there are no "Do-not-touch-these-flowers" signs to be seen. It is not a part of the park plan.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest this statement, just made to me by the gentleman who lives in the city of St. Louis, and that is that Shaw's Botanic Garden, one of the most notable gardens in the world, adjoins Tower Grove Park in St. Louis, and is absolutely open to all visitors at all times. I have often heard of that botanic garden, and I visited it once. The people go right through the park into the botanic gardens, and they have their picnics and their meetings and they sit there and they talk, and there is no trouble about the plants or the flowers whatsoever.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not a fact, however, that in Shaw's Garden, which I have visited more than once, there is a very limited area, and it is all occupied with plants, practically, whereas there will be only a spot here and there in the 400 acres to be used for ultimate development into a botanical garden, and the access to it will be just as free as it is now, and no one but an expert like the gentleman could tell when he gets out of the park and into the garden?

Mr. COOPER. Shaw's Garden is almost exclusively of plants.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been in Shaw's Garden in St. Louis. It is beautiful, but it is a botanic garden and is not a park. It is not designated in St. Louis as a park, while it is adjacent to it, and it is not interfered with in its management and the flowers and shrubs are not destroyed. Yet it is not maintained as a park. It is adjacent to the park.

Mr. COOPER. But the people go through the park right into the botanic garden without knowing it, just as they would if this were placed in Rock Creek Park.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I come now to a question in this matter that can not be removed from it in the consideration of this bill. I have been in this House long enough to know of the work that has been engaged in to enlarge Rock Creek Park. I will vote for the enlargement of Rock Creek Park as an independent proposition upon its merits, knowing exactly what I am doing, but I have always refused to vote to accomplish indirectly what can not be accomplished directly. I know that just as soon as you have taken 400 acres off the north end of Rock Creek Park for a botanic garden the effort to enlarge Rock Creek Park between the present Rock Creek Park and the Potomac Park will be renewed and will win, because those interested will convince Congress that they have had to give up an important part of Rock Creek Park for a botanic garden and that now they must have this ground for park purposes. We may just as well meet the question to-day as to meet it in two years from now or four years from now or six years from now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, this charge has been made, and I would like the gentleman to say what possible interest he thinks that Members of this House or members of the committee have in any real estate proposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They have not any; there is not a Member of this House to-day that has any interest in any real estate; but I do say if this Botanic Garden takes 400 acres off the north end of Rock Creek Park Congress will be prevailed upon to add that much of ground to Rock Creek Park at some convenient place to the people of Washington.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course we can not tell what may take place in the future.

Mr. MANN. Will the same gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. MANN. Where could that be added?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, out here in this little neck where we have been asked to put it in so long.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not seriously, in his right mind, mean to even guess that there is any possibility of Congress buying Massachusetts Heights; that has been laid out and graded and fixed up for sale as a part of Rock Creek Park?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know. There have been a good many things done in Washington.

Mr. MANN. I can follow the gentleman in his imagination a great ways, but that is beyond me.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. FALCONER. Does the gentleman favor the moving of the Botanic Garden anywhere?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Or would the gentleman prefer it to remain where it now is?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think I would move it down to this ground that we already have, move it down to this extension of Potomac Park, or to make it part of the agricultural farm. There are many places where it could be put without expense in the purchase of land, and that will make it a botanic garden without injury or great expense.

Mr. PAYNE. If we should take part of Potomac Park for this ground is not the gentleman afraid by the same process of reasoning that he will compel Congress to buy from Potomac Park over across to Rock Creek Park?

Mr. CAMPBELL. There may be——

Mr. PAYNE. And the real estate pork barrel gets into it automatically?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from New York suggests that using a section of Potomac Park for a botanic garden will probably lead to the same condition we may have in respect to the Rock Creek Park.

Mr. PAYNE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not suggest that, but I asked the gentleman the question whether he did not think so; I have no fears on that point.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman's argument is that the placing of this botanic garden simply withdraws 400 acres from that magnificent park for park purposes, and he suggests as a proper place to put this park in a part of Potomac Park. I presume the gentleman means east of the railroad down there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. That has not yet been finished as a park as I understand——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all, and it is an arm off the park proper.

Mr. HOWARD. But it is in process of completion and the money that would be expended in completing that for park purposes could be utilized for the purpose of completing this into a botanic garden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true, and if it were not desirable to put the Botanic Garden down there on this side of the river off Potomac Park we have plenty of land just across adjacent to the agricultural farm, easily accessible to the people of Washington where the Government is now reclaiming land and beautifying the place.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How does the gentleman avoid the argument advanced by botanists and those who are familiar with this work when they say you have to have a variety of soil and topography and conditions that I read awhile ago from the head of the great botanic garden in New York, a disinterested and capable witness? How does the gentleman avoid the argument which seems to make the place he suggests an unsuitable one?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They are raising every variety of cereal, every variety of fruit trees on the agricultural farm, and I see no reason why the same soil could not be used for a botanic garden.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will permit a question.

Mr. COOPER. I want to read just one sentence from what Dr. Galloway says, who has just gone to Cornell, about the necessity of conditions and exposures, difference in the variety of soil, and so forth, in order to have a real good arboretum and botanic garden. I would like to have the gentleman answer that, remembering that the place of which he speaks is practically flat as is also the region suggested by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can not yield for the reading of that—this is in the report of the committee; but the land that is described by gentlemen here who favor the taking of a part of Rock Creek Park for the Botanic Garden is a beautiful plain—farming land that is under cultivation.

Mr. COOPER. Well, now, will the gentleman permit an interruption there? That shows the gentleman is not familiar with the topography of the country of which he purports to speak.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am talking about what gentlemen have stated here this afternoon, about the land that it is proposed to take within Rock Creek Park for a botanic garden.

Mr. COOPER. The report states—this is an extract from the letter of Dr. Galloway:

> Rock Creek Park offers a peculiarly suitable location for a national arboretum and botanical garden, in that it has a variety of soils and exposures which are essential to the proper cultivation of a wide variety of plant species, and already contains a remarkable collection of native trees and shrubs.

Now, the up-hill and down-dale site over there offers the variety of exposure that is necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The committee has contended that we would not take that portion of Rock Creek Park that is now beautified by trees and shrubs, but it is proposed to take a beautiful piece of ground that is used as a farm.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not say that. I say that the places which it is proposed to plant and on which to cultivate plants, flowers, and things of that kind, are the open places, the old farms and old fields up there. It is not intended to disturb the trees or forests that are there. It is not intended to disturb the trees or forests that are there, because they are a part of the arboretum planted by the greatest of all gardeners.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That portion quoted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has no application to that and is not an argument in favor of moving the Botanic Garden out there as opposed to moving it elsewhere.

Mr. SLAYDEN. To where do you want it moved?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not care so long as it does not take a part of Rock Creek Park and prevent its use for park purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I just wanted to suggest, apropos to the question suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin about the great variety of trees in Rock Creek Park, does not the gentleman know that there are propagated down in Potomac Park over 100 varieties of trees that these gentlemen say can not be propagated on this land?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think they have some trees there from Japan. I think there are no more beautiful trees to be found anywhere in this section of the country than you will find down in Potomac Park imported from Japan.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that they propagate any trees down there? The gentleman is a farmer, and used the term "propagate" as to the trees down there. Does the gentleman mean to stake his reputation on the fact that they propagate trees down there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am a cereal and vegetable farmer.

Mr. MANN. A cereal farmer and not a serious farmer?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not of the arboretum variety.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to say in his time, for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, they do not propagate anything down there at all. They have a few trees heeled in there as a nursery pure and simple.

Mr. HOWARD. I may have used the wrong word. They are growing there, and luxuriantly growing.

Mr. MANN. Of course, they grow well all over Potomac Park.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not seen anything in the way of a shrub planted in Potomac Park that has not grown well. It may be that it is not a suitable place from a theoretic standpoint.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not been very observing, then, because there have been a great many trees down there that have died. Of course, if they stay dead for a year they pull them up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true of all trees in all parks. Of course, some of them die.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say he did not see anything that was not growing well down there.

Mr. THACHER. May I ask the gentleman if he ever visited this locality proposed to be taken by the Botanic Garden in Rock Creek Park?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes. I have been all over the park.

Mr. THACHER. You concurred in some of the statements made by gentlemen who have spoken that there was no variety at all. There is variety, and slope, and southern exposure. There is a great variety there. I believe the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. THACHER. And quite a contrast to Potomac Park, which is low, and flat, and soggy.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What I did say in respect to that is this: It was stated it would not be expensive at all to convert the portions of Rock Creek Park into a botanic garden, because it has been used for agricultural or farm purposes. That statement has been made, has it not, in answer to the statement that it would be an expensive thing to convert Rock Creek Park into a botanic garden? But I must hasten to my conclusion.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the gentleman if he said what part of Rock Creek Park was referred to? I never happened to find any such part of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not seen it; but it has been stated here by gentlemen in favor of making a part of Rock Creek Park into a botanic garden that there were beautiful agricultural fields there that could be easily converted without expense into a botanic garden.

Mr. PLATT. There are some slopes of meadow grass that have evidently been farmed in years gone by.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me just a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to say to the gentleman if he is not familiar with it, that down on reservation No. 13 they have all the rolling land they want. It is beautifully rolling down there, some high land and some low land. I want to also state that there is an immense nursery of trees there now, and houses, too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was just going to mention that other possible location for a botanic garden without in any way interfering with the park system that has been outlined for Washington. Now, I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the park plan for Washington that practically bars the idea of taking 400 acres off the north end of Rock Creek Park and making it into a botanic garden. The parking plan for Washington contemplates a park surrounding the entire city, with driveways in that system surrounding the entire city. You can not take 400 acres off of Rock Creek Park without destroying that plan.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. This 400 acres will be there after it is used for botanic garden purposes just as it is now, with all the driveways unobstructed, and unless somebody would point it out to you as you were going along the driveway you could not tell when you went from one part into another, and it will not in the slightest interfere with the plan if it is carried out. In other words, it is only permitting a botanic garden being placed in the park without diverting it from park puposes one particle, and making it a more beautiful park than it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That statement has been made here, but there is nothing in support of it. The plan of a park system for Washington does not contemplate that a portion of it shall be set aside for a botanic garden under the exclusive control of somebody in charge of that garden.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has just stated that there is nothing to support the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that it would add to the beautification of the park. I wish to call to his attention and to the attention of the committee the remark of Dr. Galloway in his letter to the chairman of the committee, in which he used this language:

> On the contrary, our object would be to enhance the beauty of the park through the gradual accumulation of collections of plants in such a way that they would serve a useful purpose to the whole country as well as enhance the beauty of the surroundings.

There is nothing in this proposition that tends to detract from the present use of Rock Creek Park. The gentleman bases his argument on the supposition that it is a playground. In fact, it is more utilized for driveway purposes. The very part of this park that is intended to be used as an arboretum is hilly in character and is used almost exclusively for driveway purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, the gentleman from Wisconsin may be right; but if you establish a botanic garden in Rock Creek Park, you take that area out of the park for park purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe that in deciding this question it would be well to follow the example of other cities? I wish to ask him if he knows of any city in the country where they have not established their botanic gardens in connection with their park system? I call his special attention to the case of Philadelphia, where Horticultural Hall is located on the old site of the centennial exposition grounds, which is a botanic garden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has an hour. I did not think he was pressed for time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is a vast difference between Horticultural Hall in Philadelphia and the Botanic Garden.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; for a question.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says that these 400 acres are to be taken from the park. Of course, the people will go right from the park into the garden as they please, as they do in St. Louis. But there are 1,600 acres in that park, which is an exceedingly large park. If, for the sake of the argument, you take off 400 acres, it would leave 1,200 acres in the park, which is still an exceeding large park.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; but that is not a single body of land.

Mr. COOPER. It is used for drives.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; it is used for drives, and it could not be used for the propagation of plants, such as was described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if it were used for driveways.

Mr. MANN. Of course it could.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Would the gentleman regard the Zoological Park as being taken out of the Rock Creek Park area, or as a part of it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is an invitation to come into Rock Creek Park to see the animals.

Mr. PLATT. Would not the Botanic Garden be the same thing?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all. The invitation to a zoo, to a zoological park, is a vastly different kind of an invitation from one that you would have to go into a botanic garden.

Mr. PLATT. There is more noise about it.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLINE. Assuming that these several tracts are all equally available for the removal of the Botanic Garden, has the gentleman canvassed the proposition as to the expense of properly preparing the different sections and the future amount of money necessary for their upkeep? Would there be any difference in that? Would the 400 acres be more expensive or less expensive than the cost of moving the Botanic Garden over to the Potomac flats?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The 400 acres to be taken for botanic purposes in Rock Creek Park would be 400 acres of the most expensive land adjacent to the city of Washington. Everybody knows, and especially the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], that the northwest section of Washington contains the most expensive land adjacent to or in Washington. The land would be much cheaper—the taking of the land down here in reservation 13, would be much cheaper—and its maintenance, I think, would be a great deal less than that of the land in Rock Creek Park. The extension of Potomac Park, which has not yet been converted into a park, could be used at a much less expense and would take land that is less valuable than the land in Rock Creek Park.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he ever crossed Rock Creek Park on what is called the Military Road, going from Piney Branch across to Chevy Chase Circle or thereabouts?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The land in that section of Rock Creek Park is not worth more than the land down here.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It costs more to buy it.

Mr. PLATT. That may be true, but there is land all around it that does not look expensive.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But just as soon as you undertake to buy that land it goes up in value far beyond what its appearance would indicate.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the land that is proposed to be used for a botanic garden in Rock Creek Park is used for hay fields, is it not, at the present time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know what it is used for.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be put to much better purposes if used for a botanic garden than it is while used for raising hay.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that he have a convention of the Members of the House who are in favor of appropriating a portion of Rock Creek Park for a botanic garden, so that they may reach an agreement as to the nature of the land and its topography and the purposes for which it is now used and the uses for which it is really available. The gentleman from Illinois now says that it is used for hay fields. Other gentlemen said here a few moments ago that it was a beautiful arboretum.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course it is surrounded by trees, but these are open places, and I see them cutting hay there every year. Nobody ever goes into that part of the park for recreation. They just smell the new-mown hay as they go by on their drives. How much better it would be if they could smell the beautiful flowers, trees, and shrubs that could be propagated in a botanic garden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Illinois can not get me to say that any smell is sweeter than the smell of new-mown hay.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to make a correction. I said I had been told that there were 1,600 acres in Rock Creek Park. I have since learned from a gentleman who is possessed of a vast amount of information concerning everything relating to the District of Columbia that there are 2,200 acres in the park; and if these 400 acres were put into flowers and the trees left as they are, it would still leave 1,800 acres of park, which is an exceedingly large park, and the putting in of these flowers would not interfere at all with the pleasure of the people, but, on the contrary, it would add to it and enhance it a thousandfold.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It will be the most expensive move that this Congress can make with regard to the Botanic Garden. Aside from what I have said with regard to the uses to which Rock Creek Park may be put, aside from what I have said with regard to the demands that will be made upon this Congress for additional land if this land is taken for a Botanic Garden, this will be the most expensive place in which the Botanic Garden could be placed and maintained.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the gentleman from Kansas think that the elements entering into future appropriations for this project ought to be seriously considered?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do.

Mr. CLINE. In connection with the removal, in regard to the different locations?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think so, and I think as a matter of fact that the cheapest and the best place is on the land in reservation 13, or adjacent to the Agricultural Farm.

Mr. MADDEN. Where is it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Just across the river from Potomac Park.

Mr. MADDEN. In Virginia?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes. The Government is now reclaiming the land, cleaning out the channel of the river.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman refer to where they are putting in the breakwater north of the bridge?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all water.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Potomac Park was all water a short time ago.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; 15 years ago.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The same process that filled up Potomac Park is now filling up the other side of the river on this side of the agricultural farm. The thing that the House should take into account is the enormous expense that will be entailed if they move the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What proportion of people would see the Botanic Garden if it was moved across the river?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Everybody that goes to Arlington, and there are thousands who go there every day, and anyone who wants to visit a botanic garden.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Only those who have a conveyance, an automobile or a carriage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes; they can go there on the electric car, which goes right to the very corner of the place. But it must not be argued that the Botanic Garden can be moved from its present location to Rock Creek Park without entailing the most expensive botanic garden that this Government could establish and maintain. If this Democratic Congress wants to establish the most expensive botanic garden that it could possibly establish, move it to Rock Creek Park. If you want to maintain a botanic garden in the Capital in keeping with Democratic pretenses and Democratic promises, put it somewhere where it will not be on the most expensive land anywhere in the region of Washington.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina was recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if we can not come to some agreement as to when we can vote on this bill. I do not desire to cut off any gentleman who desires to speak and shall not attempt to do so, but we have had a reasonably long discussion, and I would like to have the balance of the discussion under the five-minute rule. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman from North Carolina, but I want to reach an agreement as to when we shall vote—whether to-day or next Wednesday.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman is addressing his remarks to me, I will say that I do not feel authorized to enter into an agreement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman can say what he is willing to do himself.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have no preference in the matter. I have a few brief remarks that I want to submit.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have been recognized, and that entitles me to an hour. There are several gentlemen on this side who want to speak, and I am not in a condition to commit anybody except myself.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was making the inquiry with a view to reaching an idea of what the opinion of the gentleman was on the matter as to when we can close this debate. I do not wish to move to close debate.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman could not do that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I could move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident that some gentlemen are filibustering against this bill and that we will not get a vote to-night.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to simply consume time and defer a vote upon the bill under consideration. I merely want to submit a few reasons why in my judgment this bill should not pass. I am like the gentleman from Illinois, and yet somewhat unlike him. I am unlike him in that I was not reared in a flower garden, but like him to the extent of my fondness for plants and flowers. I am unlike the gentleman from Kansas, whose pursuits in the garden are of a different character, and by his own admission in an effort to reduce the cost of living, because the first few years of my life were spent in an effort to produce things from the ground. I was sufficiently amused in that time, and have no particular desire to try it now.

The love of flowers and plants distinguish, in my judgment, people of culture and refinement and kindly feeling. I have always noticed in going through the country districts of my own district that when I saw growing in the yard or in window boxes or about the porch plants in bloom, it was a pretty safe bet that the people who lived there were cultured, hospitable, and kindly, and while I have often acted upon that assumption, I never knew it to prove otherwise than true.

That the Botanic Garden in its present location is out of place I think every Member of this House will admit. It has served its purpose there, and if the Government is to maintain a garden of this character it should be elsewhere than in its present location. I have listened to this discussion relative to the topography and geography and location of this proposed site in Rock Creek Park with a great deal of interest. I have supposed that I was in some degree familiar with that section of the city, and that particular location. But when gentlemen have made the statement on the floor that certain street-car lines reached within a block or two blocks of Rock Creek Park I am convinced that either they are mistaken or that I know absolutely nothing about the distances and the topography of the city in that section.

The street-car line running out Fourteenth Street to Piney Branch terminus is at least one-quarter of a mile from the boundary of the park, the nearest point being down opposite the reservoir across Sixteenth Street. The Georgia Avenue car at one point is perhaps nearer the proposed location of this botanic garden than is the Fourteenth Street line at its terminus at Piney Branch.

One of the regrets that has often come to me in my enjoyment of Rock Creek Park—I do get a great deal of pleasure from driving in the park, being the unfortunate possessor of an automobile—is that it is not accessible and within the reach of a larger percentage of the population of the city.

I have regretted not only in connection with Rock Creek Park, but also in connection with Potomac Park, that provision was not made for pedestrians. In each of these parks very elaborate arrangements have been made for vehicles, and we have expended a great deal of money in the grading and paving of roads as driveways and in the preparation of paths for equestrians, but we have forgotten absolutely in our appropriations the enjoyment of these pleasure spots within the reach of the city by the man or woman who walks, unless he or she walk in danger of being run down by an automobile or run over by a horse. I know of no cultivated land in Rock Creek Park. It may be there. I am not saying that there is not land there that within recent years has been under cultivation, but if so it has escaped my observation, and I have very frequently driven the various roads in the park. This cultivated land is not on the road.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman referring to anything that I said?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; nothing that the gentleman said. In fact, I could not say what gentleman it was. There has been so much said that I could not tell. I am very much like the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], for I believe that there ought to be some kind of meeting and agreement just as to the character of this soil.

Mr. MANN. I did say that shrubs might be planted in this land, because it had been cultivated. I think that that is what the gentleman has in his mind, but he is not answering that.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am not undertaking to answer that at all. I think possibly that at one time this land was cultivated, but it certainly has not been cultivated within a number of years.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It has grown up with bushes and plants and trees.

Mr. MANN. But part of it has grass upon it that is cut.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The other gentleman from Illinois made reference, in his interrogating of the gentleman from Kansas, to the fact that they mowed hay. I think possibly just north of Military Road there is a little spot of ground on which I have seen a few mounds of hay that have been cut and raked up; but when you speak of an objection to other places that have been mentioned here as being low, I want to say that it is not much lower or damper than those spots off which this hay is occasionally mowed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is probably more familiar with Rock Creek Park than I am, for I do not possess an automobile, though I have walked out there.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I venture the gentleman has not done much walking, though the walking is good, I will say.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have walked through Rock Creek Park more than two hundred times since I have been a Member of Congress.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am very glad to know it.

Mr. MANN. Much of this land is not touched by the roads at all.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is true.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about what he saw from the roads, and there are no roads near this land.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I was about to say that removed from these driveways at some inaccessible spot in the park there may be cultivated land. There may be corn growing within the park, for all I know, but it has not come within my observation.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Does the land lying right north of the reservoir belong in Rock Creek Park proper at the present time?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No. There is quite a large section of land there that is in private holding, just north of the reservoir; and, by the way, there has been a very insistent demand on the part of certain people in the city of Washington for the extension of Sixteenth Street to what is known as the Military Road, this insistence coming because of the fact that it does pass through private property which the gentlemen who own it desire very greatly to be developed, and it is not for the purpose of getting another road into the park, because there is certainly no lack of roads now leading into Rock Creek Park. But, Mr. Chairman, it was not along this line that I desired to make an observation. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], in reply to an inquiry I directed to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER] when he had the floor, as to the cost that was going to be involved to the Government in this matter, quoted from a letter or statement made by the former Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Dr. Galloway, that did not give very much information. It was a mere statement that, in the opinion of that gentleman, there would be no necessity for an increase in the appropriation over the present appropriations for the maintenance of the present Botanic Garden.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion, without going to the extent of my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] as to the probable cost that will be involved and for which the Government will be called on to pay in connection with this enterprise providing this bill passes, that the $30,000 annual appropriation will look like 30 cents in comparison with the amount that will be asked for the enlargement, improvement, and maintenance of this proposed park in Rock Creek Park. Four hundred acres are to be made into a garden; houses are to be built for the superintendent on the grounds, with mains laid for water works for water necessary for the culture and propagation of these plants, rare and otherwise, for the building of houses for the help that would be employed in maintenance, for the clearing of the ground, for walks and driveways through this cultivated spot now not reached by drives and walk ways. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, if this bill becomes a law authorizing the establishment of this garden in Rock Creek Park, with authority to the Agricultural Department to take over 400 acres for this purpose, the cost of maintenance, to say nothing of the cost of preparation to make this garden, I say within five years we will be extremely lucky if it costs less than $100,000 a year to maintain it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will yield.

Mr. WEBB. I remember two or three years ago a very insistent and persistent effort was made here to sell the Government some more land for Rock Creek Park. It was then made to appear the park was not big enough, that we needed more land for that purpose. Now, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as a gentleman who knows the ins and outs of these sales, does not the gentleman think that if we donate 400 acres off this small park it will not be but a year or two until a pry will be put under Congress and the demand made that as they have lost 400 acres of this beautiful park they ought to have 400 acres to add to it in order to make up as much as it is now?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have no doubt in the world the people who have land adjacent to the park will seize upon any opportunity to find a market for the land, the purchaser being the Government. They are not particularly anxious to sell to anybody else. To those who are familiar with the location and situation there are hundreds of acres of land in private holdings just west of Rock Creek Park. You can to-day go along the driveway leading from about 200 yards north of Pierce's Mill, on the road that goes out to the circle at Chevy Chase, and within a quarter of a mile or less, where you go out of the present Rock Creek Park, and for nearly 2 miles or more than 2 miles you go through wooded land and on every tenth tree, almost, you will find a sign of some real-estate firm in the city saying that that particular place is for sale. There is no particular inducement for getting home builders to go there. Those people, in my judgment, are not particularly anxious to sell in this locality to those who will improve it as home builders, but it is being held in the hope that some incident will occur by which they can make a market with the Government for the enlargement of Rock Creek Park and thereby obtain a very much better price for this land.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. With pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is the case that they have a number of real-estate signs on every tenth tree——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me to modify that, because the trees are rather thick, I will state at every turn of the road.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose there is one every fiftieth tree, I do not know that they are very anxious to sell their land; but is there any justification for stating that they have no desire to sell it in view of the fact they are advertising it for sale?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman it costs very little to have a real-estate sign with the name of the real-estate dealer and "for sale" printed on it, and nail it up on a tree, and it has certain advertising value for people who pass along the road. I do not think there has been any serious effort to sell land in this locality.

Mr. MADDEN. I am frank to say I do not know anything about it, but if the gentleman will allow me to make a statement for just a minute, I would like to say that in Chicago we found we did not have parks enough to meet the needs and saw the necessity for more parks. So the city and its people joined as one man for the purpose of inaugurating a plan of making more parks, and to do that they were obliged to buy blocks of houses and tear them down in the most thickly populated part of the city, and that has been done all over the city, and done because in the early history of the city people did not see the necessity for parks for breathing spaces. And it may be that situation will develop here.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Does the gentleman suppose that will develop in the city of Washington?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope so.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That we will have to buy houses and tear them down to establish parks?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope we will have sense enough to establish the parks before that situation arises.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think that certainly in the city of Washington there can be no complaint along that line, but the complaint comes that in one or two instances we have made large appropriations to buy houses and tear them down to make parks even in Washington, the insistent demand here being so great as to go beyond the necessity from the definition of most of us, at least, as to what the necessities are.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that there is an insistent demand, of course, from certain interests and people in the District of Columbia for the establishment of this garden within the District and within the city. Naturally enough it is an additional attraction to the city of Washington and to the District of Columbia, without even the participation of the taxpayers of this District to the extent of one-half of its cost. It is one of those things that the Government is going to do wholly, as we do a great many other things within the District of Columbia, and some of them we should do. I see no reason why we should be confined to the District of Columbia for the establishment of this garden. I think there is a great deal in the suggestion that has been made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] in connection with the farm of the Agricultural Department, and now under their supervision and improvement, lying just across the river in Virginia. In my judgment, it is a very much more suitable place for the establishment of a garden for the propagation of plants, and even trees, than is this plot that has been suggested in Rock Creek Park. I have some sympathy with the suggestion that has been made by other gentlemen as to the suitableness of that piece of land now owned by the Government, that has not been improved except by the building of a road on one side of it. Much of the land lying east of the railroad, to the east of Potomac Park, down the river on the point, has been cultivated during recent years. It seems to me that would be a vastly better place for the establishment of this garden and for the growth not only of plants, but trees, than the one selected in this bill, in the northern end of Rock Creek Park. I even agree with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], to select reservation No. 13, in this section of the city, and known as the "old workhouse plot," and now occupied by the Washington Asylum and Jail, and evidently not to be occupied by that institution for a great while in the future, where the Government already owns a beautiful plot of land within easy reach of the population of the city, bordering upon the Eastern Branch, the Anacostia River, that is now being reclaimed and improved—the parking system of the city itself—and it seems to me that either one of these particular places would involve vastly less cost to the Government in the establishment of this garden, as well as placing it in a better location than that in Rock Creek Park, without creating the demand on the part of certain people that Rock Creek Park immediately be enlarged to the extent that we have detracted from it by taking this 400 acres.

Mr. Chairman, I have confidence in the gentlemen who have reported this bill to the House, the gentlemen composing the Committee on the Library, but I doubt very seriously whether these gentlemen have given this matter the careful consideration that it should have received in reporting their conclusions to this House. I think if they would take more time, if they would, in the light of the discussion that has taken place here to-day, some of it illuminating and some not, pursue this subject further, they themselves might come to the conclusion that it was not wise to authorize the Agricultural Department to take over 400 acres of Rock Creek Park for the purposes indicated in this bill. I shall oppose the bill when it comes to a final vote, because I do not believe that this is the place for the establishment of this garden. I think that there are better places, places that can be improved and out of which we can get all the benefits that would come from this location by the expenditure of vastly less money than it will require in the location indicated in this bill, and in a place that will not detract and take from the advantages that now exist because of this park known as Rock Creek Park.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate in what respect the present uses of Rock Creek Park will be in any way diverted by utilizing it for the purpose of an arboretum or a botanic garden?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. To be frank with the gentleman, I do not think it will take from it or detract from the pleasure of it or the utility of it in the slightest degree; but my experience has led me to believe that it will result in an incessant demand that will come to fruition for the purchase of more land because it has been taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the gentleman's position, it is founded entirely upon fear?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No, sir; it is not founded upon fear, but it is founded upon the actual happenings of the past. The gentleman has been a Member of Congress long enough to know that there are incessant demands that come in here, occasioned by a small excuse.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, if the gentleman admits that the uses of the park will not be in any way impaired, I can not understand how the appropriation of land for this purpose will be any warrant or argument for acquiring additional land. It is merely appropriating that which we have.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is the gentleman's guess for the future, and I have made my guess; that is all. Neither of us is a seer or a prophet.

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BALTZ. I think great care should be exercised in selecting a site for the Botanic Garden. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have been out in that territory and have gone over it, and I must confess that I did not find any soil thereabouts that is fertile enough to raise flowers and trees.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The observation by the gentleman from Illinois is no doubt correct. I make no pretense about being either a farmer or a horticulturist, but it seems to me——

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think that the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BALTZ] can weigh against that of the famous expert, not only a national expert but a world-wide expert, Dr. Galloway, who says that the soil of this 400-acre tract is especially adapted for the purposes of an arboretum or botanic garden?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman has called upon me to pass upon the judgment of Dr. Galloway and my colleague from Illinois, who is a practical farmer, and I will take the judgment of the practical farmer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman take the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois as contrasted with the actual facts, when we all know that trees do grow out there?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I said flowers.

Mr. STAFFORD. And flowers.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman insists upon his point, and that results in an adjournment of the House, will I have the floor on next Calendar Wednesday when this bill is called up?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair does not know whether or not he will be in the chair at that time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Have I not the right to continue?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will determine then, when the question comes up for determination.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A Member of the House can not take a gentleman off his feet when he has the floor by raising the question of a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of no quorum is in order at any time. If it were a parliamentary inquiry he could not take him off the floor with it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12796) to provide for the removal of the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park and for its transfer to the control of the Department of Agriculture, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, August 6, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 6, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we look to Thee as the source of all wisdom and holiness and power. We humble ourselves under Thy mighty hand, and commit ourselves to Thy divine leadings. May we discharge all our obligations in the light of Thy perfect law. We pray for our rulers; and may the angels of mercy hover over the home where dwells our Chief Magistrate. May Thy kind Providence dispel the gloom that has entered there, and be present in healing strength and restorative power. We ask it in the name of Jesus our dear Savior. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR ELIHU ROOT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a tribute from a great Democratic daily newspaper to a great Republican Senator, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I did not hear the request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have asked unanimous consent that the Secretary may read to the Senate the tribute of a great Democratic daily newspaper to a great Republican Senator, the colleague of the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I shall be very glad to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, Thursday, July 30, 1914.]

"Senator ROOT's letter announcing that he would not be a candidate for reelection to his present office lacks nothing in positiveness. It was everywhere accepted as the expression of a firm resolve. The country's response was remarkable. In near and distant States, in every part of the Union, newspapers representing the best public opinion, men of all parties, men who have worked with Mr. ROOT, and men who have striven against him, spoke in terms of the highest praise of his great abilities and distinguished public service and united in a common expression of regret that he would soon cease to be a Member of that body to whose debates he has made so many and so rich contributions. Mr. ROOT's adherence to his purpose to be content with the private station would be cause of regret more general and profound than has been awakened by the retirement from public life of any statesman of our time. The effort to persuade Mr. ROOT against the determination of his own mind may seem to be ungracious, yet there are reasons of great weight and moment why it should be made, why so long as any hope remains all the forces of appeal and persuasion should be availed of.

"Wordsworth's tribute to the memory of Milton may with perfect truth and propriety be paid to ELIHU ROOT still living. The country has need of him, his own State has need of him, the people he has served more faithfully than they have at all times been aware of have need of him. It is a continuing need, and the Times will not shrink from adding to the ungraciousness of its appeal by saying to Mr. ROOT not merely that his work is not yet finished, but that his whole duty has not yet been performed. Of one whose service has been so great that is much to say, but we say it not as a reproof but as an exhortation. To one less great than the New York Senator it would not be said at all.

"Our national practice and policy have undergone a profound change that had its beginnings in the enactment of the interstate-commerce law and of the antitrust law. The industries and the commerce of the country had enjoyed almost unlimited freedom, the great builders of the Nation's prosperity had been almost entirely unhampered. Abuses had grown up and the time came when the people presented their effective demand for new laws and new conditions. The spirit that brought about that change has made fresh demands, and fundamental modifications of our earlier system have either been accomplished or are under way. The wish and purpose to bring the business of Government and the affairs of party more directly within the control of the people themselves have found expression in many new statutes. It is a perfectly well-known historical truth that when changes of that kind are once begun the tendency is to go both too fast and too far. The statesman who wisely guides the reforming spirit, who seeks to check and control it when checks and control are needed, serves his country not less worthily than the initiators of reform. New men, their zeal outrunning their knowledge, their wisdom, and their experience, must be balanced by those qualified for the task. The service is not one of reaction, it is one of guidance and conservation.

"For that service ELIHU ROOT is qualified above any other living American. His extraordinary abilities, the clearness of his mind, his power of insight, his broad experience, his learning as a constitutional lawyer and as a man of affairs equip him as no other statesman of our time is equipped to take part in the final organization and shaping of the new order. For this, beyond question, the country has urgent need of him, but it needs in all its great undertakings and at every stage of its progress his ripe judgment and the fruits of his large experience. In our foreign relations we can not lightly dispense with the knowledge and sagacity of the man who was one of our greatest Secretaries of State.

"Mr. ROOT's party has need of him, and that is only another way of presenting the country's need. The Democratic Party is in power, but the true advantage of that party and the welfare of the country will be best served by the existence of a strong opposition. The disorganization of the Democratic Party in the years following 1896 bred disaster for the Republicans. For this reason Democrats and Republicans alike should welcome Mr. ROOT's consent, if it can be obtained, again to be a candidate for the Senate. The pride and interest of the State of New York demand his continuance in its service if he can be persuaded. Of his election, should he consent to let his name go before the people, we believe there could be no doubt. If it be true, as President Wilson said the other day, that the temper of the people has undergone some change and that their attitude toward public questions much discussed of late has been modified, we are convinced that the views and wishes they now entertain would find emphatic expression in the vote cast for Mr. ROOT. The voters of New York would hardly consent to set aside the greatest man now in public life in favor of some lesser aspirant. Mr. ROOT would be elected. His State and the country sincerely hope that he will consent to enter the contest and perform the service."

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to make a brief statement.

On yesterday the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asked to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Foreign Relations. Personally I regret that the Senator from Mississippi took this course, and I am sure that that regret is shared by every member of the committee. There is no member of the committee who does not entertain a warm friendship and high personal regard for the Senator from Mississippi. All recognize and appreciate his ability, his learning, and his usefulness as a public servant.

The reasons assigned by the Senator for making his request, I am sure, on reflection, he would not adhere to as expressing his real convictions. There is no member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, much less the committee as a whole, who seeks in any wise to antagonize any effort made by the President or by any other person to promote the peace of the world or to provide means for facilitating the transportation of the products of this country to the various markets of the world. The statement made by the honorable Senator is so unreasonable and unwarranted that I am confident, as I have just said, that the Senator himself will not be willing that the reasons he assigned on yesterday for withdrawing from the committee should stand as a correct expression of his own opinions and convictions.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I hope the Senator will reconsider what he has done, in so far as withdrawing from the committee is concerned, and that the committee may continue to have the benefit of his wise counsel and valuable services.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a telegram from the Portland Chamber of Commerce with reference to the river and harbor bill, and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 31, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
For Oregon Congressional Delegation,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolutions were unanimously passed at meeting called by the Portland Chamber of Commerce, at which were delegates from the Chamber of Commerce of Marshfield, Eugene, The Dalles, Salem, Astoria, Hermiston, and other places:

"Resolved, That the commercial organizations, representing all interests and every part of the Northwest, in convention assembled, urge the Senators representing these States to use every honorable means to pass the pending river and harbor bill.

"Resolved further, That the failure to pass this bill at this session of Congress will be in a very real sense a public calamity and retard development of the entire Pacific coast section, as well as occasion direct loss to the Government by reason of stoppage of work and necessary deterioration of plant and work already done.

"Resolved further, That we believe our representatives are justified and we urge them to refuse to adjourn Congress until a vote is taken on the river and harbor bill as a whole.

"Resolved further, That by reason of the fact that the port of Portland, the port of Astoria, and the port of Coos Bay have this year contributed directly large sums to aid in work now in progress at the mouth of the Columbia and Coos Bay we feel good faith on the part of the General Government requires it to continue the work which has thus been maintained by money raised by taxation of our local community.

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives of all the Pacific Coast States and Idaho, Montana, and Nevada."

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By A. H. AVEILL, President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present resolutions unanimously adopted by the Presbyterian Synod of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At its meeting in Eugene July 11 the Presbyterian Synod of Oregon unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas certain statements have been sent broadcast over the State of Oregon as if emanating from the hop growers, which represent the Presbyterian Church and some of its ministers as being opposed to the attempt to make Oregon dry: Therefore be it

"Resolved, First, that the Synod of Oregon hereby reaffirms all of its former deliverances on the subject of temperance.

"Resolved, Second, that the Synod of Oregon declares itself most emphatically in favor of both State and National prohibition.

"Resolved, Third, that we most earnestly indorse the Oregon dry amendment now pending before the voters of Oregon, and also the Sheppard-Hobson amendment for national prohibition, and we urge for each of them the votes, the prayers, the influence, and the utmost effort of our people.

"Resolved, Fourth, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes, a copy given to the press of the State, and a copy sent to Congressman RICHMOND P. HOBSON, United States Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, and to each of the United States Senators and Congressmen from this State, with request that they vote for and push this measure.

"Whereas all past experience demonstrates that voting territory dry greatly increases accessions on confession of faith; and

"Whereas we therefore have not only a clear duty to aid morals and righteousness in voting Oregon dry this fall, but also the impulsion of enlightened self-interest; and

"Whereas we are also in the midst of a campaign for national prohibition by amendment of the Federal Constitution, a measure needful to the complete protection of local dry territory: Therefore be it

"Resolved, First, that we urge the support of the Sheppard-Hobson amendment by letters, telegrams, and petitions, individually and collectively, from our churches, Sunday schools, Christian Endeavor and other societies, to our Senators and Congressmen.

"Resolved, Second, that we pledge to the State campaign our voices, votes, influence, time, effort, and the fullest financial support possible.

"Resolved, Third, that we recommend the creation of a committee of three pastors and three elders located in or near Portland to confer with other temperance agencies and to place such of our men as the board of temperance sends into the field in the places where they are most needed and where they can do most effective work.

"Resolved, Fourth, that we urge the General Board of Temperance to expend of its funds as largely as possible in this State. Some States are already assured of victory; some are equally sure of defeat. Oregon hangs in the balance. Here both need and opportunity are greatest.

"Resolved, Fifth, that the General Board of Temperance be asked to confer with this synodical committee as to the manner of expending all of the aid which it may give to this State.

"Resolved, Sixth, that we urge that the final registration period (September 24 to October 15) be made a State-wide booster time for citizenship, with registration for voting the 'acid test,' and that all organizations be invited to join in this. Let us remove the Oregon stigma of casting the vote of less than half of her qualified electors.

"Resolved, Seventh, that we urge all business men's organizations to refuse to be bulldozed into the position of aiding and abetting the 'wets.'

"Resolved, Eighth, that we recommend the work of the Antisaloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, our own church temperance society, and all unselfish efforts in support of the amendment for Oregon dry."

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the desk and ask to have read certain telegraphic communications from citizens of the country regarding the pending bill permitting the American registry of foreign-built ships.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

OMAHA, NEBR., August 5, 1914.

Hon. G. W. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolutions of Omaha Grain Exchange.

Whereas the State of Nebraska and adjoining States have just harvested the most abundant wheat crop known in the history of these States, a portion of which must find its market abroad; and

Whereas, unless the Government of the United States takes prompt action it will be impossible, in view of the general war now prevailing in Europe, for foreign commerce to be handled and shipments of grain to be made for export: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Omaha Grain Exchange, That the Government at Washington be, and it is, earnestly requested to make every effort to at once amend the navigation laws of the United States or take such other action as may be necessary to facilitate the exportation of American products by removing the restrictions on foreign vessels which wish to register under American laws or that wish to sail under the American flag. The exportation of American wheat at this time is a matter of vital importance to the agricultural interests of States lying in the Missouri Valley, and we earnestly urge that immediate steps be taken to enable their products to reach foreign markets.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and to the Senators from the State of Nebraska.

W. J. HYNES, president; F. P. MANCHESTER, secretary; J. A. CAVERS, BARTON MILLARD, F. S. COWGILL, J. B. SWEARINGEN, FRANK H. BROWN, W. J. HYNES, E. A. COPE, A. H. BEWSHER, ED P. SMITH, members of board of directors of Omaha Grain Exchange.

The marine engineers in the district of the Great Lakes protest against the enactment or suspension of any law that will permit persons to service as licensed engineer officers or deck officers in American vessels who are not citizens of the United States and licensed by the United States Steamboat-Inspection Service.

WM. S. BROWN,
Manager Marine Engineers' Lake Business Beneficial Association.

NEW YORK, August 3, 1914.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In order to make your proposed bill for the admission to registry of foreign-built vessels more effective I suggest that the provision for the suspension of laws prescribing that watch officers of vessels registered with foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States be altered so as to provide that the suspension be for a period of years, for example, a period equivalent to that which is required for the admissions of aliens to citizenship instead of leaving the matter of such suspension to the Executive order of the President. The reason for this suggestion is that if a large number of vessels should be registered under the proposed law the scarcity of American officers would make it difficult, if not impossible, to find citizen officers in case the President should revoke the suspension of the law on short notice. The suspension therefore should be statutory and for such a period as would enable foreign officers to acquire American citizenship and thus qualify for officers on the new class of ships of American registry.

J. PARKER KIRLIN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 3, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Owing to urgent existing circumstances and in order to permit Americans to continue marketing their crops and manufactured products, we are in favor of amending Panama Canal Act to permit all foreign vessels, irrespective of age, owned by American individuals or corporations, to obtain American registers, but limiting them to foreign trade only, excluding them from coastwise trade, as that trade is not affected by war conditions. To make this effective and to keep them permanently under our flag it will be necessary to permit such vessels to operate under same conditions of measurement, inspection, and crew as obtain under their present flags.

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 3, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Shipowners' Association of Pacific Coast, comprising vast majority of owners and operators of American vessels on Pacific coast, protest most vigorously against legislation permitting foreign-built vessels to engage in coastwise trade on either coast or between Atlantic and Pacific. No benefit can accrue to American shipping by such legislation, even in event of war, and great loss may be inflicted upon owners and operators of American-built vessels now engaged in these trades. Ask you to use all your influence and efforts to defeat any such proposed legislation.

As American citizens and officers in the American merchant marine, we strongly protest the passage of the act admitting foreign-built ships to American registry and officered by aliens. Can furnish 100 marine engineers from Boston alone.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 5, 1914.

Hon. JOHN R. THORNTON,

Please use your best efforts to have Senate take quick action on merchant-marine bill, cutting out all useless debates on legal points, as it is important for American commerce to secure bottoms for transportation of merchandise. Enlist aid of our Representatives in same cause.

Puget Sound Harbor American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots protest against the enactment or suspension of any law that will permit persons to serve as masters, mates, or engineers on American vessels who are not citizens of the United States and holding a United States certificate of license.

Respectfully,

Capt. P. MULLEN, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 5, 1914.

Senator JAMES P. CLARKE,
Washington, D. C.:

Golden Gate Harbor, No. 40, A. A. of M. M. and P., seriously object to the suspension of any law permitting vessels flying the American flag to be manned by foreign officers. There are many American citizens licensed as masters, mates, pilots, and engineers by the United States Steamboat Inspection Service who are available. We therefore enter a protest against any law permitting any but licensed American officers to man American vessels.

W. S. TOFEN, Secretary.

CHICAGO, ILL., August 1, 1914.

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce to-day:

"Resolved, That the Chicago Association of Commerce, upon the recommendation of its foreign trade committee, urges upon the Congress of the United States the immediate enactment of such legislation as will most readily procure the registration under the American flag of such vessels as are not now so admitted to registration, and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce."

ASTORIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 5, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In admitting vessels to American register believe that I am voicing sentiment of majority of northwest lumbermen upon insisting that they be admitted to coastwise or coast to coast service. We need this tonnage to compete for trade on Atlantic coast, and hope you can help to that end.

F. H. RANSOM.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 4, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The interests of northwestern apple and pear growers, as well as those of every fruit grower in United States, are vitally involved in proposal to admit foreign vessels to American registry. Exports of fresh apples from United States average for last three years approximately two and half million barrels annually, including boxes figured at three to barrel. All but insignificant proportion this tonnage has been transported in foreign bottoms, principally British and German, with transportation available probably over 3,000,000 barrels, including boxes, will find market in Europe this season. Without it this surplus will be thrown back on domestic markets, with results possibly disastrous. We urge fullest protection for this important export.

NORTHWESTERN FRUIT EXCHANGE, A. P. BATEHAM, Vice President.

Mr. THORNTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Louisiana, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented petitions of 128 citizens of Saratoga, Wyo., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of the City Council of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the retirement of aged and infirm civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 5695) for the relief of the Southern Transportation Co., reported it without amendment.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 6202) to repeal an act entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of May 1, 1888, and extend the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to certain lands in the State of Montana embraced within the provisions of said act, and for other purposes," asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1851) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 730) thereon.

DISTRICT COURT AT JONESBORO, ARK.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2167) to amend an act entitled "An act to modify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and I submit a report (No. 728) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the bill is not so wide in its scope as the title would indicate. It is a bill merely to change the time of holding court at Jonesboro, in the State of Arkansas. It will require but a minute or two to dispose of it, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered and acted upon at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That hereafter the terms of the United States district court for the Jonesboro division of the eastern district of Arkansas shall be held at Jonesboro on the first Monday in May and the fourth Monday in November.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to fix the time for holding the term of the district court in the Jonesboro division of the eastern district of Arkansas."

Mr. SHIVELY. From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

St. John, late of Company H, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, MUSCATINE, IOWA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6134) granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Bridge & Terminal Co., of Muscatine, Iowa, to build a bridge across the Mississippi River, and I submit a report (No. 727) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the report.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a matter that will take no time.

PAYMENTS UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I send to the desk a conference report on the bill extending the time for payment under reclamation projects, and I ask that it be now considered. I understand it is a privileged matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, and 16, and agree to the same.

MARK A. SMITH,
HARRY LANE,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
JOHN E. RAKER,
MOSES P. KINKAID,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], what disposition the report makes of the House amendment providing that appropriations for reclamation work in the future shall be made by Congress? I was not able to satisfy myself concerning the matter as the amendments were read by number, and I should like to be informed on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the Senate conferees were compelled to agree to the amendment put on the bill by the House of Representatives. In our judgment that was necessary to avoid losing the bill itself. The amendment preserves the fund as an irrigation fund but requires estimates to be made and appropriations to be made in pursuance thereof by Congress as to each particular item to be provided for by the fund. The appropriation must be made by Congress on appropriation bills, as other appropriations are made. That is the only difference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Do I understand that the Senator from Arizona is asking that the report be adopted? I hope that the report will be printed and go over until to-morrow morning, so that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What was the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have the report of the conferees printed and have it go over until to-morrow, so that we can have an opportunity to examine it. The whole northwestern section of the country is more or less affected by this bill, and a simple reference to the amendments by number is not satisfying to Members of the Senate. I may not have any objection to the report at all, but I should at least like to have an opportunity to see it in print in connection with the bill and amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the only material difference, I will say to the Senator, is that suggested by me, that the bill as agreed to by the conferees brings the reclamation projects under the jurisdiction of Congress under estimates made by the Secretary of the Interior. That is the only respect in which it materially differs from the bill as originally passed by the Senate. Except for personal reasons—my anxiety to get away from the city for a time—I would not insist on the consideration of the report to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not usually assume the attitude of an objector, and I should like very much to assist the Senator from Arizona, but I should also like very much to see the conference report in print. If the Senator will let the report go over for an hour or more, I think I will have an opportunity to examine it so far as I care to.

Mr. MYERS. I urge that the report go over until to-morrow. I should like to have it go over for 24 hours.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Of course in the face of objection, for which I am very sorry, the report will have to go over.

Mr. SHIVELY. No.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If not, I should like to move to take up the report.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest to Senators who are interested in this matter that they can examine the report before it is printed, and then later in the afternoon it can be called up for consideration. In that way I think we would lose no time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado. The only changes are in the RECORD, and I will call the attention of Senators to them as soon as I can get the exact record as to the only amendment on which any material disagreement has occurred.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I assumed that the Senator from Arizona was through. I do not wish to take him off the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I notice by reference to the calendar that the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and also that there are two notices for addresses immediately following the routine morning business to-day. In the meantime, while we are taking up the time of the Senate upon these matters affecting our internal affairs, our commerce is practically at a standstill. Petitions are coming in from all over the country requesting Congress to act in some way so as to give us means of transporting our enormous surplus products abroad. Our agricultural products, especially those of a cereal character, are this year the greatest in the history of the country. Prices have been depressed to a great extent because of this abundance in the crops of the United States. An opportunity has presented itself, on account of the serious war conditions in the Old World, of our receiving a fair price for these products if we can get them to the field of consumption. We all know that Great Britain takes by far the largest part of all of our exported food products.

I believe that Great Britain will be able to keep open the channels of trade between the United States and that country; and if conditions should become so stringent that the ordinary insurance company would not issue insurance to protect shipments of food from this country to Great Britain, that the British Government itself would see to it that they were insured. I made inquiry along that line this morning at the State Department, because of the rumor that Great Britain had taken such action, but I find no confirmation of those rumors at the present time.

In the meantime business is suffering; and it does seem to me that it is a far more important duty to provide for moving our crops and our exports abroad than it is to discuss, as we will discuss, perhaps for weeks, the trust bills; and I wish to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if bills for the relief of American shipping have been referred to that committee, immediately to bring those bills to the front and in some manner have this question disposed of. If the bills have been referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, then, of course, I appeal to the chairman of that committee. Properly, I should say, under ordinary conditions they should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce; but, because of the fact that a merely commercial matter was inserted in the Panama Canal act, these bills have been referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. At any rate, what I want to impress upon the Senate is the necessity of first relieving the condition of this country in respect to its exports before we do anything else. The cotton section of the country is demanding legislation, the other agricultural sections of the country are demanding legislation; and we ought to pass some bill within one or two days that would relieve the situation.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIVELY. The unfinished business, as I understand, is not now immediately before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not.

Mr. SHIVELY. I understand, further, that the bill which was discussed yesterday, touching the very matter of which the Senator is speaking, will be before the Senate in a few moments.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I call attention to the fact that two Senators have given notice that immediately after the conclusion of the morning business they would address the Senate on another subject, and I am rather appealing to them that we shall discuss at this time the bills relating to our shipping interests instead of the trust bills.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, at yesterday's session unanimous consent was given by this body that the pending bill for the registration of foreign-built ships be taken up immediately upon conclusion of the routine morning business.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not so appear upon the calendar, and I, of course, must take the calendar as my guide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about the proposition that when notice is served and put upon the calendar of the intention of a Senator to occupy the floor of the Senate at the conclusion of the morning hour, it is simply a mere matter of courtesy upon the part of the Senate as to whether he shall or shall not be permitted to occupy the floor. There is no rule of the Senate and no law of the Senate that authorizes a Senator to serve a notice of that kind, but that custom has grown up.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we all understand that, and yet——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was a general understanding on yesterday—how far it may be enforceable under the rules of the Senate the Chair is not now stating—there was a general understanding among the Senators who were present that after the conclusion of the morning business to-day the so-called shipping bill should be taken up and, at least, discussed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was a definite unanimous consent, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not stating how far it went under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that, and I will not take a moment's time if we can get to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to call attention to the fact that the unfinished business can not come up before the Senate until 1 o'clock to-day.

Mr. STONE. Is there any unfinished business?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. STONE. What is it?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Clayton antitrust bill.

Mr. STONE. When was it made the unfinished business?

Mr. CULBERSON. On yesterday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the request I made in reference to the conference report presented by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I have examined the report of the conference committee, and, while the bill as agreed upon is not entirely satisfactory to me or to my section of the country, I still think it is the best that we can do under the circumstances, and I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have the conference report, and intended to look over it for a few moments, the Senator from Oregon just having handed it to me, but, upon the statement of that Senator, I shall not take the time to examine it and shall not object to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, there are other matters that are pressing, and I shall only occupy the attention of the Senate a very few moments.

I understand that the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate opposed the House amendment under which selections for irrigation projects and the appropriations thereunder are hereafter to be made in accordance with action by Congress, but that they were unable to secure the elimination of that amendment without seriously endangering the passage of an important bill. For that reason I suppose it is futile to oppose the provision, but I desire to enter my vigorous protest against that change; it is plainly a backward step. We have had experience in connection with other appropriations, where action which should naturally be taken by the executive departments has been forced upon Congress by the claims of different localities. The pressure upon Representatives and Senators has been too evident. I trust that at a later time this question will come up and the apportionment of funds for these projects and their selection may be left where it belongs and where it was intended to be left when the original act of 1902 was passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. I want to say that the question of the extension of the time of payment is not involved in the controversy. If the bill simply provided that appropriations for reclamation projects shall hereafter be made by Congress, I should certainly oppose the bill with all the power that I have; but I am aware of the situation in the West in connection with the reclamation projects, where many of the farmers will be ruined financially if the time of payment is not extended, and therefore I allow the evil part of this bill to pass in order to get the extension of time that is absolutely necessary.

I fully agree, Mr. President, with the statement made by the Senator from Ohio as to future appropriations being made by Congress, because I know what it means to each Senator and each Member of the House and the influences that will be brought to bear upon them. In the past the head of the Reclamation Service, knowing the condition of each of the projects, has been better able to decide than any Member of Congress or Congress itself as to the amount of annual appropriation which should be made for the various projects.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me to say a word in response to the Senator from Utah? I will occupy only a moment.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, this matter was gone over very thoroughly, and I think Senators understand exactly the condition in which we were placed. In view of the disaster which would face settlers on irrigation projects if this bill should fail, we were forced, if you please, to accept this amendment. The proposition has been made, and I think it can be worked out, that this being a particular fund having nothing to do with the general funds of the Treasury the estimates sent down by the department will be left just as largely to the control of the head of the department as they now are, and in the appropriation bill itself provision could be made for an exigency fund, which would meet one of the objections strongly urged.

I think that through a guarded appropriation bill, made in conformity with the recommendations of the Interior Department, we shall have no difficulty, in spite of all that has been said concerning pork-barrel assaults on the General Treasury. I think we will all concede that Congress ought to have the say about what shall be done concerning appropriations from the general funds of the Treasury if a demand is ever made on the general fund at all.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I just want to say that I signed the conference report with very great reluctance. I consider the provision put on the bill in the House a very unwise if not a vicious provision; but we were confronted with the proposition of no bill at all or agreeing to this amendment. For the reasons stated by the Senator from Utah, which I realize very fully, I felt compelled to sign this conference report rather than have the bill fail, because I know the condition of many of the settlers under the various irrigation projects; and for their relief and for their help it is absolutely necessary and essential that the other parts of this bill should be passed.

I have not very much hope from the suggestion made by the Senator from Arizona, but something may come out of it. As I say, however, I have no hope from that. We are simply forced to take this bill with this amendment, and that is all there is to it, to get the relief that is absolutely essential to the settlers under many of these various irrigation projects. For that reason, and that reason alone, I signed the conference report.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I view with great alarm the adoption of this report. I am opposed to it, and I shall vote against it. I would rather stay on the 10-year payment plan of reclamation projects than to adopt this report and have the bill amended in this way.

I think the expenditure of the reclamation fund is right where it belongs and ought to be—under the administrative department of the Government. It can handle it better, it knows the needs better, it knows conditions better than Congress can possibly know them; and it has been well conducted. I have no fault to find with the administration of the Reclamation Service of the Government. It is in competent hands, skillful hands, hands that understand the business, and the work is proceeding well.

If we take the control of these expenditures away from the Reclamation Service and put it in Congress, I think it will make just what is popularly called a "pork-barrel" proposition out of it. It will not be decided on its merits. It will be subject to wirepulling and intrigue and pressure and influence of all sorts, wholly independent of merit, and will be decided in a manner far removed from the merits of the proposition.

I know by experience what it takes to get money from Congress for reclamation projects, and I predict that when this is put in the hands of Congress every reclamation project in the West will be up against just the same thing that the Flathead reclamation project in Montana is up against every year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] stated he was opposed to this bill, but that he would vote for it because of the exigencies of the matter, I presume, in the Western States. I should like to know what very bad result would follow if this bill were defeated. The Government has never yet taken a man off his place because he failed to pay, has it? Will the Government do it if we allow this matter to run over another year?

I know that in my own State and in other States those holding lands under the Reclamation Service are years behind, and they have not been deprived of their holdings. Would it not be better to take the chance of the Government not foreclosing upon their rights for another year than to vote this kind of a measure upon them?

Mr. MYERS. I think so, and I am going to vote to reject the report. I would rather stand on the law as it is than turn this matter over to Congress and make an annual free-for-all scramble of it, and take the chances of projects with less merit getting more money than other projects of more merit.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I understand, the particular change in this bill is the extension of the time for payments and scattering it over a longer period of time.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; that is it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is practically all there is to it, I do not believe the Government is going to foreclose the right of any citizen because of his inability to make his payments. That being the case, why should not we defeat this bill, if it is a bad one, and take our chances on getting the right kind of a bill another year? I have not much sympathy with the idea that we should vote for a vicious measure because it is the best we can get at the present time, unless it can be shown that we are going to suffer materially because we do not adopt that measure at this time.

Mr. MYERS. I prefer what I consider the lesser of the two evils. I prefer to endure the evils that we are now enduring rather than to go to those we know not of but may easily surmise. I know what the Flathead reclamation project in Montana has had to go up against every year since I have been here. There are three Government reclamation projects in Montana; and if I had to go through what I have to go through every year for the Flathead project in the case of every one of three others, making four in all, I would not be able to do it; that is all there is to it. I would not have any time or life left.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I will ask him if it is not true that the projects in his own State which have given him so much trouble are not involved in this question, because they are outside the regular Reclamation Service?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; in large part.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Those are sui generis. They do not come under this scheme. The Senator's trouble is what we will all have when we go to the General Treasury for an appropriation. That will not affect this particular fund, because the general public are not interested in this particular fund. I trust this appropriation will be placed ultimately under the committees of the Senate and the House that know the conditions in the Western States. This being a specified, particular fund outside of which they can not go, the recommendations of the Secretary to Congress are tantamount to the Secretary's appropriation of the money in the first instance. We must bear in mind the awful disaster which I know threatens the extreme Southwest without the relief under this bill. I know that nothing but disaster and ruin await thousands and thousands of people who have been standing waiting for this relief.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have had experience in trying to get money voted by Congress for a reclamation project in Montana. Of course, it is somewhat different from this, but it would be the same in this respect, that each Senator or Representative who has a reclamation project in his State would be trying to get all he could for his project, and if he got more for his project some other project would have to get less. There would be, I apprehend, constant faultfinding and criticizing of the estimates made by the Interior Department, assaults upon them, and a general endeavor to upset and do over the whole thing.

I know how it is when these things are debated before the Senate. I know the misinformation that exists, the misunderstanding, the lack of information, and the bewildered condition of Senators.

The thing will be debated here for three days, and when the bell sounds for a roll call Senators will come out of the cloak rooms and committee rooms and went to know what it is about, and you will have to explain to them privately in three seconds what has been debated in the Senate for three days.

It is absolutely impossible to get an intelligent vote on a proposition under those circumstances. I believe that many a vote will be taken under a misapprehension where hundreds of thousands and, in fact, millions of dollars are involved; and the rights and lives and existence of thousands of settlers and their families will depend on Senators coming out of committee rooms and cloak rooms and trying to learn in three seconds what has been debated for three days and what has been passed upon by the department.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if that observation does not apply pretty generally all down the line to the bulk of the legislation that is passed here?

Mr. MYERS. Well, I am not saying as to that. I am saying as to those things in which I am most directly interested.

I presume, probably, this report will be adopted; but before it is done I wish to make my earnest protest and to say that I would rather stand on the 10-year payment plan, I would rather stand on anything than to go to this sort of a grab-game proposition. I predict dire results, I predict injustice, I predict suffering to settlers and neglect of reclamation projects. I believe the time will come, if this is done, when you will rue what you have done, and will see the deplorable consequences of it. I for one am opposed to it, and can not find language sufficiently strong to express my unalterable opposition under any and all circumstances, whether the bill fails or not. I am opposed to substituting one evil, and what I consider a worse evil, for another evil, and I shall vote against the report.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have one particular objection to the acceptance of this report. It will be remembered that the Senate adopted as an amendment to the bill as originally presented section 16 of the bill, which provided:

SEC. 16. That the district court of the United States for the district where the lands or some portion of the lands included within any reclamation project are situated shall have jurisdiction of all suits brought by the United States or the Secretary of the Interior for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and jurisdiction of all suits now pending or which may be hereafter instituted by any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district in behalf of the water users and settlers thereon for the enforcement of the provisions of this act and of the provisions of the reclamation law as referred to and defined in section 1 of this act.

Mr. President, it seemed to me that this was a most reasonable provision, and a most reasonable amendment to the bill as it was presented to the Senate. This reclamation law is quite drastic, so far as the individual settler and homesteader is concerned. The Secretary of the Interior may cancel his entry on a reclamation project for noncompliance with the law or the requirements of the Department of the Interior in regard to settlements, improvements, and so forth. The Secretary of the Interior may declare a forfeiture of all payments made upon the failure to pay any particular installment, and it has been treated as something outside of the jurisdiction of the courts to interfere as long as the question is pending before the Interior Department.

So much for the individual settler or homesteader and his rights. This amendment simply provides that a suit may be instituted in the United States court by a water users' association or an irrigation district in behalf of the settlers, and that the United States district court shall have jurisdiction of suits of this kind.

The question has been raised by the Interior Department and by the Government in a case now pending relating to the Belleview reclamation project. The question of jurisdiction of the court is raised in that case, in proceedings brought to enjoin the department from declaring cancellations and forfeitures and shutting off the water supply because of a failure to pay an assessment deemed unjust, partly because the cost of the project is far beyond the original estimate made, exceeding, as it does, by $78,000 or more the original estimate made by the Interior Department. Full payment of the installments and charges for water supply not having been made, notice was served that the water supply would be shut off, and these proceedings were instituted for the purpose of preventing that. The suit was brought in the State court, removed on the application of the defendants to the Federal court, and there the question of jurisdiction on the part of the court was raised. The district court sustained that jurisdiction, and the case is now on appeal before the circuit court of appeals upon the question of jurisdiction.

Since the suit is to be brought by the water users' association or the irrigation district in behalf of the settlers, and is not a suit to be brought by any individual settler complaining of a wrong on account of the cancellation of his entry or on account of the forfeiture of payments he has made, it seems to me but just that the court should have jurisdiction to settle these questions. Senators will remember the amendment, section 16, as originally introduced provided that there shoud be no cancellation of an entry and no forfeiture declared until there had been an adjudication of the matter in a court of competent jurisdiction. That portion of the amendment was stricken out in the Senate, and the amendment was left so that the water users' association alone, or an irrigation district, might have the right to institute the proceedings in behalf of many, and that the court might have jurisdiction over any such suit now or hereafter to be instituted.

So I see no reason, Mr. President, why section 16 should be stricken from the bill. I think it is a wholesome and an appropriate provision to be added here, and I oppose the report of the committee because it has acceded to the House amendment striking out that section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator that the Senate conferees held out as long as they felt they were justified in doing in behalf of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. One of the strong points that the House members insisted upon, however, was the very fact the Senator stated, that the district court had already decided that the district court has jurisdiction in these matters, and they said the higher court may sustain that decision, and therefore such legislation will be absolutely unnecessary. Furthermore, the department was very strongly opposed to this provision, and that was one basis for the House insisting upon its position.

I wish to assure the Senator that the Senate conferees did all they could to retain this amendment, because we were in sympathy with it and with its purposes, but the House was inflexible on this as well as on the other amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I appreciate what the Senator from Washington has said in that regard. It also raised the question of jurisdiction in the court below. It is insisting upon the want of jurisdiction before the circuit court of appeals now.

I merely wish to refer more explicitly to the point relied upon by the Government; these are the grounds of the objection to the jurisdiction:

That the corporation plaintiff is not the proper plaintiff to claim or to receive the interlocutory injunctive relief granted by the lower court.

That the judiciary can not interfere by injunction with the exercise of proper governmental functions of a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States, to wit, the executive branch thereof, as to the acts of the officers of the executive branch not unlawful nor ministerial, but requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of its officers. Defendants assert that the matters complained of in the amended bill are within the exclusive control of the executive department of the Government, free from the control of the courts.

That this action is a suit against the United States to compel specific performance of this contract by enjoining the breach thereof.

That the United States district court was without jurisdiction to give the interlocutory relief appealed from.

These are the points now made in the circuit court of appeals by the Government, represented as it is by the Reclamation

Service, and the Reclamation Service, it is understood, is vigorously opposed to section 16 of the bill, and would deny to the water users the right to a hearing in the courts under any circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] declared that the failure to pass this bill at the present session would result in great disaster to the southwest section of the country. I should like to ask the Senator to state in what particular form this disaster will be manifested if we fail to pass the bill as the House has compelled us to amend it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The truth is that each one of us in every irrigation enterprise confines his vision very largely to his own particular locality, and so it is in the case now before us.

This bill stops the monopoly of the holdings within these irrigation districts and forces the unused land to pay its part in the development, and breaks up monopoly in speculative land.

Under the present law these men are bound to pay, and the time is up now for many of them to commence paying on these projects. They started out with $30 an acre, and most of them, under the rule, with which the present Secretary had nothing to do, they have increased; it is double, treble, quadruple in cases. Take one case that comes under my own knowledge. Starting out with $30 an acre——

Mr. McCUMBER. That was the estimate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is now $80 an acre that they have to pay in 10 years.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is merely the difference between the estimate and the reality.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not altogether. I am not complaining so much of that as I am of the condition of overhopefulness of the people and of the department in starting into these irrigation projects.

It requires more than you may think when you come to the estimates as first made. They are no more than started when the development gets larger and larger and it involves an enormous expense. Those already on the land have to bear their part of it, and the result of it is that it is impossible for any one of them, without bankruptcy, unless he is a man already very well to do, to meet the conditions of the present law as to the payments.

This bill not only does extend this time, but if the Senator will read it he will see that it has been worked on months and months with the most careful study; and after consultation of the two committees and consultation with the department, as a result of six months of labor the bill has been evolved, either wisely or not. That is a matter for the Senate now to decide.

Mr. McCUMBER. The particular point I wanted to know was whether or not the Senator believes that disaster would be caused by the Government foreclosing its interest as against a claimant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They can do it if they want.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know they could, but they never have done it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But that is no security for a man struggling for his life.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know; but it is some security if we do not pass this bill until next winter. We may then secure legislation that all would agree would be just and fair.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You can not get any other legislation on this subject through the House of Representatives. I doubt whether you could pass it on the floor of the Senate when the question is squarely brought up, when we leave it to the Senate to decide whether or not one department of the Government that is handling eighty or ninety million dollars, without a single brake on it, should do as it pleases with it; and that is what is the matter with the House of Representatives. It is caused by the act of four committees and the investigation of these enterprises. They feared that a great waste of money had occurred, and if they had been held down to the estimates they never would have occurred.

But, be that as it may, you will never get a bill next year, and you never will get one as good as this, in my opinion, in all the other provisions, aside from this one amendment. There will be no chance next year more than there is now to get the bill through without the amendment now on it.

As I have said before, as to the mere fact that the Secretary of the Interior in making his estimates to Congress with whatever logrolling you please, it is the same logrolling we have had with the Secretary ever since the irrigation projects were started. We come to him to get an estimate, and if there is not some very strong argument made in Congress to show that that estimate is altogether wrong those estimates will be generally accepted, particularly so as they are confined to a particular fund with which the General Treasury is not at all interested. So we shall have less trouble than my friend from Montana apprehends in that respect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I certainly regret to note the pessimistic spirit of the Senator from Arizona to the effect that this bill is not a good bill, and that we probably never will be able to get a proper and just measure upon this matter through both Houses. I can not believe it.

I call the attention of the Senator to one element that should be stricken out—the provision for a hearing before the courts. Under the court procedure, if an action was brought by the Government to cancel the right of the claimant, the court, under its equity powers, would fix a date, at least, in which the claimant might redeem. The Government has no such power. The department could give no such right to redeem within a certain time unless it absolutely disobeyed the law. That I consider as one of the great features that was gained by the amendment placed on the bill by the Senate.

There are other features which I do not care to discuss, but it does seem to me that the Senator has not shown a good case for the adoption of a bill which he admits or is compelled to admit is against the view of the Senate and which Senators generally believe to be vicious and wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator has in his memory that very good bills have been brought into the Senate, but the Senate will not pass them. I remember that the Senator's bill was a just bill, and he was as confident of the necessity of it as I am of the necessity of this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true. I still have hopes for that legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator is living on that hope, but men can not live on hope alone. When we see ten or fifteen thousand farmers relegated to hope for a living I begin to get a little nervous on their account.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I rose to say a word in view of the idea advanced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that we had better allow this bill to fail of passage than to accede to the principle of the amendment put on the bill by the House. I do not think so. The Senator is correct, of course, in saying that the Government has never yet endeavored to drive from his claim any settler on a reclamation project who has been delinquent in a payment for his land that is due from him. But of course the law commands the officers of the Government to do just exactly that thing, and in a way they are disregarding their obligation and their duty under the law unless they do just exactly that thing.

Furthermore, and more important even than that, Mr. President, is this consideration: The settler upon the project is living from day to day and from week to week and from month to month in the dread that just exactly that thing will be done. Accordingly he is paralyzed in his every effort.

Shortly after the present Secretary took charge of the Interior Department, as will be recalled, he called representatives of the settlers under all these various reclamation projects here for a general conference, and they all came with one common plea, asserting that it was imperative that the time within which they were permitted to make payment should be extended. They had different views about a great many of these questions, but all spoke of the imperative necessity of relief of this character. It has been delayed a long time now, and despair, I fear, will overtake many of them if they are again disappointed in their expectation of relief of this character.

Mr. President, I regret indeed the necessity which seems to impel acquiescence in the adoption of the principle of the House amendment. I am not unmindful at all of the troubles which are in store, so eloquently outlined and so truthfully outlined perhaps by my colleague, but I beg the Senators to bear in mind at the same time that there was a wise public policy back of that provision in the Constitution which declares that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States except in consequence of appropriations made by law. We must all recognize the fact to be that this money is being paid out of the Treasury of the United States without any appropriation whatever by law, and whether the statute flies in the face of that constitutional provision or not, we all know there was a great struggle back of that provision in the Constitution. The Kings of England claimed that they had certain resources at their command and they were entitled to make use of those moneys as they saw fit without the interposition of Parliament at all. We have in a way given countenance to that principle in this legislation. There is much to be said, Mr. President, in favor of the principle that is thus expressed in the House amendment.

I feel that it is in a way unfortunate for these reclamation projects, but at the same time I feel that the principle will be insisted upon in the future as resolutely as it is now; and it appears to be a fixed purpose upon the part of the House to incorporate this provision in the measure. So, it seems to me, we might as well accept the inevitable now as later. Accordingly, I shall support the report.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me just answer the Senator on one proposition. The Senator alludes to the constitutional provision for the appropriation of funds for carrying on any Government energies. Does not the Senator know that this was an appropriation—that by the very law the Government appropriated all the funds that would arise from the sale and disposition of public lands? That has already been appropriated. The settlers took their lands under that law and under that appropriation. Now we put a string to that appropriation, and say that Congress may or may not appropriate the money which has already been appropriated by Congress for this particular purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter upon any discussion of the soundness of the proposition, which I barely suggested in my remarks; but, of course, if the Senator from North Dakota is correct in his view about the matter, we could then pass a revenue act imposing a duty upon certain imports, and we could appropriate everything that came from that source for a governmental purpose for all time. We could then make a levy of a duty upon other goods and appropriate that to certain governmental purposes for all time. In other words, Mr. President, I doubt the power of Congress to set aside certain revenues of the Government for all time for a specific purpose without any further interposition on the part of the Congress.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I want to make one more suggestion as to my apprehension of the future that has been occasioned to me by some remarks made by those esteemed Senators who sat on the conference committee. I have no doubt they stood up for us well and did all they could; but they come back and say unless we accede to this the whole bill will fail, because the House conferees will not recede.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let me tell the Senator that I did not see the necessity of stating anything about it; but it was proposed to require the payment of interest on every dollar of this money, and it was only beaten by 2 votes in that body; and the proposition was beaten by only 4 or 5 votes to turn this money into the general fund. They came near doing that and putting us in the attitude you have been in with your Flathead Indian question.

Mr. MYERS. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have kept both those out. It was only by two votes that we avoided a heavy interest on this money.

For the same reason, in this expenditure of $80,000,000, $90,000,000, or $100,000,000, or $200,000,000, that was the only thing we asked, and that is inevitable because, as the Senator has well said, you had just as well meet the inevitable to-day as to go back, for it would be a great deal worse the next time you make the effort to get a bill out of the House. I speak, knowing what I am talking about, if the present House is still in control.

Mr. MYERS. I am satisfied the Senator knows what he is talking about. He always does. I give him credit for that. I am not finding fault with our conferees. I am complimenting them. But what the Senator says only bears me out in the point I make. Our conferees come back here and tell us what is undoubtedly true, that unless we recede the House conferees say the bill shall fail and they will put in a provision for interest the next time. That is another threat hanging over our heads. That very same condition might arise if this becomes a law. Every time a bill appropriating money for reclamation projects is passed, when we fix it the way we think it ought to be, it will go to conference and the House conferees will have it in their power to say it must be changed so-and-so, and if it is not the whole bill will fail and nobody will get a dollar.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let me suggest to the Senator, what interest have the great eastern representatives in the Congress of the United States with a fund dedicated to this particular western project, crystallized in its limits, held sacred as one great fund? Can you conceive of any particular question that could arise between those people? There might be something as between you and me as to what ought to be done, but certainly we might look for no assault by the House of Representatives as to this particular fund.

Mr. MYERS. I think there is much opposition in the East to all reclamation work. I presume the conferees on the reclamation appropriation bill in the House and in the Senate in future, if this becomes a law, will be western men. I say the House conferees simply have it in their power to say this will be fixed our way or not a dollar shall be appropriated. The Senate may appropriate $1,000,000 for a certain project and the House conferees may say if you do not cut that down to $5,000 the whole thing will go by the board.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is subject to a point of order by anybody in the House if it was proposed to change the appropriation. This is a fund already set aside by law for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. It is in the power of the conferees, I understand, to raise or lower the amount within the limits prescribed by Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator realize the fact that this reclamation fund is to be repaid by the settlers?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Consequently the people of the East are not affected and they are not going to attempt to control these matters in the West. This fund, when once appropriated by Congress, has to be repaid by the settler himself. It is a matter exclusively within the discretion, as it ought to be, of Senators and Representatives from the West. If it were a fund like the river and harbor fund I could see that interminable difficulties would arise, but they can not arise, in view of the fact that these moneys are to be repaid. This very bill provides for the repayment.

I want to call the Senator's attention, then, to this: I happened to be in the House of Representatives when the discussion upon one of the phases of this bill arose, and the request was made to have an interest charge made. It was only upon the speech of Mr. UNDERWOOD that a majority appeared against it. He went on the basis that this was the reclamation of vast areas of Government land, and that it was necessary that the same policy of making homes for the people should prevail under this bill as under the homestead law. And yet, notwithstanding the powerful plea which he made, he was only successful by, I think, two or three majority.

I want to say that if this bill fails there has got to be other relief given to this end; and if that is true, the matter will again have to go to the House of Representatives, and I do not believe you will ever be able to get so favorable a condition from them as that which has been given in this bill.

The conferees have been faithful; the members of this committee are loyal to the interests of the West; and they have come to the conclusion that this is the best thing out of the deal at the present time. That being true, it seems to me that we ought to approve the conference report.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have not said a word against our conferees; I have been saying much for them.

The Senator says that this money is all to be repaid by the settlers. Some Senator or Representative may get up and say the crop is going to be a failure; it is all right for settlers to pay out; but they are not going to be able to pay out; just as was said about the Montana Flathead project here, it is all right if the white settlers are going to pay out, but they can not pay out. It will be taking a risk, and they will say this is taking a risk.

I do not believe in letting the House crack the whip over our heads, veto what we do, and say, "You must take so and so or you will not get anything." We have seen too much of that; and we shall see more of it if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I heard the Senator suggest that eastern men have no interest in this matter.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; it was another Senator, not I, who said that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, some other Senator said it. I want simply, in a word, to say that, as the Senator knows, every representative of an Eastern State in this body voted for the irrigation bill.

Mr. MYERS. I beg to repeat I was not the Senator who made the statement referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. I want the Senator to understand that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was some other Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am the Senator who said that, in the sense of expressing the hope that Senators from the East would continue the policy they had heretofore pursued and continue to assist in that manner the development of the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not allude to it by way of criticism, and I now recall that it was the Senator from Colorado who said it. I want to say now that I think I voice the sentiment of certain Members of this body from the East in saying that any legislation that is at all proper which will aid the settlers on irrigated or on nonirrigated lands in the great West will receive our cordial support, but, after all, we are not unmindful of the fact that the matter of administering the irrigation laws has not been as wise in some respects as it ought to have been; and I think it would be well for western Senators not to ask too much, so far as the future is concerned. I do not know the details of this bill, but I will say to the Senator from Montana that if it meets, in any reasonable degree, the existing requirements, the report ought to be agreed to. Then in the future there may be men in the other body who will be more liberally disposed than is the present House of Representatives on this matter, and I know they will be met with cordial liberality in this body; and something more may be done than this bill provides for the present. It seems to me that Senators ought not to urge unusual things, even though they may be right, and undertake to defeat a bill that does not fully meet their views.

Mr. President, I only say this for the reason that I want to go on record once more, as I have several times before, as a friend of the irrigation projects and as a believer in a liberal policy on the part of the Government.

The settlers have not kept their promises; they could not do so, I presume; they have not met the requirements of the law; I presume they could not have done so; but let us be reasonable about this matter, get the best we can to-day, and try for something better to-morrow, if it is available.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I know some of the eastern Senators and Representatives who have taken, I thought, too much interest—more than I like to see them take—in western projects. I do not accuse them of taking too little interest. Now, as an instance of what I have in mind, the Senate appropriated at this session $250,000 to the Flathead reclamation project in Montana, while the House of Representatives had appropriated but $100,000. Anyone who knows anything about the matter knows that the sum of $250,000 for that project in one year is a mere pittance and not what it ought to have, yet when my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and I appeared before the Senate and House conferees the House conferees calmly announced that we could take $200,000 or get nothing; that if we did not take $200,000 they would return to the House and have the House go back to its original proposition of $100,000; that they would see the entire appropriation bill fail unless we took $200,000, and we were compelled to take it.

Our conferees did all they could, but they were powerless; in fact, one of our conferees, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], stood out for $250,000 to the end, and would not sign the report because the $250,000 was not allowed; but the majority of our conferees, after doing all they could for us, had to recede, and we had to take $200,000 or nothing. That, in my opinion, is just what will occur every year in the future. The House conferees will map all this out to suit themselves, and say to us, "You will take this or get nothing."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask for a vote on the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that at the close of the morning business to-day I would submit some observations on the unfinished business. In view of the situation in which we find ourselves I shall withhold until to-morrow any observations upon that bill which I may have to make, in order that I may not be even an humble instrument in impeding the progress of the shipping bill; but I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business I shall submit some remarks.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire withhold his remarks for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in order to expedite the passage of the shipping bill the Interoceanic Canals Committee held a meeting this morning for the consideration of the various amendments offered yesterday, and the committee concluded to accept as a substitute for section 1 of the House bill as amended by the committee the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], with some slight modifications which are quite satisfactory to him.

With regard to the second section, the committee accepted the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], with a slight modification, which is satisfactory to him. As this is an important change, perhaps I might take the time of the Senate now to read it, although later the Secretary may read all of the changes.

We have had numerous telegrams within the last day or two from organizations of sailors throughout the country protesting against foreigners being employed in the watch of vessels admitted to American registry, and we probably meet the attitude of all American sailors by the change embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. With that amendment the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever he shall find that the number of available persons qualified under now existing laws and regulations of the United States to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act is insufficient, to suspend by order, so far and for such time as he may find to be necessary, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposed an amendment yesterday containing the provision that all ships purchased by American citizens or corporations during the next year must be approved by the Secretary of State before American registry is granted. The committee very carefully considered this amendment, but thought it inadvisable to incorporate it in the bill, for this reason: Every transfer of a foreign ship in a foreign port must be approved by the United States consul, who, under existing law, will inquire into the details of the transaction; and it is to be assumed that upon the passage of this bill the Secretary of State will give such instructions as he deems necessary to our consuls abroad as to the care which they should exercise before approving any such transfer. After the transfer is made, if it be made abroad, before the ship is admitted to American registry it must appear in an American port and must there be examined by the customs officers. The customs officers before granting registry will undoubtedly act under instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of that department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New York, and the committee as well, have misapprehended and misunderstood the amendment I have proposed. My amendment does not contemplate that the Secretary of State shall approve the purchase of the ships, but shall approve the certificate of registry before it is granted.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand the purpose of the amendment, but by law that duty is now confided to the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the Government, and why transfer it to another department?

An additional suggestion which influenced the committee in its attitude is this: As was stated yesterday, if an American citizen under this proposed law, or, indeed, under the existing law without any change whatever, subject only to the five-year limitation, purchases a foreign-built ship from a belligerent it is a personal transaction. That ship may be seized by a belligerent. It may be captured. The American owner will then have an opportunity to prove in a prize court that his purchase of the ship was made in good faith and not for the purpose of evading the consequences of the war. It is a personal transaction with him. It does not touch our Government. If we make a declaration in this act that registry shall not be allowed to a foreign-built ship except with the approval of the Secretary of State, may we not be involving our Government in some of these transactions?

It is for that reason that the committee thought it inadvisable to insert such a provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; this amendment does not interfere with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It adds the approval of the Secretary of State. I do not care anything about the seizure of the ship. This is not for the purpose of protecting the owners. I understand that if they desire to buy a ship, and if they violate the international laws, or whatever laws may apply to them, they may lose their ship.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The laws of neutrality.

Mr. CUMMINS. I care nothing about that. The contingency is abundantly provided for in the law. What we are about to do, however, is to meet an emergency. We are about to encourage the purchase of foreign-built ships under extraordinary conditions. I can easily conceive that if we change our law to meet this emergency, and as a result of that change Americans should buy a German ship, for instance, and the German ship were permitted American registry as a formal matter—because a thing of that kind does not come before the Secretary of the Treasury personally; it is in the general jurisdiction of the collector of the port, I assume, and all the business will be done by subordinates——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Right there, if the Senator will permit me, in connection with the last statement, does the Senator believe that, with the hostilities abroad, the Secretary of the Treasury will not immediately give careful instructions to the collector of every port as to the care he must observe before giving registry to foreign-built vessels?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that due care would be exercised by the collector of the port; but, pursuing the illustration I had in mind, we pass this law in order to enable our people to buy German ships or ships of belligerents.

Mr. O'GORMAN. They can do that now under the existing law if they are not over 5 years old.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that. They can do it if the ship is not over a certain age.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the ship is not more than 5 years old.

Mr. CUMMINS. But we are extending that provision, and why? To enable our people to buy ships which they could not otherwise buy; to enable us to meet the emergency or exigency that is now upon us.

Now, suppose we do that; how will England look upon the act? How will France look upon the act, in view of our relations with those countries and with every other country? We must be prudent and careful and be sure that we give no national offense. If the department of our Government which has in charge our relations with foreign nations looks over the transaction and finds that there is nothing in it that would be unfriendly or unlawful, then we have, I think, an assurance that the privileges which we intend to grant by this act will not be abused, and that no international complications will grow out of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Suppose, notwithstanding the approval by the Secretary of State under the Senator's amendment, if it were adopted, the ship nevertheless was captured by a belligerent, would it involve us in any complications?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would involve us, in a way. I am not thinking of that event, however. I am thinking of the effort to preserve friendly relations with all the world. I am hoping that the purchases that may be made, if any are made, under this act will not arouse the hostility of the nations from whose subjects we purchase these ships and whose commerce we intend to take if we can. I hope this emergency will not impel the United States into strained relations with the countries which, unfortunately, are now at war.

It was with that in mind and as an assurance to the nations of the world that we were not entering upon a new field without subjecting everything that was done pursuant to the act to the scrutiny of the very department that we maintain to carry on our intercourse with foreign nations, that I proposed this amendment, so that they would see in it a purpose scrupulously to observe our obligations created by treaties, created by international law, and above all created by the neutrality convention of 1909.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIVELY. I submit that the course which attains the object sought with the least change of existing law is the course that would obviate the very dangers which Senators profess to fear. The purpose of the measure in charge of the Senator from New York is to repeal the five-year limitation in the canal act. This would so modify the navigation code as to authorize American citizens to purchase available ships, wherever built, place them under the flag of the United States, and operate them in the deep-sea carrying trade. What is there novel or startling about this proposition that it should occasion the awful anxiety expressed on this floor? Ours is the only Government on the face of the earth to-day that denies to its citizen or its subject the right to purchase a ship in any foreign country whatever, bring it home, have it admitted to registry, put in its ocean marine, and sailed under its flag.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. SHIVELY. This being true, why all these fantastic visions of direful consequence should we enact this measure? So far from precipitating on the world some startling innovation, the measure imitates the example set and the settled policy pursued by every one of the belligerents in the present European war. Which of them could complain of a policy and practice in consonance with its own in conserving the interest of its merchant marine?

The bill relaxes no provision of existing law making ownership by citizens of the United States a condition of admission to registry. That department of the Government which now determines the questions of ownership and the citizenship of such ownership is the natural agency to regulate the question of watch and officers on the vessels to be admitted to registry under the proposed act. Why complicate and confuse the transaction by changing the practice and importing into each case the Department of State? As well say that for an additional safeguard we will also remit each case to the Department of Agriculture, and for further safety have three or four additional departments pass on the question. This would only add complications. It would substitute complexities for a simple and natural course. We should only make the changes necessary to bring the merchant ships under the flag of the United States.

It is not a question of securing more ships for the carrying trade of the world. There are plenty of ships now. It is a question of getting more ships which, despite the present disturbed conditions of the ocean-carrying trade, may be operated with the largest available security.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The statement that has been made so often, that this is the only country in the world that does not permit its citizens to buy ships wherever they can find them for sale, is not quite accurate. The German Government very frequently requires that ships shall be built in German shipyards, and it gives all sorts of rebates in the matter of shipping material and encourages its shipping in other directions. When the British Government put up $13,000,000, as it did, to build the Mauretania and Lusitania there was a condition in the contract that they should be built in British shipyards. So it is not a universal rule.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will permit a further word——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIVELY. The slender and remotely occasional limitations which the Senator invokes, and which have reference to colonial and military policy rather than to commercial marine, only tend to emphasize the rule. When the farsighted Bismarck began the work of building up a foreign carrying trade, he went to the Clyde, into the shipyards of the Armstrongs. He ordered eight iron hulls. He took them home and placed them in the German merchant marine under the German flag. Against this, loud protests went up from the German shipyards. But within less than two years the wisdom of Bismarck in replenishing the German marine with the best tools of the trade at the best bargains was vindicated even to the satisfaction of the German shipbuilders. Germany became the home of the ship. The German shipyards got the repairing. With the building up of the merchant marine by acquiring ships from all available sources, new activity came to the German shipbuilding industry. It improved on the art of shipbuilding until in the past few years it has been taking contracts for foreign battleship building against the competition of the whole outside world. When you buy a ship, in whatever quarter, and put it under the American flag, you are making a contribution to the future prosperity of the American shipyard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senator is in favor, is he, of striking down our navigation laws entirely, and permitting us to buy the old junk of every nation in the world and put it under the American flag?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, we can safely trust the common sense of the American business man on the question as to whether he will buy "old junk." Your navigation laws made "old junk" of our own merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, we will take out the words "old junk" and we will say "the ships of foreign countries."

Mr. SHIVELY. Let me say to the Senator that I know with what industry and persistence he has been advocating and supporting through many years our old navigation code, and I know and he knows that in the last five years not a single deep-sea vessel has been built in an American shipyard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Neither has one been bought under the Panama Canal act, which opened the market so that we could purchase them.

Mr. SHIVELY. That act did not go far enough to prove a panacea. There are too many other barbarisms in the navigation code besides the ship-construction section for that act with its little narrow five-year limitation to work a rehabilitation. The Senator has been the steadfast producer on an ideal theory that produces only a phantom merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President, I agree that no ships have been built, and they have not been built because the Government has not encouraged the building of them. That is the reason. The Senator's opposition was very potential in defeating the very bills which provided that the Government should assist.

Mr. SHIVELY. Oh, yes; the Senator came here with his usual mail-subsidy proposition, a nostrum inherently futile, and that wherever relied on has spelled disappointment and failure. It was an expedient that is only potential to take money from the Federal Treasury without adding a ship to our merchant marine. It was a part of that fatal policy under which the United States flag disappeared from the ocean.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like the Senator to point out to us the system to which he alludes.

Mr. SHIVELY. It is the system represented by our navigation code, which the Senator cherishes so fondly. It is the system under which the vast and superior interest of our ocean commerce was sacrificed to the short-sighted cupidity of the American shipyard, and sacrificed in vain. It was the system under which our deep-sea marine was strangled by a code that deprived it of access to the tools of the deep-sea trade on the only possible basis of successful competition. The same process that strangled our deep-sea marine put the deep-sea shipyard out of business. It was the system that confronted the American citizen who would invest in the ocean carrying trade with arbitrary, artificial obstructions, the effect of which no policy of Federal gratuities in the form of mail subsidies or ship subsidies could overcome.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have worked pretty well with England and Germany.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator utterly overestimates the influence of subsidy on the growth of the merchant marine of either of those countries. The vast bulk of the merchant marine of both countries has had no pecuniary connection whatever with government, and has attained its present proportions unsubsidized and unassisted by any influence even remotely associated with subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator know that England to-day is paying $10,000,000 a year in subsidies?

Mr. SHIVELY. No; I know that England is not paying $10,000,000 a year in subsidies. England is paying certain sums for the carriage of mails.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is quite a different thing from subsidy. To assume that a mail payment is essentially a subsidy is to project a mistaken idea of the whole subject. Of course, where the payment is for actual service rendered in carrying the mails it involves no subsidy whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. What does the Senator think would happen if we gave $10,000,000 a year in mail subventions to our shipping?

Mr. SHIVELY. Why, Mr. President, the effect of subvention on our shipping is not a matter of conjecture. There has been constant subvention under the Revised Statutes, as well as under the contract act of March 3, 1891. Under the latter act there has been distributed over $20,000,000. That act was to build up our merchant marine. It was to build up a system that was to become an effective auxiliary to our Navy. Over $10,000,000 of the disbursements under that act has gone into the treasury of the International Mercantile Marine Co. and its predecessor, the International Navigation Co. The International Mercantile Marine Co. is a New Jersey corporation. Through its subsidiary companies it owns and controls fleets comprising 126 vessels, of which not to exceed 6 or 8 fly the American flag. Though this company has absorbed more than half of the disbursements made from the Federal Treasury under the act of 1891, where have they added a single farthing to the volume of our merchant marine?

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator mean to say that any American subvention is paid to a ship flying a foreign flag?

Mr. SHIVELY. The facts speak for themselves. These payments from the Federal Treasury go to the International Mercantile Marine Co. They constitute a portion of the receipts of that company. The Senator admits that nearly all the ships operated by that company fly foreign flags?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. The contracts are made with that company. The payments are made to that company. Who are the beneficiaries of these payments?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are paid something for carrying our mails.

Mr. SHIVELY. They are paid without reference to the amount of mail they carry. There is no pretense of any relation between payments and service. The company receives precisely the same amount of payment, whether the ship carries a single postal card or a hundred tons of mail.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do the foreign Governments simply pay the cost of transporting their mails?

Mr. SHIVELY. In the great body of instances, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. When England pays $10,000,000 for transporting her mails while we pay $1,000,000 for transporting ours, is it possible that England pays only the actual cost of transporting her mails?

Mr. SHIVELY. In the first place England pays no $10,000,000 on account of her foreign mails, and in the second place we pay vastly more than $1,000,000 for the transportation of our foreign mails. There is no subject on which there is more subterfuge than in the statistics employed to make it appear that foreign merchant marine has been subsidized into its present proportions. Take the list of disbursements incorporated by the Senator in the report on his bill in 1910, which he says I was potential in defeating. Examine that list item by item. Disbursements of all kinds are bunched together and represented as subsidy payments, whereas the most casual investigation shows the great body of them to have been payments for actual service rendered and partaking in no sense of the character of subsidy. Many of them were payments on contracts let to the lowest bidder under conditions excluding the possibility of subsidy. By thus gathering up all disbursements made by foreign Governments and throwing them into a total the sum is made to approximate $46,000,000. With as much propriety and more candor you could claim that the over $50,000,000 paid to the railroads of the United States each year for the transportation of mails is subsidy. Payments for actual service are not subsidy, and it is not a good cause that requires them to be so regarded.

Mr. GALLINGER. England must have a great deal more mail than the United States, then, under those conditions.

Mr. SHIVELY. No inference of that kind follows. The fact is that the system of subsidies which the Senator advocates has been in vogue in the United States in a more or less aggravated form for over 40 years. Under the Revised Statutes our Government pays an American ship over twice as much per pound for carrying letter mail as it pays the foreign ship for like service, while under the contract act it, as a rule, pays many times as much to the American ship as it pays for like service under the Revised Statutes. The same is true in a somewhat less degree of the payments for other forms of mail. Yet all these expedients under the general law and under the special-contract act have not saved our merchant marine from constant decay and rapid disappearance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in view of the importance of this shipping legislation and its urgency, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the acceptance by the Senator in charge of the bill of the amendment I offered a few days since, I desire to make certain verbal changes in it in order to perfect it, without changing its meaning. I now read it in this form:

He shall find that the number of available persons qualified under now existing laws and regulations of the United States, to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act, is insufficient he shall suspend by order, so far and for such time as he may find to be necessary.

The provisions of a certain law.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will say while I am on my feet that the purpose I had in offering the amendment was to make it enforceable against the constitutional objections. I never had any idea that the President of the United States would suspend the operation of the Panama Canal act where there was an available supply of pilots and other persons to do duty as watch officers on the vessels. The delegation was too broad and too unconditional, and in terms addressed to the President without discretion to suspend the law whenever he thought the needs of foreign commerce might require it. It was vulnerable to attack under the doctrine laid down in the celebrated case of Fields against Clark, reported in One hundred and forty-third United States. It was a broad and unconditional grant of a discretion to suspend the law upon a pure matter of judgment. Under the doctrine laid down in that case the law suspends itself whenever the tribunal finds a certain fact to exist. The distinction is a fine one, but lawyers understand it. There is no reason why the matter should be made doubtful on this occasion.

For myself, I believe the time will come when such a broad delegation of power to the President will be sustained. The institutions of this country are so numerous, the climatic conditions so different, and the population and interests which constitute the Nation are so diversified that it is entirely possible that a general law should be suspended as to sections and people.

I believe if we had to-day a provision in the law that the foodstuffs of other countries should be admitted to this country where there was an insufficient supply at home, and that the President should have the right to deny admission except upon the payment of tariff duties when the supply was sufficient, it would be a better law than we have now. The agricultural interests complain, and probably will have more occasion to complain hereafter, that we broaden the market for that particular class of products in a much larger degree than in the case of others.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator think that would be a dangerous law?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If I thought it was a dangerous law I would not advocate it. I do not think it would be a dangerous law.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator think it would be dangerous for the United States Government generally to delegate to the President full power?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. To pass laws?

Mr. WEST. Yes; to pass laws—to make laws.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator interrogates me with a view of getting a categorical answer I say that there are instances where I think it would be exercised in a very wholesome way, and I indicated one of them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, that the provision of the bill as framed in the House is open to the constitutional objection which the Senator from Arkansas thinks he sees in it is, of course, largely academical; but there is ample authority to justify the precise language used by the House measure in the very case the Senator cites. It is true there was a dissenting opinion in that case by Chief Justice Fuller, who disagreed with the majority of the court; but in that case similar powers were conferred upon the President and sustained. I was about to call the attention of the Senate to two other changes that were made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator before we pass from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas indulge me for just a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is a wise amendment, and it ought to be adopted; but I suggest to the Senator from New York that there ought to be a further limitation upon this power. In the first place, as it seems to me, it ought not to be a power which the President may exercise under normal conditions. Congress ought to make the law upon this subject, and it ought not to turn it over to the Executive. But I recognize the fact that conditions are abnormal, and that so long as they remain abnormal it may be wise to invest the President with this authority.

I suggest to the Senator that there ought to be a time limitation, and I ask the Senator whether he would not accept an amendment to insert after the word "that," in section 2, the first word in the section, the words "until but not after the 1st day of August, 1915"?

That will limit the life of the legislation to a year. If at the end of that time the emergency shall not have passed, and we all expect that it will have passed long before that, there will be no difficulty in extending it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator surely does not believe that the President would suspend this requirement if no grave emergency existed. It simply resolves itself into a question as to whether we may confer this discretionary power with perfect confidence in the Executive in these trying times. Congress can change it at any time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, to my mind, hardly an answer. Of course, we expect that the President may use wisely any power which may be conferred upon him, but I do not think the Senator from New York would consent to vest in the President this power under normal conditions.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I would not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Therefore, it seems to me the Senator must concede that after these abnormal conditions have passed away the power ought to end, but it will remain unless we put a time limit upon it until affirmative action is taken by Congress to repeal the law. What harm can possibly result from inserting in the bill a provision which will limit the power of the President, under section 2, to a year?

Mr. O'GORMAN. For this reason: I assume that as soon as hostilities cease in Europe the President will not exercise the power we now confer upon him, and if he attempted to use the power in normal times Congress would speedily work a change in the statute.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the amendment contains a limitation and robs the suggestion made by him of some of its force? There is a limitation on the supply of the number. They can not exercise the power as long as there are available American officers to take these places. It does not make any difference whether it is in normal times or abnormal times, it is a fundamental condition on this power to suspend. I think it is properly safeguarded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will indulge me further, I would not consent to giving the President this power under normal conditions, even with the limitation which is made by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and being of that opinion, I think we ought to put into the law such language as will prevent the power from being exercised whenever these abnormal conditions have passed away.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from Utah that if a time limit is to be placed on this discretion of the President it should terminate at a time when Congress would naturally be in session, so that if there were any reason for doing so it could be extended? If the limit is at the end of one year, we all hope Congress will not be in session at that time, and there might some emergency arise before Congress came together.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I recognize the force of that suggestion, and I should have no objection to altering it and fixing it the 1st of December or the 1st of March next, or some other date.

The other limitation which I wanted to suggest to the Senator from New York was to insert a proviso that will require, under any and all circumstances, that the master of any vessel taken over from foreigners shall be an American citizen and that the majority of the officers shall be American citizens. Before the Senator from New York makes up his mind about that let me make a suggestion to him.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have my mind made up about that last proposition. If adopted, it would impair the value of this legislation. As a war measure all the Governments now engaged in hostilities are closing down their lighthouses, and the master of a ship capable of taking his vessel safely through those waters must have most intimate acquaintance with the land and the dangers of the sea that he traverses. Those men so familiar with that section of Europe will in nearly every case be foreigners. There is the greatest need at this time in having foreign captains managing some of the ships that will come in under the American flag.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from New York has that view of it, he ought not to consent to the limiting amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, because under the view of the Senator from New York it is necessary to continue the foreign master upon the ship in order that it may be navigated.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In that view he ought to provide affirmatively for continuing the foreign master.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator does not read closely or with his usual care. We provide that so long as there are available persons, naturalized citizens, capable of performing the duties of watch officers, no foreigners will be employed, but I assume that a naturalized citizen the captain of a boat familiar with the Pacific waters, but having no familiarity with the English Channel and the North Sea and the French coast, would not be available, even though we met the requirement in the statute that he should be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, emergency or no emergency, I will never consent to legislation which will permit the purchase of a foreign ship particularly in times like these, in a time of war, and permit the entire roster of officers and of men to be foreigners.

Mr. President, suppose the United States and England were at war instead of there being a European war, and Germany were to undertake to do what we propose to authorize the President to do under this legislation, that German citizens should take over an American vessel with an American captain, American officers, and an American crew, and put that ship under the German flag and set it upon the ocean. If I were the captain of that ship, with my country at war with a foreign country, having control of it, I am sure I should be strongly tempted to use it to the advantage of my own country if I could. I would owe allegiance to the United States; I would owe no allegiance to Germany.

I undertake to say that if we should take over a German ship with a German captain, German officers, and a German crew upon it, those men intensely loyal, as they are and ought to be, to their own country will find some method of utilizing the ship for the benefit of Germany in these hostilities, and whenever that is done the United States will have to reckon some way or other with the antagonists of Germany in this war.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Let me answer that question. The London conference, in 1909, recognized the fact that the nationals of a belligerent power might be employed on the vessel of a neutral power, and even though the vessel came under the control of a belligerent power, it would not remove or impress its own nationals. But, as I stated yesterday, under the terms of the London conference the nationals in that case would be required to make a declaration that they would not engage in the war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is true, Mr. President, but we are undertaking by this legislation in a time of war to change our own laws and to change them in such a way that a ship of Germany may be put under the protection of the American flag and utilized to help Germany in this war. If such a thing as that should happen, as it might well happen, we shall have complaint, and serious complaint, from England and from France, or if we should buy a French ship the same result with Germany.

Now, the only thing I am anxious about is to see that the ship which may be purchased is sufficiently under the control of American citizens that that can not be done. I think that very grave danger is to be apprehended if we shall purchase a ship of one of these belligerent powers and permit it to be entirely manned by the nationals of that country, and I think we ought to safeguard this legislation against that contingency.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that many of the vessels now flying the British flag and owned by American citizens are manned almost entirely by a British crew. They surely have in most instances British captains. If you would impose restrictions such as you suggest in this bill, you would discourage the very thing this legislation is intended to advance and promote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I fear that the Senator from New York does not quite get the force of my point. That is true, as the Senator has stated. I would not interfere with that condition by passing a law to alter it, but this is new legislation passed at this critical time. We are altering our laws at the very time when these nations are at war with one another, and under that legislation a thing could be accomplished that could not be accomplished under existing law. Without this amendment our citizens could not purchase a German ship and put it under American registry and man it entirely with German officers. Under the existing law we would have to put American officers on the vessel; all of them would have to be American citizens. Now, we propose to repeal that law or to permit the President in effect to do it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. To suspend it temporarily.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To suspend it and permit this German ship to continue under the same officers and crew, to permit that German ship or English ship or French ship, as the case may be, to put out to sea and be operated with the full complement of officers and crew owing allegiance to one of these belligerent powers, and altering our law in that respect at this critical juncture. If it should result in developing a situation such as I have suggested it would undoubtedly bring upon us complaint, and very serious complaint, from some other of the belligerent countries that might be affected.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York who constitute the watch officers on the vessels?

Mr. O'GORMAN. All responsible officers are embraced in the term watch officers. They get that designation because of the division of time usually into three watches of eight hours each. Sometimes there is a great number of watches.

Mr. STONE. The purser is not a watch officer?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; he is not a watch officer.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I share in some degree the apprehension expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that trouble might arise by putting an American ship entirely under the control of foreign officers. For American citizens to purchase a ship from a belligerent power and permit it to be officered and operated wholly by citizens or subjects of the country from which it comes strikes me as having in it elements of danger—danger, first, to the peace of the country, and, secondly, danger to the safety of the cargoes carried by the ship.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from New York, knowing that there is with him in this matter no mere pride of opinion, whether he thinks it would be practicable in such cases as I have stated, and as the Senator from Utah has stated, that instead of having all the watch officers from captain down made up of the subjects of belligerent power, an American commanding officer should be placed in command of the vessels.

In one of the amendments printed in the bill as I have before me there is an amendment authorizing active or retired naval officers to engage in this commercial service. Why would it not be wiser and better to provide in some way that an American commanding officer should be put in charge of a vessel purchased under this act from a belligerant power at least during the continuance of hostilities?

Mr. O'GORMAN. This is the difficulty with that proposition: Nearly all the ships now flying foreign flags and owned by American citizens have as captains foreigners, and we are not at all certain that all Americans owning foreign ships will take advantage of this law. They will only take advantage of it if it is attractive to them; and if we impose as a condition that they must discharge the captain, who has the confidence of the shipowner, we can see how that circumstance itself might deter the owner of the ship from changing the flag.

I think if Senators will only bear in mind that this is an emergency measure, which we expect to be in operation only a short time, Senators might not be too critical in viewing its provisions. We are confronted with a situation, as was stated yesterday, where millions of property of American citizens, cotton and foodstuffs, are awaiting transportation to foreign countries. The merchant marine belonging to foreign countries will not dare to put to sea at this time, being fearful of capture. The paralysis is now upon various sections of the agricultural activities of this country, and there is an immediate call for aid in this crisis. We should not view a piece of legislation designed for an emergency with that extreme care that we should devote to it in normal times and in the consideration of a normal proposition. We are surrounded by abnormal conditions. We are confronted with a grave situation, affecting the people of our own country.

I invited the inquiry yesterday, Is there any Senator who can offer a better plan to meet the situation?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, it was stated yesterday that we might pass a law permitting our coastwise vessels to engage in the foreign trade. I am advised by the Commissioner of Navigation that there is no need of a change in the law in that respect—that every owner of a coastwise vessel suitable for the foreign trade can enroll at once in any port and be relieved of his coastwise registry and obtain permission to engage in the foreign trade.

The change will involve the owner in no inconvenience. He is not permitted, however, to engage in both trades at one time. As I have said, the owner of an American vessel now engaged in the coastwise trade—and, as we know, all vessels so engaged are American vessels—can secure the necessary enrollment in the office of the collector of the port, which will permit him at once to engage in the foreign trade. Therefore there is no need of any legislation in that respect, but how many of our coastwise vessels are fitted for the over-seas trade is a very doubtful question. Even the Commissioner of Navigation will not hazard a guess. It will be remembered some months since, when we were discussing Panama Canal legislation and having occasion to consider our coastwise trade, we were advised that all the coastwise traffic of the United States embraced perhaps from 24,000 to 26,000 vessels, craft of various descriptions, and yet of that large number, excluding, of course, the railroad-controlled portion of it, there were but about 33 ships in the coastwise trade available for the business of the Panama Canal. If the number would shrink from 26,000 to 33 when we are considering ships available for the Panama Canal, we may well doubt whether there is any considerable number of our coastwise vessels suitable for over-seas trade.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to observe in this connection that the policy attacked here is not a departure at all, considering the world at large. England, as we know, has, perhaps, as much shipping as all of the remainder of the world combined, and she undergoes exactly the same peril with respect to all of her shipping that it is now feared ours will encounter if we allow on vessels admitted to American registry masters and other watch officers of other nationalities, because England does not require that any of the officers of her ships be English subjects at all. Every English ship to-day may be manned, so far as the law of England is concerned, by Germans or by other enemies of that country if there be any engaged in navigation.

Mr. President, this proposed statute is given a wider scope and significance than it really has. It refers to conditions precedent to the registry of a ship in America; but it is a matter of municipal regulation solely as to what conditions must obtain before a ship can register. Under our municipal regulations the watch officers on an American vessel must be American citizens; in the same way, heretofore it has been required the vessel must be American built. We are going to dispense in part with these requirements. The conditions prescribed by the law must be observed in order that a ship may have the advantages, privileges, and immunities that come under it to a ship that is registered. Those are all matters of local concern. So far as the world at large is concerned, they are not interested in the conditions that we prescribe in order that a ship may be registered here and thus obtain the advantages which our local law gives.

It was long ago settled, Mr. President, that any American citizen could buy a ship abroad and fly the American flag over it, and that it was entitled to just exactly the same protection from our Government as though it had been registered here. The wars of the past have repeatedly raised that question. The matter was very carefully considered in the year 1854 upon the outbreak of the Crimean War. Mr. Cushing, a very eminent lawyer and statesman as well, the then Attorney General, was asked by the Secretary of State for his opinion as to what rights a foreign-built ship bought by an American citizen had when it was not registered under our local laws. He declared that it had a perfect right to fly the American flag and to engage in foreign commerce just as if it were registered here.

That view, Mr. President, has been repeated again and again by the State Department. Such a ship is entitled to ply between the ports of foreign countries whose laws will permit its entry or departure just exactly the same as if it is registered here. The matter of registry is a matter of local concern alone; it does not affect the national character of the vessel. If the ship belongs to an American citizen she is entitled to fly the American flag, and her owners are entitled to all the protection that an American citizen may claim from his Government in respect to his property abroad.

The seizure of the vessels of an enemy is a survival from the times when all the property of a citizen of a belligerent was subject to capture and confiscation. In the darker ages an invading army appropriated as it pleased the property of the enemy of any character whatever on land or on sea; but in the evolution of the ages belligerents were forbidden by the law of nations to confiscate private property on land; but as to property on the sea it is still permissible for a belligerent in time of war to seize the private property of the citizen on the sea. If a ship flying the American flag should be taken, the sole question presented, if an effort were made to have her condemned as a prize, would be as to whether it was the private property of an American citizen. That would be determined by the prima facie bill of sale, if she was purchased, which is authenticated by the consul if the purchase is made in a foreign port. The foreign Government is in no manner concerned as to whether or not the ship is actually registered under the American law. Of course if she was that would be further evidence of the validity and the bona fides of the transfer made. If the sale is colorable only, to give a belligerent ship the appearance of a neutral character, the flag she flies would afford her no protection. If we are willing to take the chances that are suggested here; if England, owning half the shipping of the world, is willing to take the chances, other nations will not be heard, and have no right to be heard, to object, and have no interest in whatever regulations we may make as a condition upon which ships may enjoy the privileges, immunities, and advantages that are given by our local law to those that are registered.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] a question as to a matter which was not made clear to my mind yesterday in the discussion of the subject by him. I desire to inquire whether American-owned ships, flying a foreign flag, are entitled to the protection of our Government.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator is in any doubt about that. I made it very clear; indeed, I practically stated in a measure what has been said by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The nationality of a ship is dependent upon its flag. The ownership of the ship is an entirely different proposition. An American citizen has a right to own a ship plying in foreign waters, just the same right that he has to buy property in a foreign country; and our Government owes to an American citizen that protection which the Government ordinarily gives to any of its citizens in securing and protecting his property from the aggressions of other people or countries.

Mr. WEST. Just one more suggestion, right there. I am not familiar, I will state, with marine law, but I ask if the American citizen owning a ship flying a foreign flag is entitled to the protection of this Government, how would any enemy to that flag know whether or not a ship was an American-owned ship?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The title deeds, so to speak, of the ownership must be on board the ship.

Mr. WEST. I understand that; but what I was speaking about was how could it be free from attack when flying a foreign flag on the ocean?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Well, a foreigner will never attack a merchant ship. The foreign belligerent may capture it; he may seize it; and if the enemy believes that it is the property of another belligerent with which he is at war, he will confiscate it; but no such right, of course, would be exercised by a belligerent with respect to the property of a neutral. As I suggested yesterday, an American citizen owning a vessel flying the British flag whose property is taken from him improperly by any belligerent might invoke the benefit of the country whose flag he is flying as well as invoke the benefit of the country of which he is a citizen to secure him from wrong and injustice.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think one hesitates in the presence of a great international calamity to oppose or even to criticize any measure which may seem to have in it anything which will better the conditions which exist. I am not sure that I am going to oppose this bill, and I am certainly not going to haggle over the details of the bill, because conditions as they arise will justify whatever is done if it has any benefit whatever.

I very much doubt whether American citizens are going to buy ships more than 5 years old when we know that they do not buy them if they are less than 5 years old. On the contrary, you would naturally suppose that they would buy the newer ships rather than the older ones, and my judgment is that if this bill is passed it will not add anything whatever to the shipping interests of the United States. If it were to be a bona fide transaction, if the purchases were to be made and the ship were to take an American registry and be operated exactly under the conditions which obtain in the case of other American shipping, then I can see that there would be the same protection to the shipping, if any is taken over, which would exist if the ships were built in the United States and manned and operated under our own laws, but I believe, Mr. President, that there is grave danger in the possibility that a paper transfer may be made; that the ship may be transferred with a string attached to it in some way; that it may carry a foreign crew and foreign officers and that the only actual change that will be made will be the hauling down of the flag of the country under which it has previously sailed and the substitution of the American flag.

If such a condition exists and that kind of ship goes to sea with that kind of a crew, carrying a cargo as to which there may be some doubt about its not being contraband, and then is held up by a man-of-war of any one of the belligerents in Europe and possibly is seized and confiscated, or it may be sunk; if that occurs, Mr. President, we are in a position where we have got to defend our flag, and the loss which would result from any such condition would be thousands of times greater than any benefit that may come from this legislation.

Now, it is not true that there are no ships in this country which are available for over-seas trade. The Senator from New York has correctly stated that a ship may be transferred from the coastwise to the deep-sea trade in any port of the United States, so that there is no reason why our coastwise shipping should not take up this trade if it is desirable for it to do so. I want to submit, Mr. President, without going into details, that there are great numbers of ships operated now in the coastwise trade, many of which on account of the dullness in that trade are practically tied up at their wharves, which are available for foreign service and the owners of which are getting ready to go into that service to-day. Under such conditions, if we are going to take over the old ships of foreign nations, we are substantially paying a subsidy to foreign-built ships to take the place of our own shipping which is available and which is likely to be used in foreign trade.

I am not going to take the time to go in any detail into the question of coastwise shipping available for the deep-sea traffic, but I want to point out that there is a greater number of such American vessels than probably is known generally to Senators. I simply call attention to one case—the ships that are registered under the name of Eleazer W. Clark. I do not know who Mr. Clark is; he lives at Portland, Me. I have asked the Senator from Maine concerning him and have been told that the ships of Mr. Clark are engaged in the coastwise service, to a considerable extent, in coal carrying; but, in any case, here are 30,000 tons of available ships of one class or another which can be transferred to the deep-sea service in a day if the profits obtained under such service are greater than under the coastwise trade. There are many pages of such cases in the merchant lists published by the Navigation Bureau.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he is aware of the fact that 10 American ships were chartered in New York yesterday for the foreign trade?

Mr. WEEKS. I had not heard of that, Mr. President, but I have no doubt it is so, and I have no doubt that 20 or 30 or 40 will be transferred to the foreign service to-day. In other words, if the foreign trade is profitable and the insurance rates are not too high, we are going to see the American coastwise shipping transferred to that trade.

The insurance rate is going to play an important part in the condition which exists. American shipping to-day carries an insurance rate of about 1 per cent; foreign shipping carries an insurance rate of from 5 to 70 per cent. That condition is going to induce our shipowners to go into this service; but if any of this foreign shipping, with the doubt which will hang over it, is going to be transferred to our registry and to carry our flag, and is going to carry an insurance rate several times greater than the American shipping which is now sailing under our flag, then I submit that that will be an additional reason why these transfers will not be made and why this bill, if enacted into law, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent, is going to be inoperative in its results.

I think there are very many things—I do not intend to take the time to discuss them—but there are so many doubtful conditions which surround this legislation that we may well hesitate before we pass it. If the British fleet, for instance, is successful in the North Sea, either in driving the German fleet to cover or in destroying that fleet—and we are likely to have results there within 10 days—if that is done, then the cargo-carrying trade of the Atlantic is not going to be upset by the European war, because the cargo-carrying trade of the world is very largely English. To be sure, they have some lines of steamers crossing the Atlantic, but the German trade in the Atlantic is almost entirely made up of direct lines of steamers between our ports and the ports of Germany. I think there is more cargo-carrying capacity under the Norwegian flag than there is under the German flag; I am quite sure that that is correct; and, in fact, if the German fleet in the North Sea is either destroyed or driven to cover, as is likely to happen in the near future, then we are going to have our carrying trade across the Atlantic continue without any great break, because it will be done by the English cargo-carrying ships and by Norwegian ships.

In any case, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that there is need for haste in this legislation. From every viewpoint it should be carefully considered, and while I do not want to oppose it if it is the consensus of opinion that it is wise I believe that the dangers which may arise from it are so much greater than the possibilities of advantages to be obtained that all Senators should hesitate before they support it.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I desire to ask the Senator if he recalls the circumstance of a ship flying the American flag in the bay of Smyrna in 1912 being either blown up or fired upon by the Turks? I think the name of it was the Mississippi. I am under the impression, although I do not know for what reason, that our Government took no interest in the matter at the time. Does the Senator recall that incident?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, my recollection is that there was an American ship in those waters which was incapacitated or destroyed by running onto a mine which had become detached from the mine field where it was planted and had floated into a ship channel. That is my recollection. I may not be quite correct in the facts.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am cordially in favor of the prompt passage of this bill, although I do not regard it as certain that any very considerable results will follow its adoption. That is a question of which no man can be sure at this time.

We are confronted with an unparalleled emergency. We have abounding crops and a large foreign demand, due in the first instance to a shortage in the foreign grain supply, because crops have fallen below the average in certain European countries, a situation which is aggravated by farm labor being withdrawn from the fields to the war, and which will be still further intensified by the waste of war. The demand for our flour and for our wheat will be greater by reason of this terrible condition in Europe. The foreign demand will be increased, no doubt, for our food products, and probably very much diminished for our cotton and many of our raw materials.

Now, what is the situation? The carrying trade of the world is demoralized; most of the ships upon which we have depended for the transportation of our commodities belong to nations that are at war. So an emergency is created which should be met by an emergency measure, and that, I think, very promptly.

On consideration of this bill I was inclined to think at first that there should be several amendments, but on further examination I believe that in the shape in which it passed the House it is in as good form as it can be made. The amendment of the Senator from New York directing that our navy yards should open their dry docks for the repair of merchant ships, provided the facilities are not needed for the paramount purpose of taking care of our battleships, certainly will do no harm and may do good.

Objection to this bill comes from four sources; possibly there may be others, but as I analyze the opposition it results from four interests or ideas of public policy. First, the shipbuilding interest. I do not see how the exceptions created by this measure can injure that industry. The boats which may be taken over are limited to those in the foreign trade, and it is well known that this will not hamper shipbuilding in this country, for that has been dependent upon the construction of domestic vessels and ships for the Navy. Indeed, even if the bill were such as to create something of a handicap for our shipbuilding interests, it seems to me that in this emergency they should be willing to make concessions; and yet I do not see how it can in the least damage them.

The second objection comes from those who entertain the opinion that this will, if not now, ultimately affect the coastwise trade. There is, I think, more ground for apprehension there. If we should acquire a large number of foreign ships to be used primarily for the foreign trade and give them American registry, then, when normal conditions return, there would be an agitation for the use of those boats in the coastwise trade. But, Mr. President, that agitation is sure to come and will come after the opening of the Panama Canal and the development of trade between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

For one, I have never shared the roseate views of those who look for a revolution in routes of commerce and for colossal benefits from the opening of the Panama Canal. No doubt there will be a very considerable increase in the traffic between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, and in times of prosperity, what we call "boom" times, or in periods when crops are to be harvested and the supply of coastwise shipping is insufficient, there is sure to be a demand, especially from the Pacific coast, that the trade between the two oceans, or from the Pacific Ocean on the one side and the Atlantic and the Gulf on the other, be thrown open to foreign as well as to American ships. It will be said, "This canal has not conferred upon us the benefits we had expected; the traffic is not so large as we had anticipated, and it is prevented from reaching the proportions which it might attain by the scarcity of shipping or the high rates charged by boats under American registry."

It will be said also that while it is proper to restrict to boats of American registry traffic from New York to Jacksonville or from Boston to Norfolk or from Philadelphia to Galveston, it is a far cry to demand that the traffic between New York and San Francisco, going from one ocean to another, should be thus limited. So, this agitation is bound to come. I trust that the decision reached will be such as to retain advantages for our domestic shipping, and that we shall not destroy this great industry; but it is very likely that if we pass this bill and any considerable number of boats of foreign registry are admitted to American registry, then, when the war is over, this agitation, which I think in any event is sure to arise, will be intensified. However, Mr. President, we can take care of that when the time comes. It is not necessary for us to anticipate it or to provide for that until we come to it.

A third objection relates to the provision in regard to foreign officers. Mr. President, we should not fail to notice that the ships which are most likely to take out American registers under this bill are those which are already owned by American corporations or capitalists, but operated under foreign flags. These American owners of foreign ships say: "All our preferences are for an American register and to fly the flag of our country, but we are deterred from doing so by reason of the fact that the cost of operation under American registry is very much greater than under a foreign register"; and frequently the argument is advanced, although I do not think it has the same force, that the original cost of a ship built in our own yards is greater than that of a ship built abroad. At any rate, those who engage in the over-sea trade recognize that with the right to buy foreign ships they have a much broader market from which to select.

There are many foreign boats owned by American companies. The International Mercantile Marine Co., by far the most important of these, is an American corporation, though all of the underlying companies which composed it except the American lines—the Red Star, the Leyland, the Atlantic Transport, the Dominion, the White Star, etc.—are foreign. That is, the International Mercantile Marine is a holding company, issuing common and preferred stock and bonds and owning the stock of the foreign companies. No doubt a considerable share of the stock and bonds of the holding company and especially of the bonds of the underlying companies is held in Europe. Another company, probably second in the number of its ships, is the United Fruit Co., which I believe has 41 boats with a foreign registry, some of the boats less than five years of age, and others more than that. For years they have had their own officers, who are predominantly foreigners. They have been living in an American atmosphere. Their employment has been furnished them by American business. Certainly, as regards this line it would seem that the owners could trust the absolute loyalty of the officers and employees, but without some such provision as that in this bill let us see what would happen.

The owners would take out American registers and would be told, "You must immediately discharge all of those officers, however satisfactory or useful they may be, and engage others who are American citizens in their places." No doubt it would be an insuperable barrier to their making any change. They would prefer to continue their foreign registry. There are a large number of other boats—I think it would be difficult even for the Commissioner of Navigation or anyone else who is an expert on the subject to include them all—which are owned by American capital, but operated under a foreign flag. There is the Dollar Line out of San Francisco, with some 10 or 12 boats. No doubt the preference there would be for an American registry. The first effect of the passage of this bill will be to bring this class of boats, owned by citizens or corporations of the United States, under an American registry.

It was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], for whose judgment I always have the utmost respect, that if the British fleet is successful the carrying trade will resume its normal proportions. I can not altogether agree with that statement. Any English tramp or freight-carrying ship, any French or Belgian ship, any ship belonging to any country at war with Germany, whatever route it might follow, would run the risk of meeting here or there on the ocean a German cruiser. We all know that at a time when our Navy was powerful enough to maintain a blockade two or three privateers belonging to the Confederate States were a factor in driving our carrying trade from the ocean. The mere apprehension of meeting a German cruiser—and no doubt some of them will be scattered on the seas—would raise rates of insurance and create a preference for a boat under the American flag.

I repeat what I have said: I do not think anyone can tell how many boats will come to an American registry. The Norwegian fleet is large, and that country will no doubt remain neutral. The routes of traffic which its boats have followed will probably be disarranged and the freight for carriage very much diminished, so that it is very likely a considerable number of boats of this country will be diverted from their present routes to engage in the trade between the United States and Europe; but we can not afford, in the present very serious situation, to place undue reliance upon foreign ships.

I think we should make all possible provision to give preference to our own licensed officers. The shipping trade has been depressed, and they should have the best possible opportunity, provided it does not attain the proportions of a monopoly.

I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that everyone who takes out a master's license or a watch officer's license must pass an examination. No doubt that would be conducted in the English language. It would be somewhat easier for foreigners to pass it in that language, because so many nautical terms are English; but the pending bill does not do away with the requirement for an examination and investigation as to fitness and experience. Again, the candidate must take an oath, just as a man does who enters the military service or the civil service. I am inclined to think it more or less of a bugaboo that there is any danger of a German officer or a French officer managing a boat with an American registry for the benefit of his own country. Why, as it is now, Mr. President, the great majority of our crews are foreign. Unfortunately, the American does not take to the sea; and not only in our foreign trade, but upon our domestic ships, including even the Lake trade, the very considerable majority of the seamen, aside from the officers, are foreigners.

An officer has a spirit of loyalty to his duty. I take it, according to the general definition of piracy, it would be an act of piracy for an officer so to direct a boat that she may turn from her prescribed course into a foreign port for the advantage of Germany or France or some of the other Nations at war.

I wish to call attention to a limitation in the House bill to which no notice has yet been called:

> That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

It will be borne in mind that the words "so far" mean that he can make distinctions. He can make an order that the captains shall not be excluded from the law. He can order that this provision shall apply only to boats of a certain size. He can prescribe that the exception shall apply only to those engaged in trade in a certain direction. We must all recognize that with the existing condition of affairs abroad, with lighthouses darkened and buoys removed, it would be quite desirable that a certain number—perhaps not all—of those who act as navigating officers should be men who know something of the foreign channels. While the President belongs to a different political organization from that to which I subscribe, I feel that it is entirely safe to vest this discretion in his judgment. I am sure that he will look out for the American sailor, that he will look out for the American officer. No doubt instructions will be issued to the inspectors to judge carefully of the character of the men who apply for licenses, and that there will be no discrimination against American officers.

A fourth argument is made that foreign complications will be created by the passage of this bill. What foreign nation can complain? Practically all of them to-day allow the purchase of foreign ships without let or hindrance. In passing this bill we are only to a limited extent putting our regulations on the same footing with theirs.

But there is another point which is even stronger. The whole commercial world recognizes that the carrying trade to and from the United States has been enormously large, and it is further recognized that that traffic has been carried in foreign bottoms. Yet now, by reason of a war the appalling nature of which as yet we can only faintly realize, that agency for carrying our products is very seriously interfered with, if not entirely cut off. What foreign nation could raise its voice against our taking measures which are absolutely necessary for the continuance of our trade and for the maintenance of our very business and industrial life?

This is a question which, like many others—a rational banking system, for instance—does not alone affect merchants and shippers; it affects every class of our varied population. Merchants, manufacturers, farmers, those on salaries, the men who toil for wages—it affects them all. For our very life we must provide some way in which the products of other countries can be brought here and ours can be shipped abroad. No nation in reason could for a moment raise any objection.

Of course, Mr. President, there will be a good deal of bitterness in this conflict, and I anticipate that foreign combatants will seize ships under the American flag when they have a chance; but that would happen whether this bill were passed or not.

In order to make the treatment of this subject more complete I will read, briefly, the rule in regard to the transfer of ships before or after the outbreak of hostilities, taken from a standard work on international law. This is the ninety-first section of Mr. Oppenheim's work on International Law:

(1) According to article 55 of the declaration, the transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, if effected before the outbreak of hostilities, is valid, unless the captor is able to prove that the transfer was made in order to avoid capture. However, if the bill of sale is not on board the transferred vessel, and if the transfer was effected less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities, the transfer is presumed to be void, unless the vessel can prove that such transfer was not effected in order to avoid capture. To provide commerce with a guaranty that a transfer should not easily be treated as void on the ground that it was effected for the purpose of evading capture, it is stipulated that, in case the transfer was effected more than 30 days before the outbreak of hostilities, there is an absolute presumption of its validity, provided the transfer was unconditional, complete, and in conformity with the laws of the countries concerned; and further, provided that neither the control of nor the profits arising from the employment of the vessels remain in the same hands as before the transfer. But even in this case a vessel is suspect if the transfer took place less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities, and if her bill of sale is not on board. Hence she may be seized and brought into a port of a prize court for investigation, and she can not claim damages for the capture, even if the court releases her.

(2) According to article 56 of the declaration, the transfer of any enemy vessel to a neutral flag, if effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless the vessel can prove that the transfer was not made in order to avoid capture. And such proof is excluded, and an absolute presumption is established that the transfer is void, if the transfer has been made in a blockaded port or while the vessel was in transitu; further, if a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor; and lastly, if the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled.

The question of the transfer of enemy vessels to subjects of neutral States, either shortly before or during the war, must be regarded as forming part of the larger question of enemy character, for the point to be decided is whether such transfer divests the vessels of their enemy character. It is obvious that, if this point is answered in the affirmative the owners of enemy vessels can evade the danger of having their property seized and confiscated by selling their vessels to subjects of neutral States. Before the declaration of London, which is, however, not yet ratified, the maritime powers had not agreed upon common rules concerning this subject. According to French practice, no transfer of enemy vessels to neutrals could be recognized, and a vessel thus transferred retained enemy character; but this concerned only transfer after the outbreak of war. Any legitimate transfer anterior to the outbreak of war did give neutral character to a vessel. According to British and American practice, on the other hand, neutral vessels could well be transferred to a neutral flag before or after the outbreak of war and lose thereby their enemy character, provided that the transfer took place bona fide, was not effected either in a blockaded port or while the vessel was in transitu, the vendor did not retain an interest in the vessel or did not stipulate a right to recover or repurchase the vessel after the conclusion of the war, and the transfer was not made in transitu in contemplation of war.

The declaration of London offers clear and decisive rules concerning the transfer of enemy vessels, making a distinction between the transfer to a neutral flag before and after the outbreak of hostilities.

I read this brief selection because in less than two pages it states the law of the subject. It is all a question of good faith.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio for some information with reference to the London conference, from which he has just read.

My understanding is that, with the exception of France, which probably for a long time had a different rule from the other nations of the world, up to the time of the London conference it was a well-recognized principle of international law that a neutral might even during hostilities, or after the outbreak of hostilities, buy a belligerent ship. The London conference seems to have adopted some rules qualifying that general doctrine. My understanding is that the United States has never agreed to that, and that Great Britain has never agreed to it.

What I desire to ask the Senator is, To what extent has the so-called London conference become operative, and what countries became parties to that conference so as to make it binding upon them?

Mr. BURTON. It has not become operative at all in the sense of formal adoption by the nations represented.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was my impression.

Mr. BURTON. But it is like the declaration of Paris, made in 1856; it has been accepted in principle by a very considerable number. It is said that the principles laid down by the conference were observed even by Turkey in the recent struggle with the Balkan States.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was not a condition of the conference that it should not be operative unless it was signed or accepted by so many of the parties who participated?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, yes. It is not binding on anyone.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not binding anywhere?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a mere declaration that certain acts would be recognized as the law on the subject?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can the Senator name the countries that have recognized that as the law?

Mr. BURTON. It was very generally recognized. I think I have in my desk a list of the signatory powers. Germany, France, and practically all the other great maritime powers agreed upon it. I really do not regard it as a backward step from the views that prevailed before that time, because most of the nations had very strenuously asserted their right to seize vessels formerly belonging to an enemy after transfer to a neutral flag. A main object was to secure uniformity. It will be noticed that the rules are very carefully laid down which prevent a transfer from being regarded as a bona fide purchase where made to avoid the consequences of hostilities.

There is this point which, it seems to me, should be taken into account in considering these rules. The discussions in various conferences on this subject have never been with a view to just such a situation as that in which we are placed. The object to be attained has been to prevent fraudulent transfer. Of course anyone knows that if a citizen of a country at war has a ship that is in a blockaded port he would like to transfer it to some citizen of a neutral country in order to save his property. That would be fraudulent. Also, if it is in transitu on the ocean, and it is feared that there are cruisers or warships of an enemy in the neighborhood, it would be very desirable to transfer that boat. That also would be in bad faith. Our situation, however, is the one I have already outlined—a prior dependence upon foreign bottoms for our carrying trade, the at least partial elimination of that means, and the necessity of providing for the carrying of commodities to and from the United States in ships presumably our own, which in the greatest possible degree will be free from seizure or interference.

I do not deny that this war may assume such bitterness and there may be such an effort to shut off the products of the United States from other countries that ships under the American flag will be seized and taken into foreign ports, and all the rules of international law in a measure disregarded; but, in any event, that is a chance we must take. It is to be hoped that our country will conduct itself with such dignity, and there will be such a respect for our power and desire for our friendship and good will, that no nation at war will hastily seize a ship that carries the American flag.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is now, as we are informed, a famous German ship at Bar Harbor, Me. The ship, as I understand, left the port of New York some time ago, bound for Germany; but, fearing capture, it put into that somewhat out-of-the-way harbor.

Under this bill, if it be passed, it would be possible, I take it, for that German ship to be sold to American citizens and for the President to authorize the retention of all of the German officers and the entire German crew, and, under those circumstances, for the ship to put to sea and sail for a German port.

Now, suppose that while that is going on, the ship flying the American flag, it is observed by an English cruiser. The captain of the cruiser knows the ship. It is a well-known ship. He knows it is a German ship, but it is carrying the American flag. He takes possession and he finds when he goes aboard that the only change that is made in the vessel is that the German flag has been taken down and the American flag has been put up, and he finds a bill of sale and an American registry.

Does not the Senator think that under those circumstances the captain of the English cruiser would in all probability seize the ship, and if that were done, would it not involve us in rather an unpleasant incident?

Mr. BURTON. Of course in the extreme case mentioned the fact that the boat is turned over with all her officers and crew would be a circumstance which would tend to influence a prize court to conclude that the transfer was in violation of proper international usage; but there would be other considerations which nevertheless should prevail—the good faith of the transaction and the transfer, the nature of the cargo that is to be sent, and so forth. Of course if she had contraband on board that would raise another question, even if the transfer to the United States were regarded as valid and binding. If there were a bill of sale, if there were a real transfer to a neutral, if the vessel were engaged in such trade as an American ship would engage in, the presumption would be that the transfer was valid, whatever the crew.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I wish to ask the Senator another question. Suppose all the conditions existed as my colleague has just stated, and upon investigation it was found that the owners of this same boat had sold it to an American company with five American directors, and it developed upon an investigation that the five American directors had five shares of stock apiece, or just enough to qualify as directors, and that the balance of the stock was owned by the same owners that own the ship to-day, do you think a foreign power would construe such a transfer as a bona fide one? Is it not true that under this bill such a transfer could be made?

Mr. BURTON. Of course you can put down such a hypothetical case as that. Naturally it would be a very suspicious circumstance. It would come near to creating a presumption that it was a subterfuge adopted to get that boat under a foreign flag.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is wholly within the provisions of this act. There is nothing in it to prevent it.

Mr. BURTON. I think, however, you would have to go far afield from probable applications of the act to present such a possible situation as that.

Mr. SMOOT. It looks to me as though it were one right at our door; that if foreigners owning a vessel under the conditions existing to-day in the world desire to have the American flag to protect them temporarily only, it would be very easy for them to sell to an American corporation, take out an American registry, and let them hold enough stock to qualify in the State in which they organized the company, and then the balance of the stock would be owned entirely by the foreign owners of the ship. I can not see that there is anything in the bill, unless there is some amendment which will be accepted to it, to prevent such a transaction.

Mr. BURTON. It is altogether unlikely that such a situation as that would arise. If it did arise, the property interests of our citizens in the ship seized would be reduced to a minimum, because the five directors, each of whom had one share, would have no very great financial interest in the boat.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Therefore it would be the loss of the citizens of the foreign nation if the ship were condemned in a prize court.

Mr. SMOOT. But it would be an American company.

Mr. GALLINGER. The American cargo, if there was a cargo on that ship, could be condemned under the claim that the registry was a mere pretense.

Mr. BURTON. As I said, every man who buys a ship flying the American flag under such circumstances must take the chances of a very tense situation. Some prize courts might be disposed to be severe. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The questions just propounded to the Senator would be questions that would involve the good faith, the bona fides of the transaction; but I want to put another hypothetical question to the Senator, that we may have a fair construction of the true intent and meaning of what he has stated is the prevailing rule. Suppose there is an English or a German vessel crossing the Atlantic to one of our ports. A cruiser of the enemy is following it up. It, however, has succeeded in getting into our ports. The cruiser is waiting for it to come out where it may be attacked. Can it then be said that either the Government or its citizen even has purchased it in good faith, and it thereby escapes becoming a prize to a vessel that may have followed it clear across the ocean?

Mr. BURTON. And is watching for it to come out?

Mr. McCUMBER. And is watching for it to come out again.

Mr. BURTON. Of course, if the court would take up that question, there is no way of forecasting how a court may decide it, at least without understanding facts which determine the good faith of the transaction. It would seem very probable that the captors would have to prove the transfer was not in good faith.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the transfer was in good faith; suppose we wanted that ship, does the Senator believe that, under the law of nations, we would have the right in good faith to purchase and own that ship and thereby deprive the vessel that had followed her clear across the ocean in war from the benefit of the prize and thereby escape by having the transfer made?

Mr. BURTON. I would say yes; our commercial interests and national rights in property are very much more important than the accommodation of a cruiser that chases a foreign ship into one of our ports.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the Senator also believes that we can take the Kronprinzessin Cecilie that is said to be at one of the ports of Maine, and if there were a British vessel watching for her to come out, she could escape that by selling in good faith and transferring the ship to American owners.

Mr. BURTON. The rights of contract are not suspended by the existence of war. The rights of a neutral nation are still preserved. If the sale is made in good faith, why may it not be made? It is true the London confercnce provided for a period of 30 or 60 days.

Mr. McCUMBER. Even if it were held in good faith, are we not assisting one of the belligerents? Are we not assisting them in securing a disposition of their property which otherwise would fall in the hands of the enemy?

Mr. BURTON. Suppose the foreign nation had shipped into our ports certain commodities that we needed and were willing to buy, but the money would be immediately sent back to that nation and would very much strengthen it in war with another power, is there any reason why we should not buy those commodities?

Mr. McCUMBER. In that instance the money paid for the commodities would be subject to capture. In this case it might remain in any bank of the United States. That is a different proposition.

Mr. BURTON. I think in a matter of this kind it is desirable for us to adhere to the main proposition, which is the giving to foreign ships, whether they belong already to American capitalists or are to be acquired from foreign owners, a status which will maintain as far as possible our ability to export our products. You can present hypothetical cases, you can engage in conjectures as to what a court will do, but let us adhere to the main point and provide for this situation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to ask the able Senator from Ohio if he understands what proportion of stock interested in the ownership of the St. Louis and the St. Paul is held by English interests?

Mr. BURTON. I may say that I had once or twice sought to obtain as nearly as possible the exact facts, and the information is not altogether satisfactory. The International Mercantile Co. is a holding company. It has, I think, common and preferred stock. It has its bonds. That stock and those bonds, I take it, are very largely held in the United States. It took over, however, a plurality of companies—the White Star Co., the largest, the Atlantic Transport, the Leyland, the Red Star, and so forth. All those boats were subject to bonds, and those bonds are held in Europe, and the securities of the International Mercantile Marine, as the market quotations will show, are far below par. So there is a substantial financial interest, if not a majority interest, at least, in most of those lines in Europe.

Mr. LEWIS. Therefore, I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this position: If the objections urged by the able senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] are to be urged, and if the fears expressed by the equally able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] are to be realized, would not the following also be likely to transpire? Could not these vessels—the St. Louis and the St. Paul—be proceeded against by Germany, notwithstanding they had been carrying the American flag for years and had been sailing under American colors, and taking our products or our passengers, rather our products for this purpose, to Europe? I am impressed with this thought, that if the objection urged by the two distinguished Senators can be well taken as to those hereafter to be purchased, it may likewise be taken as to these ships we now have merely because a large percentage of the proprietary interest is in English possession. Since the English possession predominates, instead of carrying the English flag it is an American flag carried upon an English bottom, and would it not be a violation of neutrality? Particularly I beg to maintain that it could be reached if there were a case raised for the purpose of reaching it. Could we protect ourselves even if we built a ship at the wharves of San Francisco where a German company had a proprietary percentage, as the able Senator from Utah seems to fear?

Mr. BURTON. The real vital point first is the registry of the boat, and then the country of incorporation. I think, however, there is a difference not only in degree but in kind between such a hypothetic case as the Senator from Utah mentions, a case which I regard as altogether improbable, and that of the International Mercantile Marine Co. In the first place, in degree because there is a large number of shares whether they are at par or not, a very substantial property interest, held in the United States. In the next place, there has been for years a series of combinations or a combination of companies controlled by an American organization. In the other case, boats, all of them formerly under some other flag, were turned suddenly over to the American flag. The good faith of such a transaction would be questioned.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator will admit that they could not question the good faith of the company as to the boats that carried the American flag before the declaration of war.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. Those carried the American flag anyway.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the difference between the substance of my question and the substance of the question of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I agree that there would be a decided advantage in behalf of the ships which had previously carried the flag because the presumption would be in their favor, but I also urged that if it be true that back of that is the ownership in foreign hands that could be used as a reason of objecting to these ships just as completely as if the question of ownership had been subsequently raised.

Mr. BURTON. Generally speaking, it would raise the same point.

Mr. SMOOT. The only difference would be that there would be no question of transfer involved. The good faith of it could not be questioned. There was no transfer and they would be going along and doing business as they had been doing it in the past.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me see if I understand the Senator from Utah. He draws the distinction in the matter of registry.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; that is where the difference between the two countries would be lodged if there was a difference. It would be the question of registry and the bona fide transfer of the ship itself.

Mr. LEWIS. I would admit that the preceding date of registry anticipating the declaration of war would, of course, offer much evidence in favor of the ship, but I thought the able Senator from Utah addressed his query to the Senator from Ohio based only upon the question of ownership, that the claim might be made by a foreign belligerent that a ship might fly an American flag and be in foreign possession, and because of that ownership it would be the subject of seizure as a violation of neutrality.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not my question. My question was this: Suppose the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, now at Bar Harbor, Me. Of course we all understand that she is owned by a German company. It sails under the German flag. Suppose the owners of that ship now decide that they would like to have that ship under American registry sail under the American flag. In order to accomplish that they would sell it to an American company organized for the purpose of purchasing that boat. There would be five American directors, we will say, in that company owning one share or five shares apiece, or as many shares as the laws of the State in which it was incorporated would require, and the balance of the stock of the American company is owned by the exact individuals who own the ship itself to-day under the German control. Then, would a foreign nation, knowing this, have a right to say that that transfer was not a bona fide transfer? Whether that transfer was made in good faith or not, suppose the ship was seized upon the high seas and that question arose, I think that under this bill there is nothing to prevent it, and I believe there ought to be an amendment to the bill to prevent it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURTON. I understand there is a bill of some urgency for reasons which will appeal to every Member of the Senate that my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] desires to take up, and I prefer to yield to him first.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. BURTON. I yield the floor absolutely.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Ohio has yielded the floor, I desire recognition. Then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

BUILDINGS ALONG ALLEYWAYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE. I report from the Committee on the District of Columbia on the bill (S. 1624) to regulate the construction of buildings along alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes (S. Rept. 720), with a recommendation that it pass with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, on page 3, line 8, at the end of section 1, to add:

> The use or occupation of any building or other structure erected or placed on or along any such alley as a dwelling or residence or place of abode by any person or persons is hereby declared injurious to life, to public health, morals, safety, and welfare of said District; and such use or occupation of any such building or structure on, from, and after the 1st day of July, 1918, shall be unlawful.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to erect, place, or construct any dwelling on any lot or parcel of ground fronting on an alley where such alley is less than 30 feet wide throughout its entire length and which does not run straight to and open on two of the streets bordering the square, and is not supplied with sewer, water mains, and gas or electric light; and in this act the term "alley" shall include any and all courts, passages, and thoroughfares, whether public or private, and any ground intended for or used as a highway other than the public streets or avenues; and any dwelling house now fronting an alley less than 30 feet wide and not extending straight to the streets and provided with sewer, water main, and light, as aforesaid, which has depreciated or been damaged more than one-half its original value, shall not be repaired or reconstructed as a dwelling or for use as such, and no permit shall be issued for the alteration, repair, or reconstruction of such a building when the plans indicate any provision for dwelling purposes: Provided, That rooms for grooms or stablemen to be employed in the building to be erected, repaired, or reconstructed may be allowed over stables, when the means of exit and safeguards against fire are sufficient, in the opinion of the inspector of buildings, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; and no building now or hereafter erected fronting on an alley or on any parcel of ground fronting on an alley less than 30 feet wide and not otherwise in accordance with this act shall be altered or converted to the uses of a dwelling. Any such alley house depreciated or damaged more than one-half of its original value shall be condemned as provided by law for the removal of dangerous or unsafe buildings and parts thereof, and for other purposes. No dwelling house hereafter erected or placed along any alley and fronting or facing thereon shall in any case be located less than 20 feet back clear of the center line of such alley, so as to give at least a 30-foot roadway and 5 feet on each side of such roadway clear for a walk or footway, and any stable or other building hereafter placed, located, altered, or erected on or along such an alley upon which a dwelling faces or fronts shall be set back clear of the walk or footway the same as the dwelling or dwellings, but the fact that dwellings are located in such alleys shall not affect the location of stables or other buildings otherwise. The use or occupation of any building or other structure erected or placed on or along such alley as a dwelling or residence or place of abode by any person or persons is hereby declared injurious to life, to public health, morals, safety, and welfare of said District; and such use or occupation of any such building or other structure on, from, and after the 1st day of July, 1918, shall be unlawful.

SEC. 2. That any person or persons, whether as principal, agent, or employee, violating any of the provisions of this act or any amendment thereof for the violation of which no other penalty is prescribed, shall, on conviction thereof in the police court, be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each such violation, and a like fine for each day during which such violation has continued or may continue, to be recovered as other fines and penalties are recovered.

SEC. 3. That the act of Congress approved July 22, 1892, entitled "An act regulating the construction of buildings along alleyways in the District of Columbia," and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is a great temptation on my part to discuss at this time at considerable length a question that has been very near my heart for many years, that of the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine. Indeed, I have in my desk a prepared speech that I think would be somewhat illuminating on this subject, if I felt like taking the time of the Senate to deliver it, but I propose to desist from doing so to-day.

I am aware of the fact, Mr. President, that any suggestion made against the bill under consideration will be taken up by certain hysterical persons and denounced as unpatriotic, and yet I will submit myself to the possibility of criticism along that line by calling attention to some facts that I think are worthy of serious consideration.

I know, Mr. President, that it is not convincing, nor, as a rule, is it perhaps a matter of good taste, for one to say "I told you so"; and yet it interests me to look back over the discussion of this question for the past 10 years or more to see exactly what has been said by some of us. On the 8th day of January, 1906, I submitted some observations to the Senate, taking for my text these words:

The United States alone leaves its merchants, manufacturers, and farmers at the edge of the ocean to get their goods over seas as best they may—by some accident of trade or the grace of their foreign rivals. If we lag in the world's markets, if we fall behind even in the Philippines, our own possessions, if we see Germany striding ahead of us in the Orient, and all Europe grasping South America by commercial bonds stronger than the Monroe doctrine, the fault is our own, and in our own hands lies the remedy.

In that connection, Mr. President, I also said this, and I was gratified a little time ago to observe that the President of the United States in calling attention to the merchant-marine question repeated substantially the idea that I expressed eight years ago—

What department store in any American city, engaged in a sharp contest for business, would dream of intrusting to a rival store the delivery of its goods to its customers? Is it not a fundamental principle of such keen competitive business—with which the rivalry of America and Europe in international commerce may not inaptly be compared—is it not the prime instinct of every successful merchant in such business to maintain an active and comprehensive delivery service of his own? Would any merchant conducting such a store sell or lay up his own wagons and neglect to provide others, even if his competitor offered to do the work more cheaply? It would be a poor judge of human nature, indeed, who would consent to such a proposition. His fellow merchants, partners, or assignees in the bankruptcy proceedings, that would certainly ensue, would have grave question of his sanity.

Yet the stupid merchant who turns his delivery service over to his rivals rather than be bothered with it himself has one conspicuous exemplar among the nations in the person of the United States.

And, Mr. President, during the discussion of this question, going back particularly to the report of the merchant-marine commission, one of the points that has been urged in season and out of season, by those who opposed the legislation, has been that we ought not to complain because foreign ships carry our products, provided they carry them as cheaply or cheaper than they can be carried in American ships, but we have, Mr. President, because of the crisis that is upon us, apparently learned the lesson that it is best for us to do our own business in our own way on the ocean as well as on the land.

In that same speech, Mr. President, I quoted from the report of the Merchant Marine Commission, made in 1905, which commission was composed of five Members of this body and five Members of the House of Representatives, who concurred in a unanimous report, the following, which I commend once more to the Senators who have always voted against merchant-marine legislation:

A new merchant fleet in over-seas commerce of 2,000,000 tons would give the United States the same high rank in merchant shipping which it now holds through its great and powerful Navy. This Navy is now costing $100,000,000 a year, and it is grandly worth it. Nobody who wants the merchant marine built up would have the Navy cut down. The great men of the Navy are powerful champions of the merchant marine. Every strong friend of the merchant marine is a strong friend of the Navy also. The foe of one is apt to be the foe of both. But the Merchant Marine Commission would urge with all earnestness that a great nation, expending $100,000,000 a year upon its Navy, can justifiably devote from one to seven millions a year to the encouragement of its merchant shipping, and that the nation which is preparing to build the Isthmian Canal must stir betimes to build its own ships if it would have its flag borne through the great waterway on something else than yachts and men-of-war.

Unless the American people begin now, at once, to give some heed to their neglected merchant shipping, they are likely to realize when their canal is completed that they have spent three hundred millions of American money to subsidize the ships and the trade of foreign governments.

That sounds a little prophetic, Mr. President, but still more prophetic were the words of Mr. Blaine in his last speech made in this body in the year 1881. He was engaged in a famous debate with Senator Beck of Kentucky, one of the ablest men who ever represented that State or any other State in the Senate of the United States. Mr. Blaine said:

It is a fact equally remarkable that for the past 25 years, or make it only for the past 20 years, from the beginning of the war to this hour, the Congress of the United States has not done one solitary thing to uphold the navigation interests of the United States. Decay has been observed going on steadily from year to year. The great march forward of our commercial rival of old has been witnessed and everywhere recognized, and the representatives of the people of the United States have sat in their two houses of legislation as dumb as though they could not speak, and have not offered a single remedy or a single aid. * * *

During these years in which Congress has not stepped forward to do one thing for the foreign commerce of this country, for all that vast external transportation whose importance the Senator from Kentucky has not exaggerated, but has strongly depicted, the same Congress has passed 92 acts in aid of internal transportation by rail; has given 200,000,000 acres of the public lands, worth to-day a thousand million dollars in money, and has added $70,000,000 in cash, and yet, I repeat, it has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce.

What was true in 1881, Mr. President, as depicted by Mr. Blaine, what was true in 1905, as depicted by the report of the Merchant Marine Commission, is true to-day, and we are absolutely and utterly without a merchant marine that is even respectable in name.

Mr. President, on Monday, March 4, 1907, the closing day of a Congress, a bill was before this body which to my mind would have done a great deal toward building up the merchant marine of the United States. It had passed the Senate and had come over from the House of Representatives with an amendment which the friends of the bill would have been glad to have accepted, but it was filibustered to death by Senators on the Democratic side of the Chamber. When the hour for final adjournment had almost arrived I said to the Senate:

I thank the Senate for listening to me in this closing hour of the session. While I acknowledge defeat to-day, my faith in the good sense and patriotism of the American people leads me to see success in the not distant future. We need American ocean mail lines to Europe, to South America, and other distant markets, and we shall have them. We shall have an American merchant marine and a naval reserve. We shall not go on forever, as we are going now, paying $200,000,000 every year in freight, mail, and passenger money to the shipowners of foreign nations, our rivals in trade and possible enemies in war.

Mr. President, during those debates I called attention, and very likely other Senators called attention, to two points that we thought of commanding consequence. One was that if all the leading foreign nations were engaged in war we would have no ships with which to transport the products of our factories and our farms to foreign markets. That, Mr. President, is precisely the situation that confronts us to-day. The prediction has been absolutely and literally fulfilled. The great nations of the world are in war, their ships of commerce are withdrawn from the oceans of the world, and we, with a merchant marine of which every patriotic American ought to be ashamed, find ourselves powerless to convey the products of our factories and our farms to the markets of the world.

One other suggestion was made, which was that if this country should be engaged in war with any one of the great nations of Europe we would be at their mercy because of the fact that we had not an adequate number of auxiliary ships to convey to our war ships needed supplies, the very condition that existed when our war fleet made the journey around the world.

Mr. President, the legislation relating to the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine has been defeated year in and year out because of prejudice in one section of the country and provincialism in another section.

I do not question, Mr. President, the sincerity of any Senator or any Member of the other House of Congress who has differed from me in opinion, but I do say that it is a reproach to the American Congress that some legislation has not been agreed upon that would give us a merchant marine that would have answered our purpose in the crisis that is now upon us.

Every effort that has been made has been met with the cry of "subsidy" and the other cry of a "Shipping Trust." Because of that cry legislation has been defeated. It is now proposed to meet the present emergency that is upon us by buying up a lot of foreign tramp steamships, doubtless at a largely increased cost over their real value, to officer them with foreigners, man them with crews of Lascars, Chinese, and possibly Hindus, waive all the requirements as to register, inspection, and measurements, and then hoist the American flag and call it an American ship. We are told that by breaking down the navigation laws of our country and adding a lot of old foreign junk to our shipping we are going to build up an American merchant marine. What utter unpardonable folly that is.

Not only that, but the Senator from Ohio, who consistently, and no doubt conscientiously, has heretofore opposed all efforts to pass shipping laws that some of us believed would reestablish our merchant marine, has to-day intimated that he is disposed to believe that in the near future our laws relative to the coastwise shipping of the United States will be modified, if not repealed.

It is an absurdity, Mr. President, for any man to try to persuade himself that if this law is passed it will provide anything like an adequate merchant marine for the United States. I have believed that if we will turn our attention in the direction of American ships rather than in the direction of England and Germany and Holland and Sweden and Norway and Japan in search of secondhand ships of foreign build we have enough American ships to-day under the American flag to meet this emergency. Believing that, a few days ago I offered a resolution, which was agreed to by the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby directed to make careful inquiry into the possibility of securing vessels now engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States for transfer to the foreign trade, with a view to meeting the present emergency in overseas transportation, report to be made to the Senate at the earliest practicable day.

The report on that resolution has not yet come to the Senate, but I shall be greatly interested to read it when it is presented to this body. I notice in the newspapers of this afternoon that the Secretary of Commerce says there will be ships enough to take care of our exports, so perhaps that is the reason he has not made reply to the resolution.

Two hours ago, Mr. President, a telegram was handed to me. It is dated New York, August 6, and reads:

NEW YORK, August 6, 1914.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Strongly urge that amendment be made to House bill admitting foreign vessels to American registry that a bond of $10 per registered ton be given by applicants that the vessel will remain under the American flag at least five years, so that only bona fide vessels will be admitted; and further, that master and officers should swear out a declaration of intention to become American citizens, otherwise the American flag will be used as a shield to foreigners who will organize a State corporation with American agents as officers which will leave the actual ownership in the hands of the old owners. These ships will be put back under the foreign flag at the close of the war because of the cheaper cost of operation and upkeep. This bill should not be considered hastily. Ten American ships were chartered yesterday for foreign trade, and there are 200 American steam and sailing vessels available for the transportation of merchandise to foreign countries which will be able to transport 2,000,000 tons of products to foreign markets in the next four months. These, together with the Norwegian and Spanish tonnage and other neutral nations, will be able to move the United States exports. All of the neutral flags will be compelled to come to this country for cargoes owing to the transportation in Europe being entirely tied up.

F. S. PENDLETON,
President Atlantic Carriers' Association,
130 Pearl Street, New York, N. Y.

Mr. President, if that statement is accurate—and I take it that it is accurate—it looks to me as though we need not put ourselves in an attitude of buying a lot of old worthless ships from foreign nations, waiving all the requirements of our navigation laws and putting them under the flag of the United States. The suggestion that the Norwegian and Spanish tonnage will naturally turn its attention to our shores is doubtless true, as the trade with England, France, and Germany will be cut off, and the ships from neutral countries will naturally come to us to get cargoes, and this, in addition to what our own ships can convey, will probably suffice. If 10 American ships were chartered yesterday in New York, and if it be true that there are a large number in the coastwise trade that can be utilized for foreign service, it occurs to me that we should at least make careful inquiry into the matter and determine the facts with absolute certainty before we engage in the kind of legislation that is now contemplated.

Mr. President, I want to read an editorial from an extremely conservative newspaper, a paper whose accuracy is never questioned in New England. It is from the Boston Transcript of August 4, 1914. The editorial is headed "Beware of whitewashed ships." It reads:

President Wilson means well; so do his lieutenants who hurriedly framed the emergency shipping measure which yesterday passed the House in Washington. They mean well, but they have blundered * * *. The solemn protests of the Republican leaders of the House, from great commercial States, who described the bill as a "subterfuge" and a peril, are abundantly justified. Unless the bill is radically amended or rejected by the Senate there is danger that within a month the United States will become involved in Europe's conflict.

International law and practice absolutely forbid the evasive transfer of foreign merchant ships to another national flag after the actual outbreak of hostilities. The American delegates advocated and accepted such an agreement in the London conference of 1909. A law has been upon the Nation's statute books for nearly two years allowing American registry for the overseas trade to all efficient, seaworthy foreign-built ships less than five years old owned and controlled by American citizens. Not one ship of any kind has hoisted the American flag under the terms of this free ship policy which, under normal trade conditions, has been proved to be wholly ineffective. If any foreign vessels are now admitted to American registry under such a plan as the President proposes, the very act will of itself be an acknowledgment that the motive of the transfer is a desire to escape capture, and a ship thus "whitewashed" will be held an outlaw all over the world. It will be particularly liable to attack and confiscation, and if our Government endeavors to defend it in defiance of the soundest principles of international law and morality we shall find the whole world arrayed against us.

But what, then, shall be done? The United States is by no means so helpless as the Washington authorities apparently imagine. There are excellent American coastwise steamships, many of them with passenger accommodations, in our Atlantic ports which can be employed in an emergency to bring American refugees from Europe. The resources of the six American liners already in that service can be utilized to their utmost capacity by quickly succeeding voyages. Certain swift cruisers and transports can be temporarily secured from the Navy Department under the timely bill of Senator WEEKS which the Senate yesterday passed without opposition. For the carrying of grain and cotton a larger fleet of American cargo steamers is available than persons unfamiliar with actual maritime trade have known—and all these American ships should be utilized first. They have a right to the opportunity, and their employment will be both honest and sagacious.

Not until it is absolutely demonstrated that all our own real American ships are insufficient should the first step be taken in the dangerous, the almost certainly disastrous, expedient of "whitewashing" and employing foreign ships now under foreign flags. Even when these vessels are partially owned by Americans, the risk will be great and the possible consequences very serious to contemplate.

The great vivid lesson of all this panic and emergency to the American people and their lawmakers is that hundreds of American ships officered by American citizens of unquestioned nationality should have been in existence long before this all-devouring war began. They could have been procured. The task of creating an American ocean fleet was far less formidable at the outset than the task, which has been so conspicuously achieved, of creating the vast manufacturing industries of America. Instinctively the American race is an adventurous, seafaring, sea-fighting race, a race of brilliant maritime traditions in peace or war. We have the greatest of island empires facing the two mightiest of oceans. The sea was the heritage of our fathers to their sons. In losing it we have been cheated of our birthright.

The whole Nation now sees that the defeat by narrow majorities or by vicious filibustering in Washington of the great shipping bills which Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft successively and strenuously championed was a real national misfortune. If those bills had been enacted there would now be American steamship lines to South America and the Orient—passenger and freight lines—American lines to Europe, to Africa, to Australasia. There would have been an abundance of American ships all ready to bring our people home from Europe, to save all this anxiety and suffering, and to carry all the necessarily reduced commerce of a widespread world war.

How true that all is, and what a lesson it teaches the American Congress and the American people.

Mr. President, those of us who have been here a long time remember with a feeling of admiration the splendid fight that the late Senator Frye, of Maine, made in behalf of the American merchant marine. Year in and year out, serving as the chairman of the great Committee on Commerce of this body, he devoted his energies and his great ability to trying to procure legislation that would have put on the oceans of the world American ships under the American flag; but he was defeated in his efforts. Others of us who took up the task have likewise been defeated; and we to-day see the pitiable spectacle of a great nation, which is foremost in wealth, in manufactures, in agriculture, and in mining of all the nations of the world, with a few ships scattered over the oceans of the earth, with only six ships traversing the great north Atlantic, and five or six ships crossing the Pacific, some of them being assisted by the little British colony of New Zealand. What a spectacle is that, my countrymen!

Mr. President, this is not a matter that we can contemplate with any satisfaction or with pride as citizens of this great Republic. We ought not to have allowed ourselves to reach the condition which we have reached in reference to our American merchant marine; and whether this bill passes or not—and I presume it will pass; I shall not obstruct it—I hope it will be an object lesson to the American Congress that we ought to waive aside our prejudices, our partisanship, and our provincialism, and see to it that in the near future we pass laws that will place American ships under the American flag, under American officers, on every sea in the world. If subsidy is not the best plan, let us find some other that will rescue us from the condition in which we now find ourselves.

When I was strenuously striving to secure the passage of one of these bills through Congress, in talking with a man in public life, representing one of the Middle States, he turned to me and said, "What is there in that bill for my State? Why should I support it?" Mr. President, I have voted for many measures since I have been in public life which meant nothing to my State; and until we nationalize ourselves, until we look at these great questions not from a provincial point of view, but from a great national point of view, we will remain, so far as our merchant marine is concerned, in the same deplorable, pitiable, wretched condition in which we are to-day.

So I say, Mr. President, that whether or not this bill passes, whether or not, if it does pass, it produces any good effect so far as our interests are concerned, I hope that this discussion will at least awaken our people and awaken our public men to the necessity of taking a broad view of this question, and of seeing to it that the condition that exists to-day is remedied in the near future.

Mr. President, a friend of mine in Boston, who has studied this question perhaps as deeply as any man in this country, who has written books on the subject, honored me with a letter yesterday from which I wish to read a few lines. He first calls my attention to the fact that the Portland (Me.) Board of Trade at a special meeting took exception to the bill in its present form, and that at a meeting of the maritime committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce resolutions were passed protesting against the bill, and favoring a subsidy for American vessels. He says:

The maritime affairs committee of the chamber of commerce, composed of men who understand the situation, reaffirmed unanimously this afternoon its opposition to the administration plan as one full of peril and almost certain to involve the United States in this war of Europe. The strongest newspaper opinion here is also against it. It ought to be possible to amend the bill in the Senate so that the discretion given to the President not to require American citizens as officers and to exempt foreign ships from American inspection could be stricken out. These clauses are, in effect, a subsidy to foreign-built as against American-built vessels—a gross discrimination against our own shipping.

An insurance authority here stated—

And this, Mr. President, is a very important matter to be considered—

An insurance authority here stated to-day that if his companies were called upon to insure any foreign vessel hastily transferred to the American flag, the rate asked would be exactly that asked of belligerents, which is practically prohibitive. This is a practical judgment—nothing theoretical about it at all. It shows how utterly futile the administration plan would be.

This plan is urged by the very men who have fought American shipping legislation hardest. They now see that all that was predicted has come to pass, and that without ships of our own their cotton and wheat export trade is paralyzed.

The coastwise trade now is generally dull, and there are many steamers and even sail vessels that could be utilized in an emergency to carry our export and import trade. Our cruisers and transports can bring American refugees from Europe. These refugees would not be safe on any "whitewashed" foreign ship. It is a war to the death with these European powers. They will ignore every international obligation and will give no quarter to achieve their purpose. We are entering on the most terrible war in the history of the world, and it is time that the American people should know it. The men who have taken up this question in our chamber of commerce here are Democrats and Republicans, a unit in favor of subsidies along the line of your own legislation.

You will be perfectly justified in telling the Democrats and Middle Western Republicans that if they had not blocked your efforts there would be enough American ships for this emergency, and they would have the means to deliver their wheat and cotton without involving their country in war or violating all the principles of international justice.

Mr. President, I have but a word more to say. I do not like to read from newspapers in a serious discussion such as we are engaged in to-day, and yet the able men who edit our great metropolitan dailies are oftentimes better informed on public questions than those of us who are i: the hurly-burly of legislation. The Boston Herald, under the heading of "Where are our ships?" says:

[From the Boston Herald, August 1, 1914.]

WHERE ARE OUR SHIPS?

Ninety-two per cent of all our overseas commerce—98 per cent of our vast commerce with Europe—is carried in foreign ships under foreign flags. This is one black, sinister fact that stares the American people in the face out of the European war cloud. These foreign ships are all a part of the potential war force of their several nations. Their officers and men are the "first line" of their naval reserve. When Great Britain, in her late conflict with the Boers, needed a transport and supply fleet, Boston and New York were stripped of many of their best liners, and ocean rates advanced from 100 to 300 per cent.

But the Boer War was a mere wayside skirmish compared with a general European conflict That South African affair harassed our overseas trade; a European war would destroy it. Of the many hundreds of steamers now crossing the North Atlantic only six are American steamers, all belonging to the one concern to which a subsidy is given by our Government.

Nine-tenths of the shipping upon which the life of our foreign commerce depends fly the colors of Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Austria, Russia, or Japan—the very nations most liable to be drawn into the vortex of a great and widen'ng combat. War will bring every one of their ships hurrying home, requisitioned for the national service, while commerce destroyers are let loose on every sea.

Only with the West Indies and the Caribbean ports have we any important communication under our own flag. The six American steamships in trans-Atlantic trade are matched by six in the trans-Pacific-oriental trade and three to Australasia. Their neutrality will be respected; they will be safe. But let nobody delude himself that any foreign merchant vessel, hastily "whitewashed" and transferred to our flag, as our laws now allow, will be respected for a moment. Let those who imagine this read the significant case of the Martaban in our Civil War.

There is only one way in which the United States can save itself from the effacement of its overseas commerce in a widespread European war, and that is by having its own ships, its own shipyards, its own officers and crews beforehand. The people of Massachusetts know this; the people of New England know it. So do the people of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, California, Oregon, and Washington. The United States has almost no merchant marine to-day, because every effort for 60 years for sound, proved legislation that would create a great commercial fleet has been blindly opposed and defeated.

This would be a good time to read in the Senate and House the names of the men, and the States they hail from, that are responsible for the fact that American overseas commerce can be instantly paralyzed by a quarrel among a few foreign Governments whose ships and flags monopolize our ocean carrying. The facts are in the RECORD, and they are worth the prompt and serious attention of the American people.

Another editorial, Mr. President, in a leading Boston newspaper, discusses this matter with great clearness and power. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A DEVIOUS, DANGEROUS PLAN.

At the demand of the cotton-growing South and the wheat-growing West, President Wilson is wrestling now with the terrific problem of contriving our escape from the inexorable consequences of national neglect of the American merchant marine in over-seas trade—a neglect for which the South and West are themselves primarily responsible.

Maritime New England has warned these agricultural sections year in and year out of the final cost of their blind opposition to every expedient that would give the Nation American ships and American sailors. They would not listen. Now, with great crops to export and no ships to convey them, they are shouting for help, but they are blundering in their frantic search for relief as they blundered in the long obstruction that has made their present plight inevitable.

They need not hope now for much assistance from foreign shipping. Great Britain probably joins the war; Belgium is already invaded and no longer neutral; Holland and Scandinavia may be attacked at any time. Nearly all the nations to which the South and West have forced us to surrender our ocean carrying are now aflame against each other and require every man and every ship for their own use. The bill which President Wilson has caused to be introduced into Congress opening the doors more widely to American registry of foreign vessels is sure to prove a delusion and a disappointment. Indeed, there is grave danger that it may prove even worse—that it may be the portent and cause of a terrible catastrophe.

Let it be remembered that our laws already permit the honest American registration of foreign ships less than five years old, and therefore new and efficient and properly inspected and certified as seaworthy carriers. But the extraordinary bill before Congress which President Wilson, with no practical knowledge of the sea, indorses would remove these valuable safeguards, and, in addition, suspend the prudent requirement that the principal officers of a naturalized ship shall be American citizens.

This proposition which the South and West have framed and the President favors puts an actual premium upon the use of foreign ships as against American ships, under the American flag, in the ocean trade of the United States. It is only these foreign ships that, on hoisting the American flag, are relieved from the requirement to carry well-paid American officers and to comply with our inspection laws. Is there another nation in Christendom except this, our own, where such a scheme could be introduced by a national administration without instantly and utterly destroying it?

It may be urged that there are not enough American officers—but the officers themselves through their accredited associations declare there are enough and more—that many are idle and seeking employment because of the general depression of trade; and they have earnestly protested against this bill to their Government in Washington. And why at any time, in any event, should Federal precautions for the safety of passengers, crew, and cargo be suspended against foreign ships under our flag and enforced against our own ships?

Nor is this all. The Panama Canal act, which the proposed bill amends, is fatally loose in its requirements for ownership. It prescribes, indeed, that a foreign ship in order to secure American registry for the overseas trade must be "wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States." The words which relate to corporations would allow a foreign company to present its vessels for American registry without a particle of actual American ownership except a single share of stock held by a dummy president and dummy directors.

This would comply with American law, but would it comply with the law or usage of the nations? Read what the declaration of London (1909) says on that point:

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel is exposed. Provided that there is an absolute presumption that the transfer is void.

"If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockade port.

"If a right to repurchase the vessel is reserved to the vendor.

"If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled."

There can be no reasonable doubt that a foreign vessel officered by foreigners, governed only by foreign inspection and registered in the name of a suddenly created corporation would be seized and confiscated, ship and cargo, whenever found, in spite of the fact that a brand new American flag—the only real American object aboard—was flying at the taffrail. Deception would inevitably bring disaster. The only American ships that are going to be respected in this terrific world-shaking conflict are the ships that were American before the war began.

There are such ships—there are many of them—mostly in the coastwise trade; many owned in Boston and officered by thoroughgoing Yankee sailors from Maine and Massachusetts Bay. Why should not these real American ships have a chance to carry western wheat and southern cotton? Why should "whitewashed" foreign tramps be encouraged to steal the flag and rob them of this neutral business? This is not the way to seize the present opportunity to create an American merchant marine. It is the way to destroy it.

Nothing is more inevitable than that, if Congress adopts this back-stairs method of securing foreign ships, condemned by international law and morality, it will involve the United States in this awful war before a month has ended. No belligerent navy will honor a stolen flag. There are German cruisers hovering on our coast and in the West Indies hunting French and British liners. Will the power that rushed through Luxemburg and Belgium halt because a familiar Royal Mail or a Messageries Maritimes steamer is masquerading under the Stars and Stripes? A quick broadside, a sunken ship, a wild cry for revenge, would be the answer. Our export and import trade is important; but it is still more important that the United States should be honest, with the world in arms.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know whether under international law if this bill passes we will become involved in the difficulties depicted in the editorial, but I do know that we are taking a mighty risk by putting foreign ships under the American flag under the conditions prescribed in this bill. I do not believe the effort will be a success, and, indeed, I shall be surprised if any considerable number of foreign vessels are put in the service of the United States under this bill.

In every step of our discussion of the merchant-marine question we have been met by the suggestion that if we would permit our people to buy ships from foreign nations the entire problem would be solved. Congress did not believe that. Those of us who composed the Merchant Marine Commission asked the shipowners of this country, asked the great bankers of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Baltimore, if we enacted a free-ship law whether they would invest their money in foreign ships. They all answered they would not do so because of the added cost of navigating an American ship; but, Mr. President, to meet that contention, those of us who did not believe in that principle yielded when the amendment of the Panama Canal act was offered, and for two years our people have had an opportunity to go into the foreign markets of the world and buy foreign ships, provided they were not more than 5 years old—and I can not imagine why anyone should want to buy a ship that was more than 5 years old—and put them in our foreign trade; but not one single foreign ship has been put under the American flag as the result of that legislation.

I say I do not believe that this legislation will be likely to accomplish any more than that legislation accomplished; but if it is desirable to try it, I certainly shall not stand in the way of the experiment being tried.

I would not have said a word to-day, Mr. President, had it not been for the fact that I thought it was an opportune time to say to the Senate of the United States that we ought to get together, Democrats and Republicans, those of us who believe in protection and those of us who do not, and make an honest and sincere effort to agree upon some measures looking to the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine.

To do that, Mr. President, will cost money; it will take money out of the Treasury of the United States; there is no question about that; but I have seen waste of money enough in this body, in this Congress, to justify me at least in voting for any appropriation, however large it might be, that will bring about the desired result.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say. I presume this bill is going to pass. I trust it will be amended in many particulars; and I am going to close by presenting a proposed amendment, which I will ask to have printed and lie upon the table, and which I may offer at a later time. It is based upon the suggestion, made by the Atlantic Carriers' Association, that we ought to require, before foreign vessels are placed under our flag, that a bond of $10 per registered ton be given by applicants that the vessel will remain under the American flag for at least five years, so that only bona fide vessels will be admitted; and, further, that the master and officers should swear out a declaration of intention to become American citizens.

I think, Mr. President, that that is a desirable amendment, and I submit it, calling the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee to the matter in the hope that he may see some merit in the proposition. I will ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

That when a foreign vessel shall be admitted to registry under the provisions of this act, a bond of $10 per registered ton shall be required as a guaranty that the vessel shall remain under the American flag for a period of at least five years: And provided further, That the masters and officers of such ships, if not already American citizens, shall swear out a declaration of intention to become American citizens.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I recognize the very great sincerity with which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has spoken with regard to our lack of ocean-going vessels, and I am very much interested in the subject with which he has so great a part in the debates of the Senate. At some other time which I think may be more favorable, and when possibly it might be more appropriate to make some political comments on our present condition as to over-seas navigation, I shall try to answer many of the statements and remarks and theories of the learned Senator; but it seems to me that the Senators who have addressed the Senate with so much solicitude regarding the dangers which will encompass us if we register some of these foreign vessels are unduly exercised. We are not undertaking to do an unfriendly act to any foreign power by obtaining shipping. I hardly see how we could do an unfriendly act to any of the powers of Europe now at war. We are trying to provide for an emergency with which we are faced because of the action of these foreign nations in preventing our commerce from going overseas. Now, certainly if we purchase from the nationals of a belligerent vessels belonging to those nationals, the belligerent can not find fault with us, because its own citizens have sold to ours. It can not be, either, on the other hand, that the other belligerents can find fault with us for doing in a peaceful way what those belligerents are trying to do with their enemy—to wit, take over or obtain its foreign commerce.

Therefore I am not persuaded by the arguments I have heard that we are in any danger if we in good faith take over the vessels of even a belligerent during a foreign war. What I am anxious about, Mr. President, is that there shall be no pretense about this and that our own citizens shall in good faith buy and own and run these vessels which we may so acquire. It seems to me that that is the most important thing we can look after.

I can imagine that complications might arise if we should allow the vessels of a belligerent nation to assume our flag when our own citizens have only a trifling percentage of ownership, or practically no ownership. As was suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], suppose that in the case of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, in Bar Harbor to-day unless she has moved, some Germans, acting through Americans, should obtain a Maine charter, which is a very easy thing to obtain overnight; suppose that vessel should be sold and delivered to the Maine corporation, with some gentleman in Maine acting as clerk of the corporation, as I believe they call him, owning one share of the stock, and his presence on the board furnishing the necessary resident agent in Maine, and he with half a dozen Germans resident in this country being the directors of that corporation; and suppose that ship should go out upon the seas flying the American flag—of course no foreign nation would respect that flag. We could not expect them to do it; and yet, if she did, with the facts as I have stated them concealed, a cry would go up in this country almost immediately to protect the flag.

We do not want such conditions as those to arise. I myself have offered some amendments to this bill. I believe one of them has been accepted by the committee which had them under consideration—that allowing our naval officers and men to take service on the foreign ships; but there are two other amendments which I think it would be much safer to have put on this bill.

The first provides, in effect—I am giving the substance of the amendment—that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be first satisfied as to the bona fide ownership of 90 per cent of the capital invested in the vessel by our own citizens, and not until he is so satisfied and consents thereto shall American registry be granted to a vessel. It seems to me that we ought to throw around the transfer of these vessels in this time of war much greater care and observe with great exactitude all the conditions that foreign belligerents can expect of us. That provision would give to a high officer of this Government the right to require the production of absolute proof as to ownership before the vessel became entitled to American registry.

The objection is made that that might involve us, by the fact that a high member of the Government had approved of it; but, while there may be something in the suggestion, I think, upon consideration, that if we place in this act a provision which requires that great and unusual care shall be taken regarding the transfer of these vessels, the foreign belligerents will give all the greater respect to our ships when they sail to sea under such circumstances.

In the discussion which occurred between the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge and the Senator from Iowa something was said to the effect that some special directions would be issued to the collectors in regard to registering these foreign-built vessels purchased by our citizens. What greater care, as the law exists, can be exercised than is now exercised? The mere production to the collector of a port of a bill of sale, properly executed, showing the transfer of a ship or a share in a ship entitles that transferee to have his bill of sale registered and obtain certified copies of it, and out he goes. The collector's act is purely ministerial. Apply that to the case of the Kronprinzessin Cecelie, with a transfer regularly made upon its face, but with concealed ownership. There is where our trouble might arise.

I do not believe for a minute that this Government would or should take notice of evasions of our neutrality laws and defend the flag under those circumstances; but how many millions of people in this country would declare that they did not believe that this ownership was a fact, and would declare that the Government at Washington was not defending our citizens and our flag? American citizens might be found who would go upon the boat nominally in command of her, possibly saying that they were in command of her, and so we might be drawn into complications. I do not believe we would ever be drawn into war through such a circumstance as that, but we might be drawn into complications if we do not take care to see that the transfer of such ships is bona fide in the first instance.

The second proposal I make is that there shall be no further transfer of such ships unless it is consented to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and unless the ships so purchased and so transferred shall always be subject to be taken by the Government of the United States for its use, in accordance with a precedent made in the case when the two vessels, I think the City of New York and the City of Paris, now the Philadelphia, were purchased in 1890 or 1892, and other ships were built for what is now the American Line.

Those two amendments, Mr President, I submit, ought to be in some way incorporated in this bill. It seems to me it would be safe to have them there; and I shall, when it is the regular order, ask for a vote upon those amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no intention whatever of detaining the Senate for more than a very few moments, although the subject now before the Senate is one that I have been deeply interested in for years.

I believe in an American merchant marine. I have voted, every chance I have had, for an American merchant marine. I had hoped the time would come when a majority of the Members of Congress could see the necessity of it. The unfortunate conditions existing in the world to-day have brought it forcibly to our attention; and I recognize that this is an emergency measure and believe it will be repealed before many years. I hope that out of this will grow legislation that will put our merchant marine back upon the seas of the world, and that our flag will be found in the ports of every country of the earth.

I am in accord with the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I believe the Senate ought to accept the amendment he has just referred to, even if it does so in a modified form. The only danger that I see in this legislation is that without an amendment of that character we are liable to get into trouble with foreign nations. We are liable to be embroiled with some belligerent power through its seizure of some foreign-owned boat carrying the American flag and manned by foreigners, as authorized by this bill. I do not believe the amendment will prevent a corporation with an honest desire to place its ships under the American flag and receive an American registry from doing so and accomplishing just what we want to by the enactment of this legislation.

If the Senate thinks that 90 per cent of the capital invested in any such foreign steamship shall be owned by American citizens is too much, let us reduce it to 51 per cent, so that at least the control of the corporation will be in the hands of American citizens. As I stated before, in a question asked of the Senator from Ohio, under the provisions of this bill there is no question but that the owners of the German boat now at Bar Harbor, Me., owned by German capital, run into that port by a foreign belligerent power, could within three days transfer the boat to an American corporation, and, under the laws of Maine, have the necessary American citizens as directors, with only sufficient stock to comply with the laws of that State as to the qualifications of directors, and all the balance of the stock could be owned by the present owners of the boat; and she could sail out of the port of Bar Harbor flying the American flag, and, meeting the ships that ran her into the port, could not be seized if the American flag and the American registry of the ship is recognized and respected.

There is no need of putting the American Nation in that position. If it would help the situation we might run the risk, but there is no necessity of it, because of the fact that it will bring no more ships, in my opinion, under the American flag, unless it is cases just such as I have cited. If it is undertaken, in my opinion, we will have trouble; and I hope and trust the Senate of the United States will adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware. As I say, however, if the Senate in its judgment thinks that 90 per cent is too much, I shall offer an amendment requiring 51 per cent, or a majority of the stock, to be owned by American citizens.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will state publicly what I have just suggested to the Senator from Utah. As I understand, the present law requires that the vessel shall be wholly owned by American citizens or by an American corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. In order to receive the registry.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order to receive American registry. If I am wrong about that, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is wrong about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It can be a corporation, which is a very different thing from an individual.

Mr. SMOOT. It applies to a corporation. For instance, I might call the Senator's attention to the company owning the St. Louis and the St. Paul, with an American registry, flying the American flag, and the majority of the stock of the company is owned in a foreign country. That happens in a number of cases with which I am familiar.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know that that was the law.

Mr. SHIVELY. The company which was organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey by virtue of that organization becomes an American citizen for all the purposes of owning and operating ships under the American flag. I have in mind now the old Navigation Co. Some years ago that company took out a new certificate, and entitled the organization the International Mercantile Marine Co. The International Mercantile Marine Co. was a couple of years ago—and I presume is now—operating 126 vessels, not over 6 or 8 of that entire number flying the American flag; and yet that company, ever since it took out its new certificate, has been in contract relations with the United States Government under the act of March 3, 1891.

In the year 1910 I had occasion to look up this matter. I presume substantially the same conditions exist to-day. The president of that company, organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, was J. Bruce Ismay, whose name was mentioned in connection with the Titanic disaster. Among the directors were Mr. Ismay, H. A. Sanderson, a British subject, and the Right Hon. Lord Pirrie, a British subject. These were among the directors. You see, the president himself was a British subject, and these were among the directors. On the United States side were such men as John F. Archbold, George W. Perkins, and John P. Morgan, jr.

Now, these payments, over $10,000,000 of which were made by the United States Government under the so-called mail contracts, have gone into the treasury of that company and have been distributed among the underlying companies. So you will see that under the present system, while you have on the face of it an American citizenship, you have underneath substantially foreign ownership.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can understand the statement of the Senator from Indiana, because that simply betrays the evasions which a holding company can always effect; but I did not know that a corporation organized under the laws of one of the States, and therefore a citizen of that State, could own and register a vessel for the foreign trade if all of its stock was owned by the subjects of foreign nations. If that is true, then we have no law that confines American registry to American citizens. Is the Senator from Utah quite sure with regard to that?

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure; but I want to say to the Senator from Iowa, in addition, that the organization of such a corporation as he has described could not take place in my State, nor do I believe it could take place in Indiana. I have not looked up the different incorporation laws of the different States, but I am positive that it could not take place in my State, because no corporation can be organized under the laws of Utah unless a majority of the persons organizing it are citizens of the State. I believe the laws are the same as to Indiana. But evidently the laws of New Jersey are not of the same character.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator is right about that. Such an organization could not have been made in the State of Indiana. At that time there were what they called very liberal laws in the State of New Jersey. That was a good place to go to organize corporations.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, we have done a million iniquitous things in New Jersey through our corporation laws, legislative laws, shipping laws, railroad laws, and the like. We have made some steps of improvement, and I trust, if God shall spare us as a Commonwealth, that we will ultimately clear our escutcheon as to the matter now before the Senate.

Mr. SHIVELY. You are making progress in New Jersey.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey that, in my opinion, the laws of New Jersey in that respect are not different from the laws of the greater number of the States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Then, God help humanity!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want at this time, as I say, to go into the discussion of the merchant-marine question; but I do believe, as I stated before, that now is the time and now is the chance for Congress to say that no foreign vessel the owners of which may come to this country to form an organization for the purpose of having the boat receive an American registry and fly the American flag should be permitted to do so unless at least a majority of the stock of the company is owned by American citizens. I shall cheerfully vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and, as stated before, if that amendment is defeated with the 90 per cent requirement, I shall offer one similar in character requiring only 51 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question, because I want to be clear about it, and I am not informed as to it. The law of the United States with regard to the subject, I take it, is found in section 4132 of the Revised Statutes, which, as amended in 1912, reads in this way:

> Vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof; and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States; and seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, not more than five years old at the time they apply for registry, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title.

I am inclined to think the Senator from Utah is right that if a corporation organized in a State owns a ship it is entitled to American registry, even though the corporation is entirely owned by foreigners.

Mr. SMOOT. With the exception of enough stock in order that the directors shall be qualified under the laws of the State. The laws of the State would regulate that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But there might not be any requirement even of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, even the directors could be foreigners.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator if that condition, such as is disclosed in the Panama Canal act of 1912, is not infinitely better than having all our foreign transportation absolutely controlled by foreign concerns which have no connection with this Government or any of its States, which are created and organized in foreign countries, and which are acting pursuant to the laws of those countries?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, there is no need of the Senator asking me that question, because I have been fighting as long as I have been in the Senate of the United States for building up the merchant marine; and if I had my way, instead of the United States transporting 2 per cent of her commerce in American bottoms, she would transport 98 per cent, and the foreigner would have the 2 per cent.

Mr. SHIVELY. How would the Senator do it?

Mr. SMOOT. I would do it by granting subsidies, if necessary.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is the idea.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah would build up a merchant marine under the flag of the United States which would be altogether owned in Europe.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be the situation under the present law, or that might be the situation under the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has followed me, I am asking now for the support of an amendment to this bill requiring that 90 per cent of the stock of the corporation shall be held by American citizens before the ship is entitled to American registry and to fly the American flag.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator think if that amendment were adopted and that condition imposed a single ship now owned by an American and flying a foreign flag would be transferred to the American flag?

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if that is the case, as implied by the Senator's question, the intention is to allow the foreign ships to come here and take out American registry and fly the American flag with no restriction whatever, and as soon as the difficulties now confronting the shipping interests of the world are removed, then they go right back to the foreign countries and fly the foreign flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the result, and what I want to do is this: If we are going to build up or assist our merchant marine now and have the American flag upon the sea, that we shall do it in a way that it will continue and that it will be an American industry owned by American people. I believe, Mr. President, that that will be the result if we put in this amendment providing for at least 51 per cent of stock, so that it shall be controlled by American capital.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has the reputation of being a very accurate mathematician, and when anything goes to the country from the Senator the country is very apt to believe it. Probably the Senator simply used it as an illustration, but he said that instead of having 2 per cent of our exports and imports carried in American ships he would have 98 per cent. I want to say that while in the early days we did carry 92 per cent, we are carrying now 9 or 10 per cent in American bottoms.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true and I am very glad the Senator called my attention to the fact because I know in the last report I saw it was stated to be nearly 9 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. About 9 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I only offered it, however, as an illustration.

Mr. President, that is about all I care to say at this time until the Senator offers the amendment.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not feel that I can add any enlightenment to this discussion, but I want to say that I have listened to these propositions and to their terms as far as they go, but they do not go far enough. All this anticipates private ownership. I am opposed to any process such as is proposed by the Senator from Utah of subsidy, and my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] a moment or two ago declared that it was a matter of partisanship. I say that is utterly unfair and untrue.

Mr. GALLINGER. Ah, but, Mr. President, my friend from New Jersey, who, I know, thinks as well of me as I think of him——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I think a world of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. What I said was that we ought to waive all partisanship, and if we can not agree——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But, Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will allow me to put myself right. I said, if we can not agree upon subsidies as a remedy let us try to agree upon some other method. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. God knows I will never take a step toward trying to agree on a subsidy, for there is no reason in the kingdom of God why you should pay my bill or aid me in my enterprise any more than I should aid you. I am opposed to a subsidy on principle, and I can not understand how any American citizen who stands for equal rights to all and special privilege to none can stand up and advocate a subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be true; but if the Senator occupies that position he ought to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD corrected so as to vote "no" in place of "aye" on a thousand subsidies during this session.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize that you can carry along such a line of reasoning, and that you might say everything we voted was a process of subsidy. That may be true, but the process of subsidy per se, as I understand it from the Senator, means granting a money stipend to men who will go together and build ships for the purpose of carrying on a commercial business. I am opposed to that. I do not believe I am a partisan in it; I am sheerly and strictly American in it. I want some process that shall establish a Government ownership. Many of my friends tell me it is heresy. I have been preaching it for 40 years. They did not listen to me; many thought I was a lunatic and my head full of wheels, but I find it preached to-day and believed in by hundreds and thousands of men in this country, and I am more and more in favor of it every day I live.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he believes in the ownership by the Government of all public-utility corporations.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do. I believe in the Government ownership of railroads; I believe in the Government ownership of telephone lines; I believe in the Government ownership of telegraph lines. It will be a blessing to this land when that shall be brought about. Do not delude yourself with the idea from Georgia that it is a heresy. You will wake up some morning and find it to be a very thoroughly established truth. If there is a profit in ocean carrying why in the name of heaven should not the people have it?

This is an extraordinary exigency of the time. Here we wake up and find a war the world over, the most alarming and bitter perhaps the world ever engaged in. God has blessed us with crops bounteous beyond a parallel, granaries fairly bursting, great storehouses congested, and we can not carry off our products. We have wheat enough to supply our own hungry mouths and the hungry mouths of millions on the other side of the water. We have shoes manufactured, we have cotton products, and we have almost everything that humanity needs. Yet we find because of the strife of the nations there is no way to transport across the water these great commodities and blessings that God has given us in this fair land of ours, and immediately come a dozen other fellows, who have been shy and shaky and cowardly and hesitating in enterprise, who are now willing to come in and say, "We will ship grain and ship everything else we have if you will grant us special privileges." I want a process whereby the Government shall buy, if you choose, the Kronprinzessin Cecilie in Bar Harbor and buy some more of them. In the meantime let us not stop our own shipbuilding, but proceed with shipbuilding under favoring laws and proper conditions, but not by a subsidy process.

I know very well and the Senate knows that the nations that have their craft tied up at the docks or anchored in shoal waters are very anxious to part with them at a reasonable price. Let us own them, not 51 per cent or 85 per cent or any per cent but 100 per cent of the craft. Let us own them and with intelligent mariners and engineers we will sail the craft.

My distinguished friend the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], with whom I have a thousand sympathies in common, tells us that the lighthouses have been extinguished. That is all true, and some of the buoys, it may be, have been removed. That is all true, but we all know that all the waters are charted and mapped, and we know it is not necessary for an engineer or a good mariner to see a bobbing buoy to know just where the shoal water is located. He looks over the whole thing and knows there is a buoy here, and it says 10 feet or 20 feet or 100 feet. So with this intelligent aid, with our intelligence, with our thrift, and our energy we are in possession of these facts better than are millions of those who live right on the borders of France, if you please, or on the English Channel. So to me that is flimsy, and I can not accept it as a sound argument.

I say let the Government appropriate sufficient money. I sketched a resolution yesterday, or the day before. I thought I would offer it. On showing it to one of my fellow citizens he was rather paralyzed, and said, "Great heavens! Jim; I think that is revolutionary." I should like to put in the possession of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Commerce the power to buy such craft as may be available to-day, or may be made available, and run it with American seamen. Then a new era would come. In the meantime, let our shipmasters and shipyards ply their trade, and we would establish a footing in the matter of a commercial marine that would appall many of the hesitating and doubtful men on the other side of the water. A new dawn and a brighter day would come for America under such a system of ownership. God speed it!

I will vote for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. I think it would be very good. I will do all I can now, in this exigency to lift the embargo that to-day remains upon our cotton, our corn, our wheat, and a million other products, and in our manufactures. Shoes by the million are demanded to-day. Our factories in Massachusetts and New Jersey will supply the needs. But we must have a method of transportation. Give us some such system. Let us start out in that direction and a happier day and a more glorious era in our country will have come.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, we have just listened to a very interesting speech. I am interested in the suggestion which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has just made to the effect that the Government should buy ships and operate them in a contingency of this sort.

We had an experience of that kind in 1898, owing to the policy or lack of policy which we had followed in not building up the auxiliary fleet for our men-of-war. We found it necessary at the beginning of the Spanish War to buy such merchantmen as were available for auxiliary purposes. The Government bought at that time 113 ships of different kinds, some to be transferred into cruisers and others to be used for auxiliary purposes. We paid for those 113 ships about $17,000,000. At the end of the war a board decided that 14 of them should be sold. Some of them were transferred to the Army service and some retained in the Navy. Four subsequently foundered and were lost at sea. On the 14 sold—and they were sold at the best prices obtainable, I assume—there was a loss of 74 per cent; that is, they sold for about 25 per cent of what they cost.

I happen to know that the purchases were made by a very competent board of naval officers, who went all over the country and did the best they could to get ships that would be useful at reasonable prices. Yet when they were no longer needed by the Government and had to be sold that was the net result.

Now, I wonder if the Senator from New Jersey would like to have the Government at this time launch into such an operation as that, if they can be obtained, operating them, and perhaps at a later day selling them for 25 per cent of what they cost.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will answer that that is not my purpose, nor if I had had the power would that have been the result. You bought these vessels in the Spanish War for a temporary purpose, with no policy. Mine reaches beyond the temporary. I want to establish a permanent system under Government ownership. Had I had the power, the money the Senator from Massachusetts refers to would not have been frittered away in that manner. If owned by the Government, they would have been manned by the Government. You bought a lot of old junk and hulks that had not been upon the markets of the world, as we have them to-day. We have markets now in which to purchase in Norway and in Sweden; we have the markets of England and the markets of Russia.

Mr. GALLINGER. We had those at that time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know we had, but we have a far better market to-day, for they are all at each other's throats and they do not know what under the heavens to do; but with that advantage before them they would rather take American gold for the best craft that ever sailed under the English or French or German flags.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from New Jersey should not say "you." He should say "we." We were all American citizens, doing the best we could.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator understands me. I only said "you" because you were taking the side of that investment. But the Lord knows it was far from being a good one.

I know I am a Democrat. I know that many on the other side are Republicans, and some of them are so weak that they are nearly as good a Democrat as I am, and I am proud of them. I regret if there is any partisanship in this matter. God knows that is furthest from my thought.

In answer to the Senator who asked me something as to how it would affect my State, in the votes that I have cast here for now two years and a half I have never had a thought as to how my vote was going to affect my State. I have felt that I am here as a Senator of one of the proudest States in this great galaxy of the Union. I am a Senator of the United States. I am going to do what my own conscience and my honest judgment declare to be best for my fellow man and best for the glory and welfare of my people.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while I doubt very much that any good will come from the passage of this bill, and I fear that much ill may come from it, and serious complications with other countries, I shall not oppose its passage. I hope that it may be amended in some particulars.

Listening to this debate I felt that I could not refrain from calling the attention of the Senate to a suggestion that I made here a year ago. I am going to take but a few moments of the Senate's time, but I want to submit a few observations on the general situation.

About midnight on the 8th of September, 1913, when we had the tariff bill under consideration, I submitted some remarks on an amendment I had offered to that bill in the line of ancient Democratic doctrine for the encouragement and building up of the merchant marine of the country. After I had called attention to the conditions of our merchant marine, showing the lack of it and the business that we had dependent upon it, I made an observation as to what I thought might happen in the near future. I want to read that statement now.

Not only is this condition of things humiliating—

That is, the condition that we had a tremendous foreign trade of which only about 8 per cent was carried in our own ships—

Not only is this condition of things humiliating and unprofitable, but it is actually dangerous. British ships transport the great part of our foreign commerce. Suppose England should engage in a war with a great power. Thousands of her ships would be taken for transports and other thousands might be destroyed. Our foreign commerce would be destroyed, and the products we now send abroad would be left on our hands, glutting our markets and bringing upon us industrial ruin and widespread commercial disaster. Farmers and manufacturers would suffer alike, and the laborer and his family would face the wolf of hunger in his home.

I had no idea at that time that this condition of things would come about as it has. I had no idea at that time that within a year the Congress would be confronted with that very condition of things. Yet that is the situation now. Not since the world came into being has there been such a spectacle as we present to the people of the world to-day. We have the greatest concentration of power and wealth and intelligence on the face of the earth, and yet we are practically helpless. We have a foreign trade amounting to more than $4,000,000,000 annually and are threatened with no means of reaching market. We are in a panic not because we are at war, not because we are threatened with war, but because practically all the civilized nations on the face of the earth are at war with each other, and the ships that have heretofore been carrying our commerce are not now available.

There is nothing to transport the products of our farms and our factories to the people that need and desire these products, and we are now by this bill inviting to the American flag in order to meet this situation the old, worn-out, unsafe, unstable, unworthy, inefficient vessels of every nation of the earth to come under our flag without inspection, without survey, without examination, and with foreign officers as well as men, to transport our products under our flag in vessels that are unsafe and unseaworthy. Of course, we may get some good ships, but under this legislation we are inviting every foreign-built vessel of every kind and character to come in under our flag, and the poorest and less seaworthy will be the ones most likely to be purchased.

Mr. SHIVELY. I know; but does it not occur to the Senator that if there is to be a vessel purchased there must be somebody to purchase it, and does the Senator feel that when it comes to this subject our business men are going to dismiss their common sense and buy the old rotten hulks he speaks of?

Mr. JONES. Why, Mr. President, a man will take almost any risk to make a little profit; and the conditions are likely to become such, with the terrific struggle that is going on, and with the conditions that are likely to result from it, that men will run almost any risk in order to get the exorbitant prices that it may be possible for them to get for the transportation of products. That may not come about, but I say that that condition of things is possible; and I believe it is almost probable.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, under our present registration laws a vessel built in the United States has got to be subjected to inspection; it has got to be subjected to a survey before it can get registration. Certainly these are ghosts and spooks and hobgoblins that the Senator from Washington is now conjuring up with which to alarm us.

Mr. JONES. We authorize the President to waive surveys.

Mr. SHIVELY. Only under the extreme case and circumstances described in the bill.

Mr. JONES. We authorize the President expressly in this bill to waive surveys and inspections before the admission of these ships to our flag. That is one of the conditions; that is one of the things necessary to induce these ships to come under our flag and to take our register. I am not denouncing it; I am simply bringing this out as a condition which confronts us; I do not say that it is unwise to do it now; but I simply want to emphasize the condition which is before the American people, that in order to get our products carried across the sea we deem it advisable and necessary to present legislation of this character in this emergency.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course that is why we are here. What would the Senator have us do?

Mr. JONES. I would have us get to work and try to frame some legislation in a statesmanlike way that will build up a merchant marine in this country. I would say let us lay aside the legislation that we are now working on awhile and spend a few days—a week might be all that is necessary—as nonpartisans get to work and frame some legislation that will be permanent and build up the merchant marine. This will not amount to anything.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then, let us have a vote on the proposition.

Mr. JONES. Why, Mr. President, a vote will not amount to anything on the passage of this bill, which is only temporary and which is admitted is temporary.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I do not yield just now, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIVELY. Up to this minute the Senator from Washington has not made a suggestion as to what he would do.

Mr. JONES. I will make a suggestion, if the Senator will merely give me an opportunity. I do not suppose he will follow it, but I have just made a suggestion, and that is that this Congress, with its patriotism and its intelligence and its statesmanship, get together earnestly and try to frame some legislation not only to meet the present emergency but to meet the condition that will exist when this emergency passes. Let this Congress get together and try to frame some legislation that will take care of the situation and prevent its recurrence hereafter.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator has made it clear that we should get together and consume more time.

Mr. JONES. Oh, Mr. President, there has not been any suggestion here to-day, though we have been talking since 11 o'clock, that we ought to stop. I should have been through by this time if I had not been interrupted by some of my friends on the other side, and I can really see no special justification for the interruption, because I have not been condemning them for not doing anything; I have been calling to the attention of the country at least, I hope, a condition of things that warrants and justifies, possibly, this temporary legislation. It seems to me that out of this condition we ought to realize our duty as representatives of the people and endeavor to try to frame legislation of a permanent character that will take care of and prevent such situations in the future.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] that this legislation is so imperatively necessary that it should be passed at once, without further debate, I desire to call attention to a statement by the Secretary of Commerce of to-day after a conference with Secretary of State Bryan.

"The last thing we need worry about," said Mr. Redfield with emphasis, "is getting our crops abroad. Europe must have our wheat or starve. Will she starve or will she provide means of transportation? It's up to the other fellow to provide ships. Grain may be tied up for a few weeks, but not permanently."

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, just at that point, since the Senator from Wyoming has seen fit to read that extract, I wish to say that he is utterly mistaken if he assumes that I indicated to him that I regard this as such an awful crisis; but after the lurid pictures which have been painted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the alarming situation that is presented to the Senate, it occurred to me that in view of such a menacing prospect and from his standpoint the quicker we get this legislation passed the better.

Mr. JONES. If we should vote on legislation that will meet the situation, of course, I admit that; but I doubt if this legislation will meet the situation. It will not bring relief. It will not furnish ships. Under it no new ships will be built, and the uncertainties are so great I fear no one will buy good foreign ships for our trade. This legislation was presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] with the plea that it is absolutely imperative; that it is demanded by the cotton growers and the wheat growers of the country in order that their products may be marketed; and it has been urged most earnestly that we should have some relief of this character. I hardly concur with the statement of the Secretary of Commerce, which has just been read. I do think that we are in a critical situation; I do think our people are going to have trouble to get their products across the sea; I do not think there is any question about that. This is inevitable unless some of the warring nations drive the opposing nations from the sea. As I have said, I am not going to vote against this bill; but I should like to see us at this time do something of a permanent character to take care of the situation, not only for the present but for the future. We should not be content with a mere makeshift.

This is the time to do it, when the people realize what it means to be without the means of transportation, to be without ships. I know that heretofore in the discussion of legislation which was intended or hoped to upbuild the merchant marine there have been certain sections of the country where they said they were not interested in the matter of building up a merchant marine. I know that in some of the interior sections of the country they have opposed it because, they said, it was for the benefit of the Shipping Trust, or for the benefit of the cities along the seashore, or for the benefit of the water lines of transportation, and of no interest to them. The present exigency shows that the man who is farthest away from water is most interested in the ships of the country; that the farmer who has the greatest difficulty in getting his product to market is more interested than is anybody else in having the means for the transportation of those products across the sea and to the markets of the world. So it seems to me that this is the time to take up this question. This is the time, when the farmer in the interior, when the business man away from the water has it brought home to him that it is important that we should have shipping lines, and that whatever methods we take to upbuild the merchant marine of the country are methods taken for the benefit of the farmer, for the benefit of the business man in the interior, for the benefit of the interior sections of this country, and not for the special benefit of the harbors along the coast or the shipping lines. In whose behalf is this legislation urged? Not for the shipping concerns, not for the harbor cities of the country, not for the seaboard. It is urged for the interior sections, for the farmers of the Mississippi Valley and those great producing sections that supply the world with their productions. This question has been brought home to them as never before, and they are in a frame of mind to appreciate any honest effort to solve this great problem.

Mr. President, I have proposed an amendment to this bill that suggests a remedy which I believe we ought to adopt. I do not know whether or not my friend from Indiana has read the amendment. In brief, it is good, old Democratic doctrine, doctrine that my Democratic friends can not go back on or can not deny. I believe that it is the only method by which we ever shall build up the merchant marine. I have voted for other propositions, because I have been willing to vote for almost anything that has held any hope of building up the merchant marine of this country; because I thought that I realized the importance of a merchant marine for a great manufacturing and producing country like this; but the proposition that I would prefer, and that I believe in more than anything else, is the proposition that was declared for definitely in the Republican platform of 1896, and, in my judgment, was in the minds of the Democratic platform makers of 1912. That was the policy inaugurated when the Government was founded and which proved, by its results, that it was a most effective agency along those lines.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, if the bill pending here to-day does not accomplish the ends sought, who is to provide ways and means to lead the children out of the wilderness?

Mr. JONES. Well, I was hopeful that we whom the people have sent here might take steps to lead us out of this trouble; but if you do not do anything else now except to pass this bill, I am pretty confident as to the leadership under which something will be done in the very near future.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered, and to which I have called the Senator's attention, in brief, provides that within 30 days after the signing of articles of peace at the conclusion of the war now going on in Europe all goods imported in foreign ships shall bear a duty of 10 per cent more than under the law of 1913, and that goods admitted free shall come in at a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem if they are imported in foreign ships, with a provision for the abrogation of the treaties in the manner provided by law and directing the President to carry on negotiations to that end as soon as possible.

I am not going into a general discussion of the matter, because I do not anticipate that that amendment will be put on to this bill. It will be said that it opens up a great question, and I will admit that it does, but I do believe that this Congress ought to take up that question. I believe that a proper solution of this question will yield greater benefit to the people of this country than can be accomplished in any other way or by any other legislation, and I will be perfectly willing to stay here all summer, and all fall if necessary, to pass such legislation; I believe that if Congress were to get down to it in earnest we could pass, inside of two or three weeks, legislation of this kind that would take care of the situation and the emergency now upon us. When that emergency passes away, if we do not provide for something of that kind, the very moment that peace comes we will have to fight the same influences, the same policies, and the same principles that have heretofore not only driven our flag from the sea but kept it from the sea. I should like to see us in an entirely nonpartisan way—because I do not consider this a partisan question at all—try to solve this problem by enacting legislation along this line, for I know it would be of great benefit to the people of the country.

If this war continues any length of time, the losses to the people of this country will be enormous when their profits should be great. Those losses will far and away exceed anything it would have cost to insure a merchant marine, even if the wildest subsidy measures had been carried out. You may call it subsidy, if you will, but any measure that will furnish ample shipping for war and peace is a measure of general benefit and wise, beneficent, and patriotic purpose.

This is a time to show our statesmanship. Instead of harassing domestic trade with crude and unwise laws let us legislate for the encouragement, promotion, and development of our foreign commerce and deserve and command the gratitude of a grateful people.

Mr. President, there is one other amendment which I have offered to this bill upon which I suppose the committee did not act favorably, but which I trust the Senate may favor when I have presented the facts upon which it is based.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I may say, Mr. President, that the amendment just referred to by the Senator from Washington was considered by the committee, and some of the members of the committee saw merit in it, but thought it was so foreign to the immediate purposes of the legislation contemplated by this bill that it would be a cause of complication and possible delay if it were taken up and approved by the committee.

Mr. JONES. I can appreciate that situation, and really had no hope that the committee would feel justified in acting favorably upon it, but I wanted to call it to the attention of the Senate and the people. I will inquire as to the amendment offered by me with reference to the coastwise trade.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The committee did not give that its approval.

Mr. JONES. I did not know that the committee was going to meet, or I might have gone before them to show in brief the reasons why I offered that amendment; but I want to call the Senate's attention to some facts which I think show that the purpose to be served by that amendment is exactly the purpose to be served by the other provisions of this bill, and when he knows these facts I believe the Senator will approve this amendment.

This bill is intended to take care especially, I think, of the Atlantic coast; that is, of the trade that goes out from the Atlantic ports. My project is of especial interest to the people of the Pacific coast. Of course, I know that the bill of which the Senator from New York is in charge is general and would apply, so far as the exigencies might arise that would be covered by it, to the Pacific coast; but I have some telegrams here asserting that they have not on the Pacific coast vessels sufficient to carry the lumber from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic. It takes ocean-going ships to go around through the Panama Canal. We have plenty of ships possibly for our coastwise trade between coastal points on the Pacific coast, but we have not enough ships, according to the statements of the gentlemen who have communicated with me, to take care of the trade that will go through the Panama Canal and that ought to go through there. I want to read a telegram or two bearing on that point.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, before the Senator begins reading the telegrams, I will inquire for information, Are not the ships belonging to the Merchants & Miners' Line; the vessels of the Ocean Steamship Co., of Savannah; and the steamers of the Clyde Line, going from Jacksonville to New York, of sufficient size and power to go through the canal?

Mr. JONES. I presume so; but I do not expect that they will leave the routes on which they are now engaged in order to ply between ports on the Pacific and ports on the Atlantic.

Mr. WEST. And they are capable even of crossing the ocean, if necessary?

Mr. JONES. Certainly; but I do not anticipate that those ships will leave the routes they are now on and go on a route between ports on the Atlantic and ports on the Pacific; those who have communicated with me do not think so, anyway.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, there is no worse weather anywhere than around Cape Hatteras where these vessels travel every day.

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied the Senator does not get the point I am trying to make, and that is this: Those ships do not want to engage in trade between Pacific ports and Atlantic ports; they have established routes and they will keep on those routes. They are not going to come to us; and we have not sufficient ships for the trade; we are lacking in the ships—or that is the contention—to bring our products around from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what means of transportation shippers have on Puget Sound—and that, I suppose, is the part of the country in which the Senator is most interested——

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. For carrying lumber at the present time? How do they get their product to the Atlantic ports, the canal not being open?

Mr. JONES. We have not been bringing much lumber by water, but we had hoped when the Panama Canal was constructed that we would ship a great deal of it through the canal. A great part of our lumber now is sent over the railroads.

Mr. GALLINGER. My query was whether it is now transported by railroads rather than by water.

Mr. JONES. It is transported very largely by rail to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BURTON. High-grade lumber is shipped by the railroad.

Mr. JONES. Of course high-grade lumber comes that way. Rough lumber can be shipped around Cape Horn, but not much is so shipped. We send a great deal of our lumber to Australia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator's amendment would not affect that traffic?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator reads the telegrams he was about to read I will say that I was rather startled at the proposition of the Senator from Washington to wipe out the coastwise laws of the United States to accommodate a small portion of the country.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is making that too broad; I have not proposed to do that at all; I do not think the Senator intends to put me in a wrong light.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not.

Mr. JONES. My amendment simply provides that between points on the Atlantic and points on the Pacific, or between the points on the Atlantic and points on the Pacific the President may suspend the provisions of law confining such trade to American ships, if the exigencies warrant.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand; but that is coastwise shipping at the present time.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Senator proposes to amend the coastwise laws to that extent?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; that is the object.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, the camel gets his head in the tent, does he not?

Mr. JONES. That may be what it means; but the situation is about like this: So far as the Panama Canal is concerned, in view of the action Congress has taken, it is of practically no benefit to us, and now we want something that will be of benefit.

We find that nobody is looking after our interests, except ourselves, and we are trying to look after them. We may not make very much headway at it, but we will try. It surely is no more dangerous to permit the President to suspend the coastwise laws in this particular to afford relief to one great industry than it is to permit him to allow any kind of an old vessel to be registered under our flag, without survey or inspection and officered and manned by foreigners, to afford relief to the industries of the East and Middle West.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I was going to get through very soon.

Mr. SHIVELY. I did not intend to detain the Senator at all, but merely to ask him a question concerning his amendment, which appears on page 9, does it not?

Mr. JONES. I think it is the last amendment printed in the bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. While the question may be more or less academic, because of the observation just made by the chairman of the committee——

Mr. JONES. I hope the fact that the committee did not report it favorably would not impress the Senator with its lack of merit.

Mr. SHIVELY. I invite the attention of the Senator to the language he employs, and ask him whether he thinks it is sufficient? It reads:

And the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of domestic trade require—

And so forth. Does the Senator think that that language is sufficiently definite as applying to a state of facts to clothe the President with the power suggested by his amendment?

Mr. JONES. I thought I followed the language of the bill, which provides in section 2:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, wherever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require—

And so forth. I think I have followed that language.

Mr. SHIVELY. I think if the Senator will reflect upon the matter he will recall that that language has been amended by a suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], in order to be certain that it may be taken out of the case of Clark against Field.

Mr. JONES. I did not have the benefit of that when I wrote this amendment. It might be that that suggestion would be better than the language I have used. I took the language that was used in the House bill and followed that. I should be glad to accept any suggestion that comes from the Senator from Arkansas that would make the language definite, or from the Senator from Indiana, either, for that matter.

I have some telegrams here from Seattle dated yesterday. One of them is as follows:

In considering the pending measure authorizing President to suspend navigation law in order to permit American register of foreign bottoms provision should be made for use of these ships in Atlantic to Pacific service, and vice versa. There are only a few ships under American register suitable for lumber carrying via Panama Canal. The handicap of free lumber and repeal of tolls act can, in a measure, be counteracted by such provision. Can you do anything in its behalf?

J. H. BLOEDEL.

Mr. Bloedel is one of our prominent business men there and very reliable.

I have another telegram from Mr. D. E. Skinner to substantially the same effect, in which he states that it is practically the unanimous opinion of the lumbermen of the Pacific coast that for a long time we must secure increased transportation facilities by allowing foreign vessels to ply in the intercoastal trade, and so forth. I ask permission to insert the telegram in my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PORT BLAKELEY, WASH., August 3, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Practical unanimous opinion lumbermen this coast for a long while that we must secure increased transportation facilities by allowing foreign vessels to ply in intercoastal trade or admission of foreign vessels to American registry. This absolutely necessary since repeal of free tolls. If you coincide with our opinion, especially admission foreign vessels American registry, please use utmost effort in emergency measure proposed to this effect to see that they are permitted to be used in intercoastal trade. Admission strictly coastwise trade on Atlantic and Pacific not essential. Please answer fully as to conditions emergency measure and probability of our suggestions being accepted, care Benson Hotel, Portland.

D. E. SKINNER.

Mr. JONES. I telegraphed to Mr. Blooedel to give me the facts upon which he was urging this proposition, and he says this in reply, to which I call the attention of the Senator from New York:

Facts showing necessity for this amendment are that all foreign commerce has now been canceled in lumber, account our necessity to use foreign bottoms, especially German and English. There are only two ships on the Pacific coast adapted to the lumber trade, and practically none on the Atlantic coast, under American register. Therefore it is out of the question to expect to use American ships. If the canal is to be of any advantage after opening on August 15, we must have available shipping to move our lumber. The Atlantic seaboard offers a large field for exportation of our products, but can not be entered without the necessary shipping capacity. British Columbia, a strong competitor of the State of Washington in lumber production, can use foreign ships, and with free lumber has an advantage over us. A practical example, to illustrate, is the steamer Robert Dollar, flying the British flag, which left Vancouver Island a month ago containing nearly 5,000,000 feet of lumber destined partly for New York and partly for New London. No shipments from the American side have been made, nor can they be made unless navigation laws are changed.

Then I have here, from the President of the Pacific Fir Co., the following telegram:

The whole Pacific coast needs the use of foreign vessels to carry lumber and other products to the Atlantic coast through Panama Canal. There are not enough American ships to take care of this business. With our foreign trade cut off, as conditions now exist, our mills will have to close down unless we get this relief. I sincerely hope your amendment will carry.

Then there is this telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle:

Board of trustees Seattle Chamber of Commerce authorizes forwarding resolution formulated by committee on foreign commerce as follows:

"Whereas at this time shippers of lumber, flour, and other products of Pacific coast are practically wholly dependent upon foreign ships for transportation of their commodities to foreign countries, and there are insufficient American ships to conduct the commerce; and

"Whereas the shippers have been notified by the agents of these foreign lines that they are unable to engage cargo for forward shipment; and

"Whereas we are just now approaching the heaviest shipping period of the year, with an enormous quantity of wheat, lumber, salmon, and other products; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal can be of no material advantage to the shippers of this coast either in foreign or Atlantic coast trade unless suitable and adequate shipping facilities can be secured: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Seattle Chamber of Commerce use its influence with Congress and the President to amend the Panama Canal act to permit foreign vessels, irrespective of age, obtaining American registry, limiting them to foreign trade—

That is in support of the bill that is pending—and to the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of United States, but excluding them from the coastwise trade between the ports of the United States on the same coast.

J. E. CHILBERG, President.

Mr. President, those are the telegrams and this is the statement of facts on which I have offered this amendment. It seems to me it presents a state of facts very similar to what has been presented in behalf of this bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. It shows that the sailings of foreign vessels carrying our lumber to foreign ports have been canceled, our lumber is left on our hands, and we have not the ships to take it to market, just as we have not the ships to carry the wheat and the cotton of other parts of the country to market. So they ask this legislation in that behalf, because of those facts and those reasons. The lumber we have heretofore been sending to foreign countries through foreign ships is on our hands because of the war. We want a way to get it to the Atlantic markets that need it.

I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it would relieve ships sailing from a point on the Pacific coast to a point on the Atlantic coast, or the reverse, from the operations of our present navigation laws governing coastwise trade?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. Would it authorize——

Mr. JONES. It authorizes the President to go as far as he thinks advisable.

Mr. SHIVELY. Would it authorize a ship sailing from a point on the Pacific coast to deliver its cargo from point to point on the Atlantic coast, or simply between two points, one on one coast and the other on the other coast?

Mr. JONES. The intention of the bill was to cover shipments between one point on one coast and one point on the other, although——

Mr. SHIVELY. Excluding entirely the idea of port-to-port transactions?

Mr. JONES. I think probably, if we pass the bill, it ought to permit a vessel from a point on the Pacific Coast——

Mr. SHIVELY. To make distribution of its cargo?

Mr. JONES. To make distribution of its cargo between two points on the Atlantic, but not to engage in the coastwise trade between the two except in the discharge of its cargo.

Mr. SHIVELY. In the discharge of its cargo the President could authorize it to stop at different points on the coast of destination?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I should think so.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay the consideration of this bill for more than a few moments.

I think that never since the days of the Civil War has our country had so fine an opportunity as now to increase her shipping. The farmers of the country, the cotton planters of the South, the wheat and grain and corn farmers of the West and the Mississippi Valley are blessed with abundant crops. Their one great need now is ample transportation facilities to Europe for their surplus crops.

We have noticed lately how, owing to the embargo in the matter of shipping that has arisen from the war, the quotations for grain in the great markets of the West—in Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth—have dropped and dropped. We need extra shipping; and never since the days of the Civil War has there been such an opportunity to get it as there is on this occasion.

There are two drawbacks that have prevented us from increasing our deep ocean going shipping: First, the extraordinary cost of our vessels, and, second, the cost of operating them. I have no doubt that during the stress that now exists in the Old World our people will be given the opportunity of buying shipping at reduced rates; much cheaper than they would be able to secure vessels in this country. Then, in connection with that, owing to the fact that so many merchant vessels from the belligerent countries have been thrown out of service, our shipping will necessarily be able to secure higher freight rates.

In two directions, then, during the present exigency and during the existence of the war, from two standpoints, our shipping can get a benefit and will be able to rise out of the chaos of despondency in which it has been for many years. First of all, our people can secure cheaper vessels, owing to the exigencies of the war. In the next place, they can secure higher freight rates and in that way make a success of the traffic.

We have never since the days of the Civil War had such an opportunity, and this bill opens the door. We can then try out the question whether or not our vessels, purchased and operated under these conditions, will be able to compete with the shipping of the Old World.

There is a further thing, too, that gives us an opportunity, and that is the fact that the war will necessarily destroy and eliminate a good deal of the shipping of the countries of the Old World. I need not name them; perhaps it would be impolitic to name them; but undoubtedly some of the shipping of the great countries of the Old World will be eliminated. There will be less shipping to compete with, and our shipping will have a better opportunity on the high seas.

Now, in my opinion, is the accepted time; and while this bill perhaps does not go as far as we might go, it is an entering wedge I am glad to see that the bill is pending, and I feel satisfied that after we adopt this bill and operate under it for a while we will have a bigger shipping than we have ever had since the days of the Civil War.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator one question?

Mr. NELSON. I want to tell the Senator one thing that staggered me about the Shipping Trust in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

Mr. NELSON. During the Spanish War we had occasion to buy transports from other countries. On account of the neutrality laws we could not hire that shipping, and we had to buy it. The United States bought a number of vessels. Then, after the war was over, and the Government wanted to sell the ships, the Shipbuilding Trust came up here before the Commerce Committee, of which I was a member, and objected to the Government selling its own ships with an American registry. After I saw those manifestations I had no more use for the Shipping Trust.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government did sell them for about 26 per cent of what the Government paid for them; so the Shipping Trust did not stop the sale. They were bought for an emergency, and I can see no good reason why they should have been sold under American registry and engaged in our coastwise trade.

Mr. NELSON. They did not stop it, but they prevented the sale with an American registry, and that compelled the Government to sell them at reduced prices.

Now, what have you accomplished in all of these years with your law? What have you accomplished? Have you succeeded in the last 25 years, by this strait-jacket system, in building up our merchant marine? You have had a monopoly of shipbuilding. You have said that while I can buy a coat or a suit of clothes in any country in the world if I choose to do it, yet I can not sail a ship under the American flag unless it is built in a shipyard in this country. What have you accomplished in the way of rehabilitating our foreign-going merchant marine?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator appears to be excited, but, nevertheless, I am going to ask him a question.

Mr. NELSON. Ask your question.

Mr. GALLINGER. We might have allowed foreign ships to come in as the foreign coat did if they had paid a duty; but that is not what the Senator proposes. He propose to let foreign ships in without paying any duty. You pay a duty on the coat now, but not on the ship.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that every one of the great maritime countries of the world except our own has free ships? Is not that a fact?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have free ships, too, under the Panama Canal act.

Mr. NELSON. Laying aside the Panama Canal act, is it not a fact that every maritime country in the world except the United States has free ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Panama Canal act is the law of the land, and you can bring in your free ships under that.

Mr. NELSON. How many foreign-going ships have you succeeded in building and launching, under this straight-jacket system, within the last 25 years?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is again rather turbulent.

Mr. NELSON. I am not turbulent. I am a little emphatic.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have not accomplished this result because of the fact that men from the section that the Senator represents have opposed all proposed legislation; but now that there are——

Mr. NELSON. Oh, well, the Senator need not slander little Norway, with two and a half million people.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not referring to Norway.

Mr. NELSON. She is a neutral country, but her shipping is next to that of the United States. Norway has free ships, and with two and a half million people she has a shipping next to that of the United States. Would not that be a good model for the people of New England to follow?

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not refer to Norway, so that is gratuitous.

Mr. NELSON. Well, I rather got the impression that the Senator was reaching out in that direction——

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not.

Mr. NELSON. And he had better not reach out any more.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I fear that I must appeal to the Chair to protect me, because the Senator is threatening now and I am afraid he will do something violent. [Laughter.] May I ask my question now?

Mr. NELSON. Ask it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's second reason was that we could not navigate our ships in competition with foreign ships.

Mr. NELSON. I never said that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NELSON. That has been your argument.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator just said it.

Mr. NELSON. That has been the argument of the Shipping Trust. Why, we have the best sailors and the best mariners in the world in the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator mean to say that we can navigate our ships in competition with those of foreign countries without aid of some kind?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, that has been your plea—that you could not do it without a great big subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think we can do it?

Mr. NELSON. Unless you plastered over your sailors and your masters and your ships with subsidies, you could not compete; that has been your argument.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we have not any subsidies now, and we are not doing it. Can we do it?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, you have one subsidized line—the American Line.

Mr. GALLINGER. With four ships.

Mr. NELSON. They were to give us great help, and they never got beyond four ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all. Even with a subsidy, then, we can not compete with foreign ships.

Mr. NELSON. We have, even without a subsidy. With a subsidy you gave us four ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Without a subsidy, since the Panama Canal act was passed, we have at least gotton 50 per cent of that—two ships. That shows something.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not discovered them. Where are they? What two foreign-built ships are they?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from New York called my attention to them the other day.

Mr. GALLINGER. They probably bought a schooner or a gasoline launch.

Mr. NELSON. Well, Mr. President, we know something about schooners in my country. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he did not give as a second reason, that we could not navigate our ships in competition with foreign ships?

Mr. NELSON. That was not my reason. That is what you said. That is your contention. Your contention all along has been that without subsidies we never could compete.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the fact prove that?

Mr. NELSON. Take our shipping out of the strait-jacket and you will not only get more shipping but you will get more work for the American sailors and American masters and American engineers on our vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. We took it out of the strait-jacket by the Panama Canal act and got no results.

Mr. NELSON. About half as much as you got out of the subsidy to the American line.

Mr. GALLINGER. I deny that any American ships have been bought since the act was passed.

Mr. NELSON. We will try it under this bill and see what we will get. I want to say on behalf of the farmers of the Northwest that we are as much interested in the shipping question as the shipbuilders of New England. They carry our products to market and we need them.

Mr. GALLINGER. You are interested now, but you were not when the opportunity was presented to have shipping legislation, because you were satisfied that you could have foreign ships.

Mr. NELSON. What about these foreign ships? I am glad that the war has come, in one way. We find that American capitalists have been investing their money in foreign ships. Perhaps some of those ships will be idle and they will not draw their dividends. Any American so unpatriotic as to invest his capital in a foreign ship sailing under a foreign flag I have no use for.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a great deal.

Mr. NELSON. I have no use for him. Even if I was not born in this country, I want to tell the Senator from New Hampshire, I am glad this war will leprive some of the rich Americans who put their money into foreign ships of their dividends and give us a chance to build up American shipping.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have made the observation I rose to make and I am done.

Mr. NELSON. Call it a footnote to what I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will call it a postscript.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; either a footnote or a postscript.

Mr. GALLINGER. American capitalists have invested in foreign ships because under our law we have no governmental protection for our ships. They could not by any possibility invest in American ships and make them profitable. Neither would the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. It was the almighty dollar that moved them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and it is the almighty dollar that moves you to advocate this law so as to get your wheat to a foreign market.

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, quite a number of statements have been made in regard to the ships on the Great Lakes, some of which, it is alleged, are available for the foreign trade. I have sent telegrams of inquiry and received answers. I will not detain the Senate for the purpose of reading them. The replies seem to show that only ships of comparatively small size, 250 feet in length and with a draft of 14 feet, are available in any event. These boats have a carrying capacity of 3,000 tons, some more than that. There are about 40 with American registry, but it is stated that there is a larger number of foreign-built ships on the Canadian side of the Welland Canal which might be used for trans-Atlantic traffic. One of these telegrams is from Capt. John Mitchell, a vessel owner and operator of large experience; two of them from Hon. James H. Cassidy, who was a Member of the Sixty-first Congress; and another from the manager of the steamship line plying between Chicago and the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think that those big carriers on the Lakes, from their form of construction and all that, are unfit for ocean traffic?

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think so. They have less freeboard and their engines and boilers are located in the stern.

Mr. NELSON. I have sailed on them to Duluth. I think those big carriers carry from five to ten thousand tons of ore.

Mr. BURTON. More than that—12,000, some of them.

Mr. NELSON. They are utterly unfit for a sea voyage across the Atlantic, and what is more, I doubt whether they can get out of the St. Lawrence Canal. So the idea of getting any help from shipping on the Great Lakes looks to me as far-fetched and shadowy.

Mr. BURTON. A more serious objection, no doubt, is the length. Some of the latest are 600 feet and more, and the Welland Canal allows boats of only about 250 feet to go through.

I ask unanimous consent for the printing of these telegrams in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 5, 1914.

Senator THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The only lake vessels available for salt-water service that can pass through Welland Canal are the vessels belonging to the Great Lakes & St. Lawrence Transportation Co., D. Sullivan, manager, Chicago. They are bulk-freight vessels and not fitted for passenger service. The names of the vessels are as follows: A. D. Davidson, A. M. Marshall, G. C. Howe, S. C. Dalton, John Crerar, John Lambert, J. S. Keefe, Robert Wallace, and S. N. Parent. The following vessels can go through canal but are not fitted for salt water, but could be made so in about two months: Passenger boats, Virginia, Alabama, Illinois, Missouri; package-freight vessels, Huron, Minneapolis, St. Paul, W. C. Rhodes, Arlington, Bennington, Brandon, Burlington, Ogdensburg, Rutland; bulk freighters, A. D. McTier, F. P. Jones, Lucius Robinson, Adrian Islen, Jerre Spalding, Charles Beatty, and Irwin L. Fischer. The following lake-built vessels are now on the Atlantic coast and are fitted for salt-water service: F. P. Lisman, Mary E. Harper, Penobscot, Seaconnet, Kanawaha, Kennebec, Georgetown, Waccamaw. All the above vessels can get through Welland Canal and those not fitted for salt water can be so fitted in about two months and would be seaworthy if so fitted.

JOHN MITCHELL.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 6, 1914.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
Washington, D. C.:

There are 20 American steel freight ships available, capacity 3,000 tons; will take about one month to refit with condensers, etc., and increase coal bunkers. There are 2 American steel passenger ships available. These 22 steel ships are seaworthy and Welland Canal size. All wooden ships unseaworthy.

JAMES H. CASSIDY.

CHICAGO, ILL., August 6, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At the request of our Cleveland office I am sending you the following data: There is registered under the American flag on the Lakes steel steamers aggregating 50,000 tons gross register that can navigate Welland and St. Lawrence Canals, and while the vessels are well constructed and seaworthy, owing to their low freeboard and small carrying capacity could not be considered successful in the trans-Atlantic trade. A small percentage are fitted with surface condensers and other necessary salt-water requirements, but at least 80 per cent would have to be refitted before navigating salt water. There is a much larger number of ships available for the St. Lawrence trade sailing under the British flag.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 6, 1914.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
Washington, D. C:

There are about 150 British-built Welland Canal steel ships on Canadian side of Lakes.

JAS. H. CASSIDY.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire also to introduce an amendment to which I hope there will be no objection, authorizing the American Red Cross to charter a boat and to give to it, in the discretion of the President, and during hostilities, an American registry and the privilege of carrying the American flag. This society has done a noble work in this country and, in fact, all over the globe. It has been very efficient. Very considerable relief came to our country from foreign countries during the Spanish-American War. We should reciprocate, and it is intended that an immediate effort be made to send supplies, nurses, and physicians abroad, but the managers of the society find that they are unable to obtain any boat under American registry. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. With the consent of the President and during the continuance of hostilities in Europe, any ship chartered by the American Red Cross for relief purposes shall be admitted to American registry under the provisions of this act and shall be entitled to carry the American flag.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a telegram from the Boston Chamber of Commerce, a very large organization, that has been giving consideration to this legislation and wires its reasons for being opposed to it. I should like to have it incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. WEEKS. I will ask to have it read. It is short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., August 5, 1914.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our committee on maritime affairs and members of executive committee and directors present at meeting this morning are unanimously of opinion that Underwood bill in present form would be entirely ineffective. Executive committee and directors adopted following resolutions:

"Resolved, That while we earnestly desire that adequate accommodations be made available for our legitimate ocean commerce, we can not approve those features of the Underwood bill which might subject us to the risks of war, and which, in our opinion, would be wholly ineffective.

"Resolved, That our real need and the only effective course for the present situation is a permanent increase in the number of bona fide American vessels adapted to and engaged in the ocean-carrying trade. Such an increase would not involve us in complications with other nations and would be of real and permanent advantage to the commerce of this country.

"Resolved, That we strongly urge the passage of legislation which will result in an effective and permanent increase in the number of ocean-carrying vessels flying the flag of the United States, either by immediately providing Federal aid which will put American steamship lines owned and officered by American citizens on a parity with lines owned and operated by foreign companies or by admitting foreign vessels to American registry only upon such conditions as will insure their remaining under the American registry when the present exigency has passed and insure their nationality being respected by the world.

We hope you will successfully oppose passage of bill and are writing you more fully.

J. RANDOLPH COOLIDGE, Jr.,
JAMES A. MCKIBBEN,
President and Secretary Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I think I have the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well.

Mr. WEEKS. Before I take my seat, if the Senator from New Jersey will pardon me, I should like to direct one inquiry to the Senator from New York. This legislation amends section 5 of the Panama Canal act, the last sentence of which reads:

Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade.

I want to ask the Senator if he is confident that if these vessels are purchased under the provisions of the pending bill they can not be transferred to the coastwise trade as can other vessels having American registry?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The pending bill specifically provides that foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the foreign trade. They can not have their enrollment changed or modified. No foreign ship under existing law or under the law as it will be amended when this bill is enacted can engage in the coastwise trade.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I made some reference to a resolution that I had sketched as being very much expressive of my thoughts and desires, and with the permission of the Senate I desire to read it. I have written it in a very hurried way. It may not be correct in verbiage to carry out my desire and intent, but it at least expresses my views:

Senate concurrent resolution 31.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce jointly be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered to purchase such craft in this and foreign countries as in their judgment may be suitable, adaptable, and necessary for the transportation of passengers and freight to and from the various ports of the world. All provision for manning, sailing, and maintaining such craft to be vested in the above-named Secretaries until otherwise provided.

I desire to offer that concurrent resolution. It expresses my feelings and my desires. As I said before, I believe it will be the opening of a new dawn, and it will be a simple way at results.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has just been read.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask that it be read again? I did not hear it read from the desk.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over one day under the rule.

Mr. JONES. I have here an editorial that appeared in the August number of the Marine Review that I ask may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MARINE NEWS,
New York, August 2, 1914.

The August number of the Marine News will contain the following editorial, the reproduction of which at any time in any other newspaper is permitted, but with the request that credit be given as to its source.

ALEXANDER R. SMITH,
Editor of the Marine News.

AN HYSTERICAL BUT FUTILE EXPEDIENT.

Since August 24, 1912, any foreign-built American-owned ship not over 5 years old has been eligible to American registry for foreign trade. Such ships, so admitted to our registry, may enter into ocean mail contracts with our Government under our so-called ship-subsidy act of 1891; and, besides, imports in American ships are entitled to a discount of 5 per cent of the duty under the new tariff. These advantages (?) have not brought a single foreign vessel under American register—they are not sufficient to offset the disadvantages. What are the disadvantages? More onerous and oppressive laws, rules, and regulations enforced by our Government than are enforced by other Governments; higher pay of masters, officers, and men employed on American ships; a more costly statutory food scale.

It is now proposed to overcome these disadvantages by removing the age limit under which foreign vessels may be admitted to American registry, and to give the President authority to permit aliens to command, officer, and man ships under American registry. These expedients will not avail to bring foreign vessels under American registry, unless temporarily during a period of war in which vessels of certain nations would be subject to capture by their enemies. They are much more likely to involve the United States in complications with nations that may question the good faith of such ship naturalization, capture the ships, and thus offer an affront to our flag. In normal times it has been conclusively demonstrated that the policy of "free ships" is unavailing as a means of building up American shipping in foreign trade. This seems to be the only expedient proposed—something of a temporary nature to meet a sudden emergency, full of dire dangers, but of no permanent benefit.

Of course, it is supposed that by allowing aliens to command and officer ships under the American flag, such aliens can be secured, and if not now, after the war, at less pay than Americans demand. It is hoped that by permitting this extremely trifling proportion of the crew of a modern steamship to be aliens the difficulty of building up our merchant marine in foreign trade will be overcome; that and the device of allowing foreign-built American-owned ships, whatever their age, to come under our registry.

As nothing now in our laws compel American ships, except those under mail contracts, to carry Americans in the crews of their vessels, and the pay of such American crews is from 50 to 100 per cent higher than the pay of the crews of foreign ships, will the proposed change in our law allowing aliens to command and officer ships under our flag effect a reduction in the pay of the crews of the ships; and if so, how?

The age limitation on vessels admissible to American registry is for the purpose of preventing old, worn-out, uneconomical foreign ships from coming under our flag; the removal of the age limitation is an invitation to old, worn-out, uneconomical foreign ships, perhaps otherwise headed for the scrap heap, to come under American registry. The foreigner who receives American money for his old, uneconomical ship will invest it in new, modern, economical ships. Will the older and less economical American ship, operated at higher cost than the foreign ship, be able to profitably compete with the newer, more economical, more cheaply operated foreign ship?

The best ships under foreign flags, and most of their masters, officers, and seamen, are enrolled in the naval reserves of their several countries, and neither ships, officers, nor men are allowed to change their nationality without the consent of the Governments that have been subsidizing them in various ways to the extent of approximately $50,000,000 a year, in order to have them for use in precisely such an emergency as now exists—a war in which the Governments subsidizing the ships are involved. Is it to be assumed that nations that are annually paying $50,000,000 in order to have merchant ships, their officers and crews available for auxiliary war purposes, will relinquish such ships and men in war times?

To be sure, we may be able to get the worst ships that are available under foreign flags, just as we were able to do so during the Spanish-American War. Shall we start to build up an American (?) merchant marine in foreign trade with ships that are the offscourings of the world, least useful, least economical—ships that are in the economic discard?

All but six of the ships of the International Mercantile Marine Co. (an American corporation) are under foreign, chiefly British, flags; and the ships under British flags, by agreement between the company and the British Government, are to stay under that flag, the officers and a certain proportion of the crews of which "must be British subjects," unless the British Government releases the ships. Similar conditions are imposed by other Governments upon the most desirable ships under their flags.

Is not the time opportune to establish an effective and enduring policy by which to build up a real American merchant marine in foreign trade? The country begins to realize, dimly to be sure, but to an extent the disadvantages inhering in almost total dependence upon foreign ships for our foreign carrying. In the emergency confronting us probably Congress can be induced to establish an effective and enduring policy as easily as it can be induced to adopt a temporary expedient that will be without avail the moment peace is restored. The tariff provides a discount of 5 per cent of the duty on imports in American vessels, a provision the executive branch of the Government refuses to enforce, although its validity has been sustained by the court. The weakness of this method of applying this policy is that it is applicable only to dutiable imports—about 35 per cent of all of our imports—and to almost none of our imports from South American countries. By reversing the method of applying this policy so as to place an extra 5 per cent duty on all imports in foreign vessels, dutiable or nondutiable, it would be infinitely more effective, yet the principle would be preserved. The first tariff inaugurated this policy in the way of a discount of the duty, but in five years Congress reversed it, and as long as it was thereafter in force it was in the way of an extra duty, because more effective that way. If, in addition, the tonnage tax were greatly increased on foreign vessels that would completely reestablish this policy in the manner that it was in full or partial force from 1789 until 1850, during which period an average of 80 per cent of our entire foreign commerce was carried in American ships.

There was neither clamor for nor need of "free ships" during all of the years that policy was in force—during all of the years of American maritime greatness.

Did we bear it said that our commercial treaties forbid such discrimination? The court has declared that such provisions of treaties as forbid are a violation of both the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, because, says the court, the treaty-making branch of the Government exceeded its powers in entering into such treaties. Is there fear of retaliation? During the 60 years the policy was in full or partial force the effect of foreign retaliation was to give foreign ships the carrying of an average of 20 per cent of our foreign commerce. Could we not bear retaliation that would again give us 80 per cent of the carrying better than we are able to stand "reciprocal liberty of commerce" under which our ships carry a bare 10 per cent of our foreign commerce?

Chairman UNDERWOOD started out in his tariff bill to restore this early successful American martime policy—"the constitutional regulation of commerce" pledged in the Democratic national platform. Both he and Congress might far better proceed along that line to more effective accomplishments than to dally with the disappointing mirage of free ships, coupled with alien masters, officers, and crews. The national gorge should rise in contemplation of "an American merchant marine" composed of ships built in alien countries, of alien materials, by alien workmen, commanded, officered, and manned by aliens.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am going to vote for the bill as it is because of the anxiety I feel in common with others to provide some better means than we have to meet the exigency of the hour. I am not disposed, however, to let the opportunity pass without registering my dissent to the provision in the bill and in the Panama Canal administration act which exempts, in terms and in perpetuity, any vessel purchased under this act or any American vessel from engaging in the coastwise trade. I do not believe in that policy. That is all I wish to say, that I may not, as far as I am personally concerned, feel in any wise estopped when the question arises in the future by what may be done to-day.

I wish to inquire if there is any likelihood of passing the bill to-night. I will be very glad to have it done, but if there is not I think it important to have a brief executive session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I know of no reason why we ought not to proceed at once to a vote on the question. I know of no other Senator who desires to discuss it.

I desire to say at this time that I believe the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in behalf of the Red Cross Society has every merit and should be adopted. I make the same statement with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], so that relief may be given to the people of the Pacific coast. I ask for a vote, Mr. President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask in what form——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The committee has so completely changed the terms of the bill as reported by the committee that the Chair thinks it will be needful to read the proposed bill as now reported by the committee in order that the Senate may vote intelligently. The Chair will instruct the Secretary to read the bill as now reported to the Senate by the committee, and then amendments may be offered later on.

The Secretary read the amended bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, is hereby amended so that said section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4132. Vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof; and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States; and seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title. Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade: Provided, That a foreign-built yacht, pleasure boat or vessel not used or intended to be used for trade admitted to American registry pursuant to this section shall not be exempt from the collection of ad valorem duty provided in section 37 of the act approved August 5 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.' That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction or repair of vessels built in the United States and all such materials necessary for the building or repair of their machinery and all articles necessary for their outfit and equipment may be imported into the United States free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided further, That such vessels so admitted under the provisions of this section may contract with the Postmaster General under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' so long as such vessels shall in all respects comply with the provisions and requirements of said act."

SEC. 2. The President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever he shall find that the number of available persons qualified under now existing laws and regulations of the United States to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act is insufficient, to suspend by order, so far and for such time as he may find to be necessary, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

Whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the needs of foreign commerce may require, he is also hereby authorized to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of the law requiring survey, inspection, and measurement by officers of the United States of foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under this act.

Under like conditions and to like extent the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to direct that the navy yards of the United States, and all of their equipment and dockage facilities, be used for the purpose of repairing and keeping in a seaworthy condition all merchant vessels now or hereafter registered under the American flag, under such conditions as in their discretion are just and equitable: Provided, That such additional use of said navy yards and their equipment shall not in any way interfere with the paramount purposes of the Navy of the United States.

SEC. 3. Naval officers of the United States, active or retired, and men serving or employed in the Navy of the United States, may, upon application made by them to the Secretary of the Navy, be permitted to accept such temporary service on board vessels registered under the terms of this act as may not be detrimental to the naval efficiency of the United States, without prejudice to their rank or status in the naval service or any loss, prejudice, or detriment whatever.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect immediately.

DEATH OF MRS. WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, it becomes my duty to convey to the Senate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Mrs. Wilson, the wife of the President of the United States. Of course the President in this hour has the earnest sympathy of all the people of the Nation, and, as a mark of the sympathy entertained here and all through the Republic, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 7, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 6, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God our Father, a great sorrow has come to our people and our hearts turn to Thee for comfort. The angel of death hovers over the White House. The wife of our President is fast passing from the scenes of this life. Be with him in this hour of distress and sustain him by Thy holy influence and by the sympathies which go out to him from the heart of America. We thank Thee that amid his grief and sorrow he could proffer his service as mediator 'twixt the belligerent nations of Europe, and we most fervently pray that it may be accepted in the same spirit that it is offered; that their differences may be adjusted by the wise and humane methods of arbitration; that the world may be spared a scene of carnage and misery never before witnessed. Hasten, we beseech Thee, the day when Christian nations shall be indeed nations of Christians, and a reign of peace be come that shall never end. Hear us in the name of wisdom, in the name of justice, in the name of mercy, in the name of humanity, in the name of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE PRESIDENT AND HIS WIFE.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 585.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States tender to the President, in this his hour of apprehensive sadness, their warmest sympathy, and pray that God in His mercy may restore to health his good wife, adviser, and helpmate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF MINNEAPOLIS.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, relative to the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis as affecting the grain merchants.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand what the gentleman said as to the nature of his remarks.

Mr. DILLON. Discussing the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis as affecting the grain trade.

Mr. BARNHART. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

On motion of Mr. MOON the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, when the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1915 was under consideration there were a number of amendments to that bill which were obnoxious to the rule of the House prohibiting new legislation on appropriation bills, and for that reason they were stricken out. Some of the sections so stricken out have since been enacted into law by separate bills. Most of them, however, are incorporated in the bill now under consideration before the House, and there are a number of other sections also included in this bill. The committee had this measure under consideration immediately after its introduction into the House, and reported it to this House with two or three minor amendments, which were incorporated in the second print of the bill. Subsequent to that action the committee met and agreed upon a number of other committee amendments to this bill which have not yet been incorporated in it, but have in part been printed. I now ask unanimous consent that the amendments so agreed upon by the committee, and with reference to which this bill must be discussed, be placed in the RECORD; and for the information of the committee I ask that those amendments be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to have the amendments to which he refers read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendments.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire if the bill has been printed with the amendments included?

Mr. MOON. No; the bill has not been printed since these amendments have been adopted. I think it would be very well to have it so printed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When we go back into the House, will not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to have the bill printed with the amendments?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I will do that; and in view of that fact we might as well omit the reading now. The amendments may be printed in the RECORD, and when we go back into the House I will ask to have the bill printed with the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, viz:

"In line 2, on page 10, strike out 'five' and insert in lieu thereof 'four.'

"In line 5, on page 10, insert the word 'and' before the words 'closed-pouch' and strike out the comma and the words 'and side and transfer service' and insert a period, making the line read 'and closed-pouch service.'

"Strike out all of lines 13, 14, and 15, on page 11.

"In line 19, on page 11, strike out 'twenty' and in lieu thereof insert 'twenty-one.'

"In line 24, on page 11, strike out 'ten' and in lieu thereof insert 'ten and one-half.'

"In line 1, on page 12, strike out 'five' and in lieu thereof insert 'five and one-half.'

"In line 8, on page 12, strike out 'eighteen' and in lieu thereof insert 'twenty.'

"In line 10, page 12, strike out '$2.50' and in lieu thereof insert '$2.'

"In lines 2 and 3, on page 13, strike out the words '95 per cent of.'

"Strike out all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, on page 13, and lines 1 and 2, on page 14, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"'The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations, on their routes, without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise: Provided, That the Postmaster General in his discretion may relieve any of the roads of such service.'

"In lines 8 and 9, on page 14, strike out the words 'excepting for side and transfer mail service.'

"SEC. 16. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders had been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

"SEC. 17. That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been informed that there are two amendments here that are typewritten.

Mr. MOON. The two amendments that are tacked on there, that are typewritten, are to be introduced as separate sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair deemed it best to call attention to that fact.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, a number of these sections were pretty fully discussed on another occasion. I do not deem it necessary to go very fully into the discussion of those propositions that have once been under consideration in the House. The first section in this bill provides:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territory, commencing about March 25, 1913: Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

This section of the bill is intended to remedy that situation which exists with reference to the weighing of the mails when abnormal conditions occur, such as the floods in the Ohio Valley a year or two ago.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. What is the necessity of this section if we adopt section 13?

Mr. MOON. The necessity is due largely to the fact that the adjustment has not been made for the fiscal years 1913 and 1914. It is essential to have the authority of Congress to make that adjustment, even though the subsequent section, section 13, which is the main feature of this bill, should be adopted. I deem it unnecessary to discuss that question further than to make that statement in reference to the situation calling for this legislation, but I will place herewith in the RECORD a specific statement in reference to this matter and, with the permission of the House, a communication from the department requesting this enactment and giving the reasons for it, as follows:

In a letter dated December 1, 1913, the Postmaster General fully explained the provisions of this section, as follows:

DECEMBER 1, 1913.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The quadrennial weighing of the mails for the purpose of securing data upon which to base the readjustment of compensation for the transportation of mails by railroads in part of the first contract section comprising the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia began on February 19, 1913, and ended on June 3, 1913.

During several weeks of the weighing period commencing about March 25, 1913, the disastrous floods in the Ohio River Valley and contiguous territory occurred, and as a result service on a number of railroad mail routes which were being weighed was seriously interrupted and in some cases totally suspended for periods of greater or less duration. The floods also caused an almost total cessation of business in the communities affected, all of which served to reduce the weights of mails carried on the routes referred to during the period of interruption in service considerably below the normal, resulting in lower average daily weights than would have been carried normally.

Inasmuch as the rate of compensation for four years is based upon such average daily weights, it would appear equitable to make some allowance for the reduced weights.

The question of the authority of the department to make substitutions of estimated weights based upon the average weights for the normal part of the weighing period for the part of the weighing when weights were not normal or when none had been taken has been submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who has rendered a decision reading as follows:

"The law does not specify or detail the manner in which the average weight shall be determined except that it be by actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, the result of such weighing to be stated and verified in such form and manner as you may direct. (19 Comp. Dec., 220.) You are given broad power and discretion in the matter of adjusting the compensation for transportation over railroad routes which is to be adjusted on the basis of the actual weight as established during the weighing period.

"Therefore as the actual weight as established during the weighing period is merely a test upon which to base the compensation for the next four years, you are undoubtedly authorized for the purpose of such test to take into consideration and deduct any increased weight over a particular railroad route due to temporary diversion, and credit same to the road which would carry it under normal conditions during the next four years, subject to the limitation that the weight so credited shall not be credited to any other road during such weighing period.

"Whether or not this method is advisable or practicable under the circumstances detailed in your submission is a matter of administration for your own determination, and which I am not authorized to decide. But your specific question as to your authority under the law to adopt this method for determining the average weight during the weighing period upon which to base the compensation for transportation of the mails is answered in the affirmative, provided that the total weight for the railroad routes involved or the weighing section taken into consideration in so adjusting the compensation shall not exceed the total weight of such railroad routes or sections as established by actual weight during the weighing period."

Under this decision it does not appear that the department has the requisite authority to make substitutions of weights of mail in the cases described, and to give the Postmaster General authority of law to deal with cases of this character which occurred during the last quadrennial weighing and those which may occur hereafter I have the honor to suggest that the following provision of law be inserted in the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, as part of the item "For inland transportation by railroad routes":

"Provided, That when during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized in his discretion to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal, or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, nothwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territory commencing about March 25, 1913."

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The last proviso in section 1, providing for increased compensation for railroads on account of the increased weight of mails due to the changes in parcel-post conditions from August 15, 1913, authorizes the Postmaster General to add to the compensation paid on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum, and is for the purpose of recompensing the railroad companies for the additional weights of mails carried as a result of the increase in rates and the raising of the weight limit of parcel-post matter in the local, first, and second zones, effective from August 15, 1913. A careful estimate has been made as to the amount of increased business which has resulted from the changes named, and it is believed that the percentage of increased compensation provided in the suggested legislation will compensate the railroads for the additional weights they have carried.

The statistics upon which this estimate of increased business have been based were secured from a tabulation of the count of parcel-post mail originating in the 50 largest offices during the period from October 1 to 15, 1913. These data were carefully analyzed and the additional weight obtained by the tabulation was averaged for all railroad routes in operation, making allowance for the short average haul of the increased business, from which it was found that the average increased weight carried per route per day was 62 pounds, which is one-half of 1 per cent of the average daily weight on all routes.

If this provision becomes a law, it will be necessary to make provision for an additional expenditure of $222,000 for the fiscal year 1914 and of $254,000 for 1915. The difference in these amounts arises from the fact that the increased compensation in 1914 dates from August 15, 1913, while the increased compensation for 1915 covers the whole year.

Mr. Chairman, I fear that I shall be a little tedious, but yet it is necessary that I take these sections up one by one and discuss them as briefly as I can. Passing to the second section of the bill as originally introduced, the committee has reached the conclusion that it should go from the bill. It will not, therefore, be now discussed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee to bother him at all, but I am following him in his remarks with a bill that was introduced on June 4 and reported with amendments on June 5. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Section 2 in that bill has been stricken out. Is the gentleman speaking to that?

Mr. MOON. No; I have just said that I would pass over that, because the committee has not reported favorably upon it.

The third section of the original bill, now numbered 2 of this bill as amended, is as follows:

SEC. 2. That so much of section 4 of an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected, is hereby repealed.

That repeal is advocated because of the manifest injustice that might be done to the railroads that carry a less amount than this but that yet are heavily burdened with this service, and I also present herewith detailed reasons for that.

In a letter dated December 1, 1913, the Postmaster General explained fully the necessity for the enactment of this provision. This letter reads as follows:

DECEMBER 1, 1913.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Section 4 of the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, provides as follows:

"SEC. 4. When, after a weighing of the mails for the purpose of readjusting the compensation for their transportation on a railroad route, mails are diverted therefrom or thereto, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, ascertain the effect of such diversion by a weighing of such mails for such number of successive working days as he may determine, and have the weights stated and verified to him as in other cases, and readjust the compensation on the routes affected accordingly: Provided, That no readjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected: Provided further, That readjustment made hereunder shall not take effect before July 1, 1912, and shall be for diversions occurring after January 1, 1912."

The authority conferred upon the Postmaster General by the foregoing provision has been of service in a number of cases, and will undoubtedly continue to be an effectual means of meeting cases of diversions of mails of considerable volume. Experience, however, has emphasized the desirability of the repeal of the proviso limiting action to cases where the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight of mails on any of the routes affected. A number of cases have arisen where it has not been possible to make the readjustments because of the limitation referred to, although the facts have otherwise justified such action.

I have the honor, therefore, to recommend the repeal of the first proviso of section 4 of the act of August 4, 1912, and for that purpose suggest the following form of provision, viz:

"So much of section 4 of an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected, is hereby repealed."

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Attention is also invited to the testimony of the Second Assistant Postmaster General before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads on this bill, pages 4, 5, and 6 of the hearings on H. R. 17042, and on the Post Office appropriation bill for 1915, pages 127 to 130 of the hearings on that bill, as follows:

Mr. STEWART. There is now a provision of law which allows us, after a weighing has occurred and a diversion of mails has been made from one route to another, to reweigh the diverted mails and readjust the routes affected, but the statute does not permit us to make such reweighing and readjustment unless such diverted mails amount to at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any route affected. This limitation prevents us from making readjustments sometimes where they should be made, and I think it should be removed and the matter left entirely within the discretion of the Postmaster General as to when he will make these readjustments. Where the average daily weight on a route is very large, a great deal of mail can be diverted without equaling 10 per cent of the weight on any route affected, and it prevents us, as in recent cases, from making readjustments in very meritorious cases. We have asked that this provision be added, to read as follows:

"So much of section 4 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustments can be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the roads affected is hereby repealed."

That would remove the difficulty.

Mr. MADDEN. Would that be advantageous or disadvantageous to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. STEWART. It might result in paying more money, or it might result in paying less money, but the idea is to do entire justice to the carriers. That was the theory on which the law was first based, that where after a weighing is had large amounts of mail are diverted from one carrier to another, or the new carrier should not be required to carry that mail for four years for nothing, and the old carrier get the pay for not carrying it.

Mr. COX. Why divert it? Under what cases or emergencies do you divert mail?

Mr. STEWART. A diversion may occur where a railroad takes off a train or changes its schedules. It is necessary to get the mails through on the quickest time, and it is customary to divert them in those cases, if the company will not maintain schedules or continue their train service, and the purpose of having this provision passed in the first instance was to do entire justice to not only the Government but to the carriers, and not allow a company to break its schedules or take its trains off after they get a contract and keep the pay for four years.

Section 4 of the original bill, 3 of the bill as amended, is the one that provides the requirements of bonds from the assistant postmasters to the postmasters, and it also seeks to change the law on the subject of the Executive order appointing assistant postmasters for life.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the design of that? What is the purpose of requiring an assistant postmaster to give two bonds, one to the Government and the other to the postmaster to whom he is assistant?

Mr. MOON. I will explain that when I discuss it. That is in the discretion of the Postmaster General. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact that this measure is strictly a business proposition, from beginning to end, unless it be this particular section which by some of my friends is regarded as political in its nature rather than strictly administrative, with the consent of the committee I shall pass over the discussion of this section until I have completed a brief explanation of the other features of this bill. So, passing from that section, I take up the next one, which provides simply that first, second, and third class postmasters shall have annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars and payable in quarterly installments. That needs no explanation.

Section 5 of the amended bill provides:

SEC. 5. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public, and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed.

That is a provision in the interest of economic administration and efficiency in the office, is purely administrative, and need not be discussed, I think.

The next section is one that provides for the establishment of a guaranty fund by assessments of the employees of the department to protect the Government on bonds where the officials are required to execute them, to indemnify the Government against loss. Inasmuch as this section and one or two others are incorporated in the bill known as H. R. 12928, which is upon the calendar, the committee thought it best not to present it as a separate issue in this bill.

Section 7 of the amended bill provides:

SEC. 7. That if any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor.

This is to prevent contractors from defeating the collection of the money due to the subcontractor for the actual performance of the service to the Government. In other words, it is a protection to the subcontractor against the fraud of the contractor in these contracts with the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman seems to have overlooked section 6 of the amended bill, being section 8 of the bill as originally introduced, at the bottom of page 5.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman explain that?

Mr. MOON. I am glad that the gentleman has called my attention to that matter. The "blue-tag law" is a term used in the department to designate a certain character of mail which the department is enabled to expedite in a reasonable way by fast freight. There is a section in a previous bill that provides that the scope shall not be extended. It is now operating in the second and third mail divisions of the United States. The mails are expedited by fast freight. The magazines published throughout the country are delivered in the time required by law, delivered as readily, so far as the benefits may arise from their use, as by the ordinary mail. The Government of the United States has been saving over a million and a half dollars per annum by the use of the freight where they can use it with expedition for the transportation of mails. The purpose of this section is to repeal the inhibition on the exercise of that power in the other two mail divisions of the United States where similar beneficial results will unquestionably come from that economy.

The eighth section of the amended bill is along the line already discussed. The ninth section provides a penalty against the injury and destruction against letter boxes and other receptacles for the mail of the United States. It is hardly necessary to discuss before this House the wisdom of the enactment of laws to protect this class of public property. These are purely administrative features, of which there ought to be no doubt about their enactment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are there not provisions of the law now with reference to this matter?

Mr. MOON. Yes; but they are not complete.

Mr. McKELLAR. And this is an amendment which makes the provision more full and complete?

Mr. MOON. Yes. Mr. Chairman, section 10 of the amended bill provides:

That all persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service in the Civil War, either in the Federal or Confederate Army, shall be exempt from any age limitation in the selection of fourth-class postmasters, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for a proper discharge of the duties of such office.

Under a rule—not a law and perhaps not a fixed regulation, but a rule of the department—there is an age limit fixed for the occupants of fourth-class offices. The committee were of opinion that this rule ought not to prevail in all instances. They have thought that it was not an improper thing or an unwise thing to do to permit the soldier, either Federal or Confederate, who otherwise was competent and fit for the performance of these services to be appointed regardless of any age limit.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. It is not intended to have any civil-service examination for them?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; it is intended to have it under the civil service the same as others are; the only thing is that we do away with the age limit. They must take the examination and be otherwise qualified.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the age limit?

Mr. MOON. Sixty-five years, I believe. Now, Mr. Chairman, 65 years being the limit, nearly every man who served in either army is excluded by law or regulation from holding one of these offices—offices that pay less than $1,000 per annum. Now, it is evident to every one of us that there are scattered throughout the country men of sufficient capacity and energy to perform faithfully these duties who are past the age of 65.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is it intended by the words "business capacity" that it should also cover physical ability to perform the services?

Mr. MOON. Of course. If the man did not have the physical ability he would not have the capacity.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wanted to get the information, for a man might have the capacity but not the physical ability.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Have not most of the civil-service examinations for fourth-class postmasters been held in most of the States?

Mr. MOON. I think not. They have in many of them.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They began alphabetically and reached Iowa in May.

Mr. MOON. Yes; and some of these days we hope to begin alphabetically and go through Iowa again. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact and force of the argument that some gentlemen have urged against this section—that it is a preferential distinction; that if the limit of 65 years should be applied to soldiers of either army it might with equal propriety and justice be applied to the common citizen who was not in the army.

Now, I want to meet that fairly. I have not the slightest objection to an amendment to this section which provides that the age limit shall not be considered in the selection of any of these offices, whether they were men in the Army or not in the Army. But there is always some sentiment in reference to questions of this sort. There is some sort of feeling, we do not know what it is, whether it is a martial spirit in the people, a spirit of patriotism or whatever it is, but there is always a tenderness of feeling for the men who have defended the flag of the Republic and for men who have stood in battle array against the flag of the Republic for a cause which they believed to be just.

I have no morbid sentimentality on this question. I am not here to congratulate you or this country upon the splendid results that flowed from the Union of the States finally. I look at that question not so sentimentally as practically. Here are men who were engaged in a sectional war. That war is ended. These sections are reunited. If there is any reason why those engaged upon one side or the other should not have a preferential distinction in this matter I do not know. I concede the force of the argument that possibly none of them are entitled to more distinction than the other citizens, but following the suggestion that these men who lost practically four years of their lives in a war should have a little better chance than the others, we submit this amendment to this House confident that it will approve it, because it ought to be regarded as a just tribute to the valor of the men in the Union Army and in the Confederate Army, the fast fading remnant of the two greatest armies that were ever martialed on this continent in the most heroic age of this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will yield.

Mr. COX. Under the new order by the President in regard to the fourth-class post offices the order required, where the salary of the office was $180 or less, that they simply be selected by the post-office inspector.

Mr. MOON. Yes; that is the rule.

Mr. COX. Now, these old soldiers, even though they may not be able to stand a written competitive examination, yet are able to fill these offices where the salaries are less than $180, and it will help them considerably.

Mr. MOON. And they are able to stand the examination, no doubt, where the amount is above that.

Mr. COX. They might; let them have it.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas and Mr. MURDOCK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. In many places throughout the country examinations were held and many men who had reached and passed the age of 65, by virtue of the order, had to relinquish their office, and by virtue of that order many men younger in years have succeeded them. This provision of the proposed law as set forth in the bill will not reinstate those who have been compelled to relinquish their office.

Mr. MOON. I should think not.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALEXANDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4966. An act proposing an amendment to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7967. An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system; and

H. R. 15613. An act to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to test the sense of the House as to the disposition of the trade commission bill in reference to going to conference now, or would gentlemen prefer to have it printed?

Mr. MANN. It ought to be printed first.

Mr. ADAMSON. If that is the desire of the House, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed for Members, and I will call it up to-morrow. I will ask that it lie on the Speaker's desk until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. MOON. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the gentleman to say he would not object to an amendment or oppose an amendment which would take this limitation off so far as everybody was concerned.

Mr. MOON. No. While I would be very much pleased to see this preference given to soldiers, and I think we should give them preference, I am not usually given to showing preferences to anybody. I do not object if the House desires to take the age limit off so as to apply to everybody.

Mr. MURDOCK. I assume from the statement of the gentleman that he thinks that there are many men between 65 and 70, or even beyond 70, who would make competent postmasters.

Mr. MOON. Who would make splendid postmasters; perhaps better than men who are more active. Mr. Chairman, sections 11 and 12 are in reference to postal savings banks, providing for the limit of amount that may be deposited in those banks and the limit of the amount of interest that may be paid upon such deposit and some other provisions amendatory of that act. It is deemed best we should enact this section, but I shall not discuss it now. I shall wait until the five-minute rule to consider it, if it becomes necessary, in view of the fact that the substance of this section was embodied in another act which I introduced and the House passed and which the Senate yesterday passed with amendments and which we hope to-day to place in conference. The thirteenth section of this bill is one on the subject of railway mail pay. It is a very complete section, in my opinion, covering this question heretofore so very intricate and hard of solution. I want to say to the committee that many of the other sections of this bill are the suggestions of members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but this particular section is the suggestion of the Post Office Department. It is peculiarly their section to this bill. The amendments which I sent to the desk to be read and to be incorporated in the RECORD are amendments to this particular section of the bill. We do not realize always just how powerful and how important an organization of the department of Government is the Post Office Department, nor do we apprehend, and those who have not given some attention to the study of the peculiar features of that business department do not understand readily the relation that one branch of this service bears to another and how all must be lifted up, all must be energized, all must be pressed forward to make one complete whole and give an efficient service, an economical service of that great department of the people of the United States.

The commercial people of the country desire that this Government shall reach 1-cent letter postage. It would seem that 2 cents is cheap enough to carry a letter across the continent now, but there was a time when there was very much more charged than 2 cents, and the time has perhaps come in the history of the postal affairs of this country when 1 cent letter postage is perhaps due to the people of the United States, provided those other conditions that affect it so seriously may be remedied, so as to enable us to reach that ultimate conclusion. Now, there is no use of any of us attempting to right about face for political or other purposes on any questions that are involved in the ultimate efficiency of the service of this great department. We must know and understand, to begin with, that we have to batter down in this House, first, the power and the control of the transportation companies and methods that they have of handling the revenues through the legal system enacted and in force now by the department. We have to understand, too, that standing in front of the Congress is the most powerful agency in all the Republic; that we shall have to declare a war against the ridiculously low rates at which second-class matter—great daily newspapers and great magazines—are carried in this country, every pound of which is carried at a loss to your Government of 5 cents per pound, and these pounds run into the hundreds of millions yearly, and are increasing rapidly all the time. We must understand that we have to confront here two of the greatest subsidies covered by legislation in the history of the Union.

You must state whether you are going to stand for the people or whether you are going to stand for a continuation of these untoward events against the interests and welfare of the masses. We expect to establish by this section, with the concurrence of the House and Senate, a system by which the railroad companies will be given just, complete, and adequate compensation for their service and the Government protected against an advance of more than $1,000,000 annually in the performance of this service. And when we are through with it we expect to present to this House a measure that will not only do justice and fairness to the newspapers and magazines of this country, but deal fairly with the people by making the rate upon second-class matter, at least, as high again as it is now on magazines. When you shall have accomplished these two purposes you will be able to go to 1-cent letter postage for the people and still maintain a surplus from the revenues of the Post Office Department. To attempt it until this is done and the other economies asked for in this bill are permitted means a loss of $75,000,000 of revenues to the people of the United States. These suggestions are but preliminary to the detailed discussion of this section.

In order that you may more clearly see just what this contention is, that you may realize the justice of the demands of this committee and the department in behalf of this Government, it was essential that I show you in some measure the fight, the amazing fight and contest, that is waged upon this section. But before I shall take up that feature of it, trying to wipe away from your vision, if I can, the cobwebs in the way of a clear sight of this provision of the law, I desire to pay my tender regards and my profound respect to the distinguished ex-Senator, Mr. Bourne, from the State of Oregon. And I am not going to express any unkind feeling toward him. He seems to be the leader in the opposition to this measure. On the contrary, I desire to express to this House my profound respect for the ex-Senator, giving due weight to those peculiarities and eccentricities of that character of genius that so often adorns the Senate of the United States. You will remember that the Senator has sent forth to the country a protest against this bill. He has said, and I may place it in the RECORD here—and I can place a dozen or 40 items in the RECORD from the newspapers that are now lying on my table, if necessary—extracts from papers, interviews with him, statements by the chairman of the railway pay committee, pressing the claims of the railroads against the interests of the people.

First, before taking up the railroad contention upon the question, I want to say that Senator Bourne, I think, has acted very indiscreetly in denouncing the Post Office Department as desiring to practice fraud and injustice on the railroad companies. I think it is rather indiscreet in the distinguished gentleman to say that this committee, and he says particularly the chairman of this committee, proposes a bill that is neither fair nor just, and that they know it. What is the meaning of charges like these? Why, sir, they are really charges of dishonest official action—that is all—couched in proper language, and that we want to do the railroad companies some wrong. I think the time is passed, if it ever existed, when any man of sufficient capacity to sit upon this floor desired to do the railroad companies or anybody else any injustice in legislation. We may be overweening in our zeal to protect the Treasury of our country, but there is no man here that is willing to do an injustice to the great corporations of this country or to any citizen of it. We know, we have long since come to realize, that these great arteries of commerce that bear our mails from one end of the country to the other, are beneficent institutions if properly conducted. We know that they are a great blessing to the people in the matter of transportation; that without them our civilization could not have been what it is, and could not advance. We know that, and therefore we have no unkindly feeling, but rather one desiring to protect, foster, and encourage them.

But we must not forget that a corporation is but a legal artificial entity, created for the welfare and promotion of the people's interest; that every citizen, as well as this Government, has a profound interest in all these transportation companies. We only want to see to it that justice is done them, that fair compensation is given for what they do for us, that their property can not under the terms of the Federal Constitution be confiscated by the lowering of rates beyond the point of compensation. We all know that. We all feel that interest, and this committee has approached this great question of determining the legitimate and proper pay for them with those views before them. The railroad companies often forget that they are not organized for the purpose peculiarly of obtaining revenue, accretion from their stock by way of interest, salaries, and otherwise; they forget that they exercise a part of the sovereignty of the great Commonwealths that give them political existence; they forget that the private citizen is powerless to prevent them from moving forward lines of railway, not only through his private property, not only the streets, if they desire of the great cities, but they can invade even the sacred cities of the dead and plant their tracks there without consultation with the common people in the exercise of the right of eminent domain under the Constitution and the laws. Shall we not, then, against an agency, a public-service corporation, exercise that right which we have to exercise, legitimately and honestly? Then, why should the distinguished Senator undertake to prejudice this House against the committee assuming the exercise of this power? He has said that you do not give them high enough rates. That is a legitimate statement. But when he impugns the motive of the committee he does himself an injustice. Now, let me just for a moment review some facts in connection with this matter, to show how unfortunate a man may be when in his zeal and ardor to serve his friends he makes charges of bad faith and the want of patriotism against others. Let us look at the Senator's case—and he is the man who is making the fight for the railroads here. There is no use discussing these propositions of the roads as such because they come through him. How did Senator Bourne have anything to do with this matter? Why should we wait for the commission to report before the passage of this act? Those are the main features of the contention as against present action.

There have been several post-office commissions appointed to determine the rates of railway mail pay. Two years ago the Congress created a commission, or rather a joint committee of the two Houses, for that purpose. The direction of the act of Congress was that the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate should appoint three Members of the Senate as members of that joint committee; that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House should appoint three; and that that joint committee should report by December, 1913.

Well, what was the first step taken? In the House it was my pleasure, as chairman of that committee, to appoint Hon. JAMES T. LLOYD, Hon. WILLIAM E. TUTTLE, Jr., and Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS. The Senator appointed himself and two other Members of the Senate. They went to work on that commission. They worked faithfully, but did not complete the service. Congress extended the time to next December. It continued the personnel of that commission, and although Senator Bourne had gone out of the Senate, he remained the chairman of that joint committee.

Look at his action in the matter. Look at the examination of the witnesses. I venture to say that it will not be denied by any intelligent man that any question that he sought to ask or did ask seems to have been asked as the counsel of the railroad companies. On the other hand, the gentlemen from the House, Mr. LLOYD and Mr. TUTTLE and Mr. WEEKS, asked questions that were fair and just, seeking the real facts in the interest of the roads and of the people. And I want to commend here the splendid service of these gentlemen on that committee. Intelligent, able, capable, they have reached conclusions that are eminently fair and just, and the difference between them and the committee to-day is almost insignificant.

But, to go back to the Senator. He now places himself upon the committee, acting practically as counsel for the roads, retaining himself there without compensation, as he had gone out of the Senate; failing to make a report when a report was ordered to be made by the committee last May, though called upon for a report again and again; insisting in the last three or four weeks that he would have one ready in two weeks, and still he is not ready. Look into the further fact that the distinguished Senator has appeared before the country as if he were the leading counsel for the railroad companies and before the press of the country. Look at the fact that a bureau has been established here for the purpose of creating prejudice against the department in behalf of the railroads. Look into the fact that his secretary, a boy of twenty-odd years, has entered the press of the country in the discussion of this question against the department.

What, in view of all these circumstances, what should I say as to the value of a report made by him if it were left to him alone? Fortunately, it is not. But if he made it, what would be the value of his report to an unprejudiced Congress? Do not these facts and circumstances put the Senator in a very bad attitude?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. May I interrupt the gentleman to inquire whether any statement or discussion has been made by Mr. TUTTLE and myself, the two remaining House members of that commission, in any way reflecting upon the Post Office Department or upon the Post Office Committee of the House?

Mr. MOON. No. On the contrary, the two distinguished gentlemen have acted in cooperation with the department in the utmost good faith and with the utmost intelligence and capacity, and have been of benefit to the committee. Never would I intimate that there has been anything wrong with them. [Applause.]

Now, are not the circumstances strongly against him? And yet I am not here intending to say that Senator Bourne is acting in this matter from the desire to aid the railroads and prevent the department from obtaining that which would be just. I am not here to criticize him on those lines. These are simply unfortunate circumstances under which he has fallen. I am sorry that it is so, because they look ugly, that a man should be so profoundly interested, without any compensation whatever, and should take such apparent advantages against the department and the committee in the interest of the railroad companies. It does not look well. But I hope I have not lost all charity. I know the Senator. I know that his zeal and—if I may say it with the utmost respect for him, because I am very fond of him—the inordinate egotism of my friend is such that he could not agree with anybody else or perform any service at any time if for any reason he thought it best not to do so. I am not going to apologize for the existence of these circumstances. You can give them any construction you want to. I am charitable enough to the Senator to say that I do not believe he wants to do any injustice to the railroads or to the Government, but he has put himself inadvertently in the way of the department and in the way of the law to secure the benefits and rights of the people of the United States.

But, sir, I must not dwell too long on this question. Here are a vast number of assaults upon the committee by the railway employees and others, some of which I will ask permission to use and some of which I care nothing about.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the subject I would like to ask him to correct me if I need correction on this point: The gentleman from Tennessee introduced the original bill as to rates of space. He has now introduced amendments to raise those rates for space?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. My understanding was that the amendments to the original bill by the gentleman from Tennessee now make the rates about what the commission was to report.

Mr. MOON. I am going to get at that directly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Very well. I wanted to be sure.

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, this much for the brush that has been thrown in the way. If you will bear with me I will discuss the general scope of this section. I will then give to the RECORD those tables that have been prepared in explanation of the rates. I shall not attempt to discuss the tables, because that would take too much of my time. I shall also present for the RECORD the detailed discussion of the various features of this section. But I always find that I can get at this House better by saying what I desire to say rather than read any detailed statements with reference to any section, and therefore, if I can have your attention, gentlemen, I want to discuss in a general way the features of this particular section.

As I remarked, I shall content myself with a general discussion of the scope of the section, and those detailed features and minute features of it I will ask to put in the RECORD. To understand the law that you propose to enact and the effect of that law upon the system on which it is intended to operate, to determine whether in its ultimate operation it will be prejudicial or beneficial to the public interest, we must in a measure understand the law that we seek to repeal, alter, or amend. Therefore it is well that we call into consideration the laws that have been enacted on the subject of railway mail pay.

The first act that was passed, under which we now pay the railroads of the United States, was passed in 1873. It has been in operation, with some modifications, from that period to this time. You will find from one of the tables which I have here that in round numbers the pay for the transportation of mail by railroad routes in the United States under the first weighing provided for under the act of 1873 amounted to about $7,800,000. There has been a gradual increase, due, of course, very largely, though not altogether, to the increase in the service. Gradually the pay has risen, until the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1915 carries about $61,600,000, as against $7,800,000 in 1873. But that is not material if the service has been performed for the people, because we must pay for the service which is performed, and it is proper that we pay just compensation for it.

Now, let us see if we clearly understand that law of 1873. It is provided that under regulations by the department the mails of the United States shall be weighed quadrennially, and that compensation shall, in each weighing division, be based for the four subsequent years upon that first annual weighing. The weighing under the regulations occurs sometimes during 35 days, sometimes during 105 days, and sometimes perhaps longer. The result of that weighing is that the railroad companies are paid certain amounts per ton per mile for carrying the mails, and I will place in the RECORD a table showing the exact rates for the whole service. I need not pause to discuss those rates.

Every four years, therefore, the mail has been weighed in one of the sections of the country. For instance, it is weighed in the western section this year, the pay for the western section for the next three years is based upon the pay this year in that section, and so on in the other four sections for the full four years. I am not charging any fraud upon the railroad companies, though it has been frequently charged, because I do not make charges without having proof; but we can not fail to see the opportunity for fraud existing under that law. For instance, if the mails are being weighed in the southern section, to form the basis upon which the pay is to be computed for four years, it would be very easy to divert the mails to and from the West, and carry them around through the South and weigh them upon every railroad in the southern section day in and day out, and that would form the basis of pay. But I do not assume that anything of that sort has been done. It may have been done. It is an error, however, in legislation to permit the possibility of the perpetration of fraud of that character. And again, when actually weighed, if fraud was desired to be perpetrated, all that would be necessary would be for the transportation companies to stand in collusion with one man in the Post Office Department or with one man upon the route that was being weighed.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will yield.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Would it not be better to weigh the mail simultaneously in all sections of the country, so that there could be no diversion?

Mr. MOON. That would possibly avoid any diversion, but when the gentleman understands that it would take several million dollars to do that, he will find that it would be a very unbusinesslike proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will observe by a further statement of the law that the policy which has been pursued is not only unscientific but utterly inaccurate. It can not form a legitimate basis for compensation or remuneration to the railroad companies upon the one hand, nor can it result in a proper disposition of revenues for that purpose by the Government upon the other hand. It needs a radical change. When you examine the table which I will place in the RECORD showing a gradual increase of railway mail pay by leaps and bounds, sometimes by one, two, and three million dollars per annum, you will appreciate at once the effect of the adoption of a system that will put an end to this uncertainty, that will fix a just basis of compensation upon which the rights of the Government and the rights of the railroad companies may be accurately determined.

You see the present effect of this policy. The question was once asked of a Postmaster General whether it was possible under the present system of computation of pay for him as head of this great department to come within $10,000,000, not of what was paid, because we all know that, but of what would be the legitimate compensation of the railroad companies for the transportation of these mails, and he answered that it could not be done. It was a knowledge of those facts that brought about the present attempt to correct those conditions. Ought there to be any politics in a proposition that brings about a change from uncertainty to certainty, a change that will bring accuracy instead of confusion, a change based upon intelligent lines of thought, as against a policy subversive of the rights of the Government by a possible perpetration of fraud on the part of those connected with the service?

For your detailed information I present also for the RECORD a full and detailed statement of this alleged revolutionary change in the service of this department.

Let me call your attention to the fact that we dispense with the weighing process. We avoid the weighing of the mails hereafter. We avoid the uncertainty of computation of pay. We avoid all errors that have been pointed out under the present system by paying for the space that the Government occupies. The joint commission of which my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] are members, have considered this question, and these gentlemen fully approve of the main features and plans of this bill. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have had the benefit of the services of that commission and the knowledge of its work. They have had it through the Post Office Department, which was cooperating with that commission all along, and they have reached the conclusion that the Government of the United States should depart from the system of railway mail pay now in vogue—and I speak now of certain amendments to the bill—and that we should pay for a full apartment car, 60 feet long on the inside, 21 cents per mile for every mile that that car runs in the United States carrying mail, and 21 cents for every mile that it runs after it has carried the mail, when it is going back empty.

Keep these figures in your heads. There are two other standards fixed that vary somewhat from the present standards, one is the 30-foot compartment car. For that we propose to pay 10½ cents per mile for every mile that that car runs every day in the year. For the 15-foot car we propose to pay 5¼ cents a mile. In addition we are paying fixed terminal charges and fixed initial charges. I will place in the RECORD the exact figures.

I should have said that we propose to pay 20 cents, too, for storage car, and the difference between that and the other is that it does not have to be heated or lighted or supplied with water.

On the pouch mail we are proposing to pay fixed prices for carrying each pouch. Now, that mail goes upon cars that have no full apartment cars, no portion of an apartment car, but may go in a baggage car.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Is not the gentleman mistaken about the provision of the bill at that point? In this bill it is proposed to pay for weight somewhat like the present system for pouch mail.

Mr. MOON. Yes; at a fixed figure.

Mr. LLOYD. I thought the gentleman said it was paid by the pouch.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; by the pound, of course. Now, this mail carried in the closed pouch, every pound of which we pay for at the rate fixed, may go in an express car or be put anywhere in the baggage car and thrown off. Those are the features of difference between the old and the new system.

You ask me why it is we fix 21 cents for the line. The answer is that the experts of the department, the commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, make this rate comparable to passenger rates. The passenger rates are about 24½ cents—I am not giving the exact fractional figures—for carrying passengers. In other words, they say the railroads in the United States can carry passengers at that rate per mile, 24½ cents. That includes not only the moving of the train, but the water and the lights, the interest upon its legitimate bonded indebtedness, and all of the overhead charges. Everything is computed to reach the rates by which passengers may be carried per car per mile.

Now, is it not wise, is it not legitimate, is it not fair, as the commission contends, that when other classes of matter—if I may so designate passengers—is carried, that it must be with the view to the particular service performed by the railroads in a particular instance? For instance, if you were to carry dead matter, as you do in a storage car, it ought to be less than where you have a full compartment car in which there must be working space for the agent of the Government at work in the car.

Coming back to the question fixed by the commission that fix it at 24½ cents, the statisticians say that in handling the mail there ought to be a reduction from that rate of 2 or 2½ per cent. Therefore that would bring it down to about 22 cents.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman is making a very interesting statement in reference to the cost of the passenger service and the Mail Service. Is his statement made in view of the declaration of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the railroads are not deriving sufficient revenue from passenger traffic and that a raise in the rates of passenger fares would be justified?

Mr. MOON. The recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission reduced the rate nearly one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. LLOYD. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, I think the gentleman from Colorado is mistaken with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission having made any such statement. The statement was made by Mr. Brandeis, who is attorney for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOON. That is true, and I forgot to say that Mr. Brandeis never had any information on this question. If so, he never has exhibited it. Now I must proceed. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that 24.96 is regarded as compensatory to the railroad company, including its charges of every character, and in view of the fact that the mail service does not cost like the passenger service, because you have none of these liabilities incident to it—you do not have a conductor and a brakeman and officials to control that particular car, because the mail car is controlled and the mail is managed in the car by the servant of the Government. Now, 2½ per cent deducted from 24 per cent leaves 22 per cent. This bill provides for a line charge of 21 cents, and there is added to it the terminal charges, the initial charges, and then you have the figure that is a fraction higher than the Interstate Commerce Commission says is just and legitimate compensation.

Take this bill in the concrete, and let us see how it would operate. You will find—and I will furnish you a table giving the details of the service—that this very bill under consideration to-day, if it were put into effect now, would give to the railroad companies of the United States about $587,000 per annum more money than they get under the provisions of the appropriation bill which passed and became a law on the 9th of March for the fiscal year 1915. How can it be said that it is unfair when for a single year this very measure will give them more than half a million dollars of money more than they are getting now for the service?

But you ask me if that is true, that we are giving to the railroad companies now half a million dollars more under the new plan for this year than they get under the general appropriation bill for a similar service, of what benefit is this bill to the public? It is a benefit in this, that under this plan the Post Office Department can so handle its mail, so load it and prepare it for transportation, so conduct the transportation of the mails, as to recoup in these economies the difference in a single year.

Then, while the Government of the United States will under this bill have to pay for about 265,000,000 miles of travel by one car in this service—for many millions of it the car will be empty—they can so adjust in the administration of affairs the handling of the mails as to perfect that economy in administration that will more than overcome the difference in favor of the railroad companies under this bill. Then, if the railroad companies are getting all that they are entitled to as compensation, and we are getting a definite and a fixed system by which we can determine daily the liabilities of our Government, is not the condition better? Ah, but why do the railroads fight it so? When we have once established this system, when we have determined upon the service required, the law fixing the compensation, it remains the same.

It is not subject to that varying and changing condition that is brought about by a quadrennial weighing of the mails and a guess for the other three years upon the method of computation. How can it be that in these years that have passed since the act of 1873 the enormous sum of sixty-odd millions of money is reached in transportation, some years leaping one, two, three, and four millions of money? It could not be upon a system accurate as this is, and I congratulate my friends of the House here who were upon that commission, and I am proud of them, because I appointed them upon that commission; and I am proud of their service. The minor differences that may be between us as to the language of the law being carried as heretofore or changed in some respects amounts to but little, and the little variation in the amount of the divisional compartment cars amounts to but little. It is one of safety to this country in the handling of mails.

But to go back to the consideration of the question as to why the roads oppose it, it will hereafter be impossible for this service to increase one, two, three, and four millions a year without the people knowing exactly what the service is for. We know the number of cars they use, we know the number of miles they travel, we know the compensation, we know the cars that are storage cars and the cars that are full apartment and quarter and half compartment, and we know the value of the closed-coach service, and those are all the elements that enter into it, in the main.

Mr. Chairman, the railroad companies at first complained that they had not been heard. Why, the most ample hearings possible have been given before this commission, before the department, before the committee at various times. They want the uncertainty to continue, because they will benefit by it; and, mark you, if you adopt the policy suggested by these gentlemen and approved by the department and by the committee, you will put an end to that vast increase in railway mail pay that occurs annually, and you will get certainty in your service. But the roads say that it is not fair to them; that they have already lost an immense amount of money. Some of them say that they have lost $15,000,000 under the present policy. They might just as well have said $50,000,000, because one figure is as close to the truth as the other. The truth is that they have been overpaid. I call your attention to the substance of Document 105 and to the statements of the Postmaster General, at page 997 of the report of the hearings before the joint committee that had this matter under consideration. I point you to all of the evidence, and I would be glad if I had the time to pick it up and review it, to show that, at the very lowest figure, they have been overpaid even for the last fiscal year a half million of money. If you continue this old plan, you may confidently expect that in 20 years from to-day for this service, with a little increase in facilities, you will be paying $100,000,000 instead of $60,000,000. Adopt this new plan and you will hold the service down practically to the same figure every year, and you will know exactly what you are doing, and you will know what you are getting and paying for, and you will pay for all you get, and if you need additional service all you have to do is to demend it and pay for it in accordance with the law.

I have no patience with the suggestion that this Congress has not the power to require under penalties the moving of the mails of the United States over every mail route in the Union. This is the only civilized Government in the world that has not upon its statute books to-day a law that forces the carrying of the mails over these routes, whether the carriers want to carry them or not. It is a power and a function of government that can not be abdicated. There is but one limitation upon it in any government, surely but one under a constitutional government, and that is that the compensation to be fixed by the legislative body in its discretion shall not be confiscatory, but must be compensatory. I have attempted to demonstrate to you that this is not confiscatory, that it is liberal in its compensation, by a comparison between similar service rendered and the pay for it and that which we are demanding. You will find also in an explanation of this question which I have prepared in detail here another table, the comparative rates for the transportation of mail matter and express matter. You will find that if the express companies had been carrying the mails of the United States during the last fiscal year the compensation to the express companies for that service would have been several million dollars less than the compensation that has been paid to the railroad companies. True, there is a difference in the character of the service. There is a marked difference in some respects, but upon a summary of the whole, and the facilities of transportation, the benefits to be derived from the service are in favor of the Government mail, so far as yielding an accretion to the carrier is concerned, as against the carriage of express.

I do not know how long I have been talking. There is a whole lot here to talk about, but I must close it up and let some other gentlemen discuss these questions.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman closes, will he yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there an estimate anywhere that shows what the expenditure will be the first year under this bill as amended?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the total?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman mean what the cost of the service will be?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; the cost of the entire service under this bill.

Mr. MOON. I think it is about $62,000,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman this, and then I am through. In his first bill the rates were carried at certain sums, and in the amendments which he has offered they have been increased.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In one instance it is 1 cent, and in another instance it is a half a cent, and in another another rate. In the case of the storage cars it is 2 cents. I understand that the gentleman's increase from the first increase to the second increase involves an increased total expenditure of about $3,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How does the gentleman arrive at that increase over the original bill?

Mr. MOON. Over the original bill? It is really more in the spirit of compromise with the committee and the department than anything else. The amount involved we regarded as probably negligible as compared with the splendor of the service to be obtained hereafter. The gentleman understands that the change of even a half a cent involves millions of money.

Mr. MURDOCK. I know it does. Does the gentleman in his latter figures approximate what the commission was to report?

Mr. MOON. We have a table here showing what the commission would probably report, as gathered from the Gazette by the department people; but whether that is accurate or not I do not know; but the gentleman will observe that the difference between the commission is about a half a cent in one instance, and a cent in another, and a quarter of a cent in another, and there is some difference in the initial and terminal charges, and, then, the commission provides for space for the pouch, and we do not, and that saves us in favor of our bill about $1,118,000.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. The difference between the commission and the Post Office Committee is 1 cent on the storage-car rate. They fix it at 21, and the committee fixed it at 20.

Mr. MOON. That is in the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. I am talking about the amendment. On the 30-apartment car we fix the rate at 11 cents, and the committee by its amendment fixes it at ten and a half.

Mr. MOON. That has been already stated.

Mr. MURDOCK. The question I want to get at is the difference between the gentleman's other bill and the commission bill.

Mr. LLOYD. But on the 15-foot apartment car the commission will recommend 6 cents instead of 5½.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman will find we have given here—which the department prepared—a table showing the difference between the bill that the committee expected to introduce, or would have introduced on the basis of the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and this particular bill, and there is a table here that shows that. There are several million dollars difference, in view of the two bills on that feature, but the main difference grows out of the fact of the difference in the terminal charges and the slight difference of cost in the apartment cars and in the pouch—a million and a half.

Mr. Chairman, I feel like I ought to apologize to the House for so much discussion on this question, and yet the details of this question are immense. I have attempted to show here by these tables and explanatory notes, and the proposition to which I have referred verbally, the position of the committee upon these questions. I want to emphasize before concluding that there is no difference between this committee and the joint commission that has not yet reported, as I understand, on the policy of the change. Whatever difference exists, exists upon the minute details of compensation for particular characters of service. Those of my friends here are a little higher than we have. Ours is based upon the statement of the statisticians of the department and the practical experience of the department in the handling of this question. Theirs is based upon the statement of the statisticians of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I apprehend that there is no serious difference or will be in the final outcome upon these particular questions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this has been purely a business talk with my friends here about this railway mail pay, and I assure you it is a good deal of pain that I experience as I turn from the consideration of the purely business proposition to one that I still think is business in its character, but which my friends on the other side for some reason strange to me regard as political in its nature. I do not think so. I am going to discuss it with you and see if we can not come to some sort of a conclusion about this measure and vote for it as a unit. Now, you do not want to go home and tell the good people of all the great sections of the country you represent that you voted against a bill that will ultimately save millions upon millions of dollars to the Government of the United States and would prevent 1-cent letter postage. You do not want to say that you want to obstruct that beneficent policy by which $3,800,000 has been, under the legislation and administration of this Government, turned into the general Federal Treasury. You want to say, I hope, that notwithstanding a feature of this bill that you do not like—if you do not like it, I am sorry you do not—but you want to say that notwithstanding it you voted for the whole bill because of the great benefits coming to our country on account of it. Now, if I thought that we would lose the thirteenth section of this bill on account of injecting matter that some people insist should not be in the measure, I would say wipe it out and let us fight out that political question some other way.

But let us see. This committee, as I said before, are not here merely to register the will of the department in this particular bill. We changed the views of the department very much. We have acceded in large measure to the views of the commission because of their superior advantages over ours for information connected with the matter. A spirit of conciliation has existed all along, and I want it to exist in this matter I am going to discuss now. Now, what is it?

Mr. SMAUEL W. SMITH. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MOON. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I have been very much interested in the able speech of our distinguished chairman, and I would like to ask him now if he will not consent to striking out section 3, so we may all get together on this subject of railway mail pay?

Mr. MOON. I am unable to do that of my own motion. This committee controls that. We must leave it to their judgment.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman consent later on to make that motion?

Mr. MOON. We will debate that later on. I was about to remark when I was diverted for a moment that this committee does not sit in the room below for the mere purpose of registering the will of the department upon any question. It is our pleasure when we can to comply with the desires of the department for the betterment of the service and the promotion of all legislation that looks to that end. But we have changed in accordance with our views many of the sections of this bill. However, there is one section to which the department does not give its sanction. In other words, the Postmaster General has been charged with acceding to this section in order to pass the railway mail section. The fact is that this section would go through easier if the measure to which my friend from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] has just referred was stricken out. I acquit the Postmaster General of all sympathy and favor to this section that I am about to read. The committee takes the full responsibility. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter any assistant postmaster who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to execute a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required to also execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant he is for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to require all applicants for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days, or as soon thereafter as practicable after the passage of this act, under the civil-service law, rules, and regulations, and the Postmaster General shall, under such law, rules, and regulations, appoint all assistant postmasters, and all laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Now, who has any objection to that? I would like to know.

Mr. STAFFORD. All of us on this side and some on your side.

Mr. MOON. I think not. I will show you why you ought not to have any objection if you have. Now, a man who is opposed to that is opposed to it on political grounds purely. He can not be opposed to it on any legitimate civil-service grounds. A man who is opposed to that is a political partisan; that is all. Now, as a Democrat I do not agree with Gen. Burleson; I do not agree with this administration on the question of civil service. I believe in an efficient civil service. I believe in a service under which there will be a tenure, not for life, but a limited term of years, during which the best service may be rendered to the Government. I believe in an examination for that service. But I do not believe under these institutions of ours and in the light of the American Declaration of Independence that it is either right, patriotic, or American to put any man or any set of men in office for life by Executive order. If every office in the United States to-day were filled for life by a Democrat, I would protest in the name of the honor and integrity and glory of my country against the consummation of such a crime against the liberty of the people. [Applause.] I have no objection to Republicans holding office. I would not care, as far as I am concerned, if the powers of Government were so balanced that the executive and the legislative, the two branches of the legislative department, should never at the same time be in the possession of the same political party. There is nothing so far from my views on this question as an attempt to get out of office a Republican postmaster. Of course I would always prefer a Democrat.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman said, and he received applause for the remark, that he as a Democrat would be opposed to having a Democratic President fill all the offices with Democrats by Executive order?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. And "all the offices" would include, of course, judicial, legislative, and every other kind of Government office. Nobody has ever thought of proposing anything of that kind. But does not the gentleman from Tennessee see a vast distinction between a legislator and a clerk whose duty it is simply to receive money and pay it out in accordance with law? What is the difference between a clerk doing such work for the Post Office Department and a clerk doing similar work for a manufacturing corporation?

Mr. MOON. Certainly I see a difference between the different characters of office, but I do not see any office through those eyes that would give a life tenure by law or Executive order to a clerk or anybody else. Take a life-tenure office, and what is the effect? An incumbent may give 15 years of honest, faithful service to his Government. At the end of that time he is incapable of efficient service.

Look at the department to-day, and one-fifth, practically, are unfit for the service they are proposing to perform, and yet are held on as a matter of charity largely until at last forced to be dropped off the list in order that the work may be done at all; and you call that civil service. It is inefficient service and nothing else. An honest civil service would not tolerate a condition that gave a tenure of over 15 or 20 years. Look at the effect of it. If you are to continue these people in these positions, if you are to take their service all of their lives nearly, unfitted as they will be at the end of it for the performance of any other duty, common honesty would compel you to have a civil-service pension list, and you have not a right to so legislate. You have not a right, through your Executive or in any other way, to so decree as to place that burden upon the American people.

Mr. Chairman, these assistant postmasters of the United States do not give a bond except to the Government, and yet the postmaster is responsible for every single act they perform, every defalcation they make, and the Government does not go to their assistance. It goes to the postmaster to make him account for the defalcation. Pending in our committee are bills asking relief for postmasters where their assistants have plundered the Treasury. Yet there is no bond. Here is a man who is a confidential clerk; he ought to be the personal friend, if not the political friend, of the postmaster, and yet he is thrust upon that postmaster. He may have been taken, as was once done, from Washington and put in the New York post office, without the consent of the postmaster there. No control, no authority over him, and yet that man has the right to handle the revenues of the post office, and does handle them.

Now, this section does nothing more than this: It provides that these assistant postmasters shall not only execute a bond to the United States, but in the discretion of the Postmaster General he may require him to issue a bond to his principal, naming the conditions under which this ought to be done. But passing from that, let us look at the other part of the section for a little while.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. If the postmaster is responsible for the acts of his assistant, I can see why the postmaster should be in authority to exact a bond from him, but why should he give another bond to the United States, since the postmaster himself has given his bond to secure the United States? And if the postmaster himself is responsible for the acts of his assistant why should he not appoint his assistant and thus obviate the necessity of any regulations requiring the Postmaster General to send a man from New York to Pittsburgh or vice versa to fill the post of an assistant?

Mr. MOON. I think that is a very wise suggestion. I should be very glad to accede to that. However, I am not attempting, and the committee is not attempting, in this bill to do more than to remedy the condition that exists in reference to that matter, leaving it in the discretion of the department. This is not a bill to correct the whole civil-service law. It is a measure that we think should receive consideration, connected as it is with the Post Office Department.

If I were presenting to this House a civil-service law, I would insist that the term of office should be limited to a certain number of years; that the applicant should pass an examination for the particular work that he was to perform; that he should be of a certain age; that he should be limited to a term of years, to an age beyond which he could not serve longer; that he should have an examination then, and at the end of that time, when he is still an efficient man and can make a living in a contest with the world, he should go out into the world and make a living and let the department be relieved from the burden of a civil-service pension law. That is the way I would handle the clerks.

I want to say that, so far as the postmasters and their assistants are concerned, I would have the party in power to name them and to take the responsibility. You can not administer this Government in accordance with the principles and policies of the Democratic Party as decreed by the people at the polls a year and a half ago unless you have Democrats to aid in this administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These assistant postmasters ought to be appointed, as suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS], by the postmaster or by the administration. And while I am right here on that question, before I forget it, I want to say that these gentlemen who are now holding these offices—2,560 of them in the United States—are, 98 per cent of them, Republicans. Not one of them ever took a civil-service examination for assistant postmaster; not one. Then, tell me why it is that you want to violate the spirit of the civil-service law and retain them without an examination? Did not Mr. Taft, in the expiring days of his administration, cover by Executive order 43,000 assistant postmasters into the service for life? Yea, for life. And did not President Wilson say that that was not just and fair, and that there ought to be an examination of these men? And did he not order an examination of them, and has not that order been executed, and is it not being executed?

If it was a wise order as to the fourth-class postmasters, why is it not equally wise as to the assistant postmasters in first and second class offices? Will any gentleman tell me why? Are you going to tolerate it? I do not care whether my friend Postmaster General Burleson or anybody else wants to tolerate it, the retention of 2,500 Republican officeholders for life without examination Democracy can not sanction. Are you ready to tell the American people that you are holding these offices in trust for the Republican Party to thwart and destroy the principles of democratic government?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MOON. Not now. This is a little question, so far as these officers are concerned, but the fundamental principle underlying it is potential. You are going too far. Yea, you go too far when you permit for life the existence of a single officer. The time has come when these things must be changed in the interest of the people.

This administration is doing well; its splendid work on the tariff, on the currency, on the trust bills, and other measures has gone through; it will carry out the postal legislation that will make this great department of the Government safe in the promotion of the public welfare. But let me tell you that when the end of economic policies shall come, so far as legislation in this House is concerned; when the decree of the people on the subject of trusts and monopolies shall have been registered; when they have been relieved from the thraldom and the oppression of monopoly, then you will turn instinctively to the consideration of the fundamental principles of your Government. Weighed down as you have been in the years past by untoward policies, you have not given that consideration to the great fundamental principles and issues upon which the great Republic rests. I introduced, a few days ago, for the correction of these errors, an amendment to the Constitution by prohibiting the life tenure in office of individuals, which I will reproduce, with your permission, as an appendix to my remarks, and it brought forth a storm of vindictive and vituperative suggestions from that part of the press of the country which does not want to come any nearer to a republican form of government than we have got. As I have said before, I say now, it is not a true Republic that we live under; no land is a Republic in which the judicial power is vested for life in men. There is no liberty, and there never was in any land where the judiciary had the power under the Constitution to nullify the law of the supreme legislative body of the Government. That power does not exist to-day in any one of the great nations of the earth. This is the only land in which the power of the judiciary is raised above the legislative branch of the Government to the point of a nullification of its laws. You will never have a Government of the Constitution in accordance with the spirit of the American Declaration of Independence until you shall have a law that makes your judiciary elective, and that makes elective the officials of all our great administrative offices. And finally, let me tell you, the lines of political battle will be drawn and forced in this country along the lines of the Declaration of Independence, and we shall yet breathe the immortal spirit of 1776 into the Constitution.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MOON. No; not now. That spirit was destroyed when the patriots were defeated in the Constitutional Convention by the overpowering strength of the late Tories and the late adherents to Great Britain. But the sentiment has passed down the line for more than a hundred years. The fight between federalism and democracy has gone on during all these years, and yet men tell us we are not capable in the Federal institution of exercising the power which we exercise in the sovereign States that constitute the Union. Is there any more reason why this Federal Government should not be drawn in bonds of love and union to the hearts of the American people than that the citizens of our Commonwealths should be drawn to the great Commonwealths in which they live? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, you can look forward. You are going to have every "ism" that is possible, until you have at last come down to a government under a constitution by the people. If, as men who believe in republican institutions, we turn our backs upon the doctrine that the people are competent, that the people have the right to determine and enforce their will at the ballot box, you have done nothing more than to sanction under the form of government the divine right of kings. No ruler, it is true, is here set upon the throne and wields the scepter. There is no ruler here, it is true, to whom the subject must bow. But there is a greater ruler than a mere personal king. It is the law, the majesty of the law; and if law is so made as to uphold and maintain classes against the common people, if it is so made as to uphold and maintain monopoly of power against the common citizen, it is a shame and a disgrace to mankind to speak of a law under such conditions being promulgated and maintained by a real republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You must go back, and you will, to the fundamental principles of democracy. Old Jefferson said that this Government could not be administered by its enemies. Great Britain would be just as great an oppressor, and no greater, to those who advocated the principles of true democracy, than those in this Government who have no faith in the people being capable of administering their affairs by elections at the ballot box.

Mr. Chairman, I have often heard it said that Cato the elder, remembering the wrongs to his country by Carthage, never closed a speech that he did not declare that if Roman liberty was to live Carthage must be destroyed. I tell you, sir, that the day is not far distant when every American patriot must close every public utterance with the declaration that if liberty shall survive in the Republic the life tenure in office must be ended. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I rise to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. If the gentleman believes that the sentiments he has been so eloquently expressing are democracy, they are precisely such sentiments as I believe in, but I call them Lincoln republicanism.

Mr. MOON. I do not know anything about Lincoln republicanism. I believe in democracy.

Mr. HULINGS. When you advocate Jeffersonian democracy you are practically advocating Lincoln republicanism.

Mr. MOON. All right. I am glad Mr. Lincoln agreed with us.

Mr. HULINGS. Both of those great Americans agreed in their opposition to the Hamiltonian idea that this is a Government by the representative "class." But to my question; there is a matter which I wish to ask about. I have had a great many complaints from men who are rural route carriers. We increased their pay to $1,200, but leave it discretionary with the Postmaster General, and under that discretion many of the carriers get no increase whatever. Now, is that matter to be covered anywhere in your bill?

Mr. MOON. The act approved on March 9, 1914, provided for an increase of rural letter carriers' pay to not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; but, for instance, I have five carriers from one office. Three of them get an increase of $82. Two of them do not get any increase at all, because it is said that under the discretion of the Postmaster General this increase is only given in proportion as they carry an increased number of postal parcels.

Mr. MOON. I presume the gentleman understands the order of the Postmaster General, which bases the pay not only on mileage but on the number and weight of the packages carried.

Mr. HULINGS. Oh, yes; I understand. But it was understood that the pay of carriers was increased on the ground that they were underpaid, but the Postmaster General has made regulations that prevent some carriers getting any increase. Is that corrected in this bill?

Mr. MOON. No. Some gentleman may offer to amend this bill on that question. I do not know that.

THE RAILROAD COMPANIES SEEK TO DIVEST THE POSTMASTER GENERAL OF ALL DISCRETION AS TO RATES.

The principal part of the railroads' material which they have been using in fighting the pending bill has been furnished them by ex-Senator Bourne, chairman of the Joint Committee on Railroad Mail Pay. The latest document put out by the railroads is a reprint of Mr. Bourne's five statements given to the public since the introduction of the present bill, assailing it and the Post Office Committee and the Post Office Department. The railroads, in their contention for higher pay and in their insistence that all discretion be taken from the Postmaster General in the matter of fixing pay, find an advocate in Mr. Bourne in these published statements, regardless of the testimony submitted by the Post Office Department and the legislation upon railroad mail pay since its beginning.

One of the contentions most strenuously made by the railroads before the Joint Commission on Railroad Mail Pay was that the present law should be changed and that the Postmaster General be divested of all power over rates. In order to accomplish this they insisted that the words "not exceeding," which are now included in the statute, be eliminated from the proposed legislation, and that the rates should be fixed absolutely and the Postmaster General given no power to fix a lower rate. In other words, this would put the railroad companies in complete command of the situation regardless of the Postmaster General. If, under special conditions, the service were not worth the maximum rates fixed by Congress, the railroad companies could insist upon those rates regardless of the equities in the case and the Postmaster General would be helpless and be compelled to pay what he knew was an exorbitant rate for mail service. The railroads have found an advocate in ex-Senator Bourne, the chairman of the joint committee authorized by Congress to consider the question, and he has stated in his public utterances that the proposal of this bill, which has the support of the department, to still retain these words in the law is "bureaucracy run mad."

As a matter of fact, the proposed provision in this bill is substantially the same as the provisions of all statutes regulating mail pay for railroad service since the enactment of the law of 1838. They have all provided maximum rates and have all lodged in the Postmaster General a discretion to fix lower rates if it were proper to do so. The present plan of fixing pay is prescribed by the law of 1873, and its amendments and these words are continued in those statutes. The provision that the Postmaster General shall pay "not exceeding" the rates named forbids the Postmaster General paying more than those rates, but gives him the discretion of paying less if the conditions of the service do not warrant the maximum pay. The assumed fear that some Postmaster General would grossly abuse this discretion is without the slightest foundation, as not one of them has ever made a level or horizontal reduction in rates applying to all services. However, there are individual cases where, on account of the special conditions of the service, the Postmaster General has paid less than the maximum rates. The railroads and their friends who are aiding them in the fight against this salutary provision want these words stricken out and the Postmaster General left helpless in these matters.

THE DEPARTMENT'S CREDITABLE SPIRIT OF COOPERATION.

The chairman of the joint committee considering railroad mail pay, which has not yet made its report to Congress, although it has long since closed its hearings and printed the evidence in a volume of over 1,500 pages, has, according to the newspapers, been giving out almost daily interviews since the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported the bill now under consideration, in which he has attacked the Post Office Department and its officers, charging them with changing the details of their plan and their rates for adjusting railroad mail pay on the space basis.

The Postmaster General submitted to the joint committee on February 12 of the present year a tentative draft of suggestions for recommendation for legislation and regulation of railroad mail service and compensation therefor. In this draft the space basis was recommended with certain sizes of cars, conforming to the conditions now found in the service and line charges and terminal and loading charges specified. The plan was a tentative one and became the subject of discussion before the joint committee. The officials of the Post Office Department defended its provisions and agents and attorneys of the railroad companies assailed them, and at all times the officers of the department were open-minded and endeavored by every means at their disposal to enlighten the commission with their views and such facts as they could submit, and to assist in reaching conclusions upon each and every point which should be most consistent with the best interests of the service and in complete fairness to the railroad companies. It is highly creditable to them that they have been willing to adopt every feature which the testimony and the discussion before the joint committee seem to make advisable under all the circumstances. This is in striking contrast with the attitude assumed and the spirit shown by the attorneys and representatives of the railroad companies at the hearings. They offered no constructive proposal excepting the correction of certain inconsistencies in the present law. They opposed the space basis upon every occasion for no apparent reason other than that stated by Representative LLOYD, a member of the joint committee, at the hearings, as follows:

There is not one trunk-line representative here but who is doing everything in his power to make it appear they are not receiving enough for carrying the mail, and it is not the question of whether it should be carried by weight or space, and the reason you are objecting to space is because you do not think you will get as much compensation as under the weight system.

In sharp contrast, however, and with open-mindedness and frankness in the consideration of the subject and in a spirit of complete cooperation with the joint committee so far as they were able to discover their views in conferences had with them the officers of the department recommended certain changes in the tentative plan referred to. These changes have been embodied in the bill reported by the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and which is now under consideration. These principal changes may be briefly mentioned under the following headings, and the department is not only willing to so cooperate in making these changes, but is anxious to give the commission any credit that may be due it for the development of the subject in the manner which has led to such changes.

THE PRESENT PLAN AND RATES FOR READJUSTING RAILROAD MAIL PAY; THE PROPOSED PLAN; THE PRESENT PLAN.

The purpose of this proposed act is to provide for a new plan of readjusting railroad mail pay. The new plan contemplates the adoption of the space basis and the abandonment of the weight basis with respect to the greater part of the service.

At present railroad mail pay is provided for and adjusted upon the basis of the average daily weights carried over the several established railroad routes, and an additional amount is allowable for railway post-office cars when the space for distribution purposes equals or exceeds 40 feet in the car. Space for distribution purposes in apartment cars—that is, space less than 40 feet—is not compensated for in addition to the pay for the weight of mails. There are, therefore, under present law two different methods of pay for service which cover three different conditions in the service. That is, there is pay for weight under all circumstances; there is additional pay for space, 40 feet and more, in cars; and there is pay for weight only in cases where apartments less than 40 feet in cars are furnished.

Readjustments of compensation are made under the law allowing pay for average daily weights upon weighings in each contract section not less frequently than once in every four years. The country is divided into four contract sections, all quadrennial contracts for the several classes of transportation services, together with the railroad service, expiring in each contract section at the same time. The weighings of mails on the railroad routes occur successively in the several contract sections. Hence there is a weighing every year in the service, although but one every four years in any particular section. Upon the weights of mails for each route obtained during the weighing period the average daily weight carried over its whole length is computed and the pay per annum is fixed according to the schedule of rates provided by law. The order readjusts the pay for the contract term of four years, subject to future orders and fines and deductions.

The statute fixing the pay for railroad transportation based on average daily weights provides certain conditions precedent to entitle the companies to full pay, one of which is that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed shall be provided for railway postal clerks to accompany and distribute the mails. Consequently no additional pay is authorized for space to distribute the mails in apartment cars 30 feet or less in length.

The additional pay allowed for full railway post-office cars of 40 feet or more in length is ordered at the rates fixed by statute and the regulations of the department upon the needs of the service, as ascertained and reported by the field officers of the service and finally accepted by the officers of the department in accordance with the postal regulations governing such authorizations.

The authorization of mail service to be performed by railway companies is made by the Postmaster General under sections 3942, 3964, and 3965, Revised Statutes (secs. 1316, 1305, and 1307, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1913), but without formal contract reduced to one instrument, the mutual agreement of the department and the company being followed by a formal order establishing the service over a definite line and between stated termini.

The statutes governing the authorization of railroad mail service and fixing the rates of compensation are contained in section 1317 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, 1913 (Rev. Stat. 4002 and subsequent acts), and reads as follows:

SEC. 1317. The Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation * * * to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned:

First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for * * * (railway postal clerks) to accompany and distribute the mails.

Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200, and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds, the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 30, at such times after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct.

2. The Postmaster General * * * is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 10 per cent per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873 (R. S., sec. 4002), for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight.

3. The Postmaster General * * * is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1878, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed by the [preceding paragraph] first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876.

4. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mail on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds; and on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds up to 48,000 pounds, and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds at the rate of $19.24 upon all roads other than land-grant roads, and upon all land-grant roads the rate shall be $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of said 48,000 pounds.

5. The provision of the act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., 1212), * * * fixing the compensation to be paid for transportation of mail on land grant railroads at the rate of $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds, is hereby amended to make such rate of compensation after June 30, 1910, $15.39 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds, and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation in accordance with this amendment.

* * * * * * *

8. That hereafter before making the readjustment of pay for transportation of mails on railroad routes the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days not less than 90, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct.

* * * * * * *

10. When the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

SEC. 1318. All railway companies to which the United States have furnished aid, by grant of lands, right of way, or otherwise, shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and, until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 1319. Railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation authorized by this act. (See paragraph 5, section 1317.)

The statutes authorizing additional pay for full cars are contained in section 1329 of the Postal Laws and Regulations (Rev. Stat., 4004, and 34 Stat., 1212):

SEC. 1329. Additional pay may be allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars, at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length, and $30 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for 50-foot cars, and $50 per mile per annum for 55 to 60 foot cars.

2. After July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length, and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $32.50 per mile per annum for 50-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length.

THE PROPOSED PLAN.

The proposed law changes the method of authorizing and the method of paying for service, so that space shall be the controlling factor. Space will be authorized for distribution purposes wherever needed for distribution of mails, and space for storage of mails will be authorized as storage cars wherever needed for that purpose.

The space basis will apply to all service, except what is known as closed-pouch service on trains where there are no distribution cars authorized; that is, where there are no full cars or apartment cars operated and used.

The plan provides that service on closed-pouch trains shall continue to be paid for on the weight basis, with some modifications in the present rates which will be detailed later on. Closed-pouch service is the transportation and handling of mails in sacks and locked pouches in the custody of train employees on trains upon which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not needed or operated. The space basis is believed to be less desirable when applied to this class of service because of its fluctuating character as distinguished from the regularity and certainty of the postal-car service. It is proposed, however, to weigh these mails yearly and readjust compensation with the same frequency. As the mails are light in weight and the weighing can be done principally, if not wholly, by postmasters, transfer clerks, and other permanent employees of the department, it is believed that the cost thereof will be slight.

Section 15 is designed to make such changes in existing law as will put into effect this new plan. It repeals all statutes relating to adjustments for carriage of mails on the weight basis, excepting for closed-pouch mails, and fixes certain rates for authorized space instead.

It has been the purpose in drafting this provision to change existing law only so far as is necessary to accomplish the change in plan, with some new provisions which will be explained. Most of the provisions are similar in form to existing law or regulation, except where slight changes have been found necessary in order to adopt them to the new plan of adjustment.

ARE THE RAILROADS UNDERPAID FOR MAIL SERVICE?

During the hearings before the joint committee the railroads to a large extent were represented by what is known as the railway mail pay committee. This term should not be confused with any official committee, but was one chosen by the railroad representatives to designate the organization of their attorneys and agents in presenting the case of the railroads to the joint committee of Congress.

This railway mail pay committee contended before the joint committee that the railroads are underpaid for mail service, placing the amount, based upon various hypotheses, at most extravagant figures ranging from $15,000,000 upward. They appear to have had a most excellent organization, unlimited funds for carrying on publicity work, and to have persistently followed a plan to influence the public mind in an attitude of antagonism against the administration of the Post Office Department and to convince everybody that the railroads were receiving far less pay for the service performed than they were entitled to receive. Their campaign of publicity has been carried on through the newspapers and the circulation of printed pamphlets and leaflets sent apparently to a large mailing list, including Members of Congress, public officials, municipal organizations, railroad employees, and even the postmasters of the United States. In this printed matter they have set forth, as a rule, their own partisan views or their attempts to discredit the position taken by the officers of the Post Office Department in submitting the case for the Government to the joint committee. These statements have been unfair and biased and were not calculated to inform the recipients of the true condition or the merits of the controversy.

It is perfectly plain from a perusal of any one of these documents sent out by the railroads' organization that their purpose was not one of education but one of systematic effort to mold public opinion favorable to higher rates for railroad mail service and to discredit as far as possible the administration of the Post Office Department in connection with railroad mail pay. They have, however, not ended their activities at that point, but in a prepared statement for the press and in a separate pamphlet have attacked the department, the Postmaster General, and the chairman of the House committee for the existence of the bill that is now under consideration.

So far as underpayment to the railroads is concerned, the contention of the railroad companies was completely answered by the Second Assistant Postmaster General in his brief submitted to the joint committee January 16, 1914, and printed in their hearings, pages 987 and following. In this brief it is shown that the railroads not only were not underpaid at the time the ascertainment was made, but in fact were overpaid on a strictly commercial basis. The railroads attacked the ascertainment made by the department on the ground that the department's division of general expenses between the freight and passenger services apportioned too small an amount to the passenger service and therefore decreased the mail apportionment, and, further, they contended that the department's charge in Document 105 of space to the mail service was too small, because it did not charge the mail service with all the dead space which was represented in the cars the railroad companies saw fit to run regardless of the requirements of the department. These objections were later fully answered by the department, the principal features of which are set out in pages 1247 and following of the testimony taken before the joint committee.

CONSIDERATION BY COMMISSION.

The question of the proper basis for fixing compensation for the carriage of the mails by the railroads has been in controversy for many years. The present plan of readjustment was enacted in 1873, when the conditions differed very materially from those obtaining now. The plan has never been entirely satisfactory to the railroads or to the Post Office Department. The former have made repeated efforts to secure a revision of the laws that would increase their compensation, while the Post Office Department has maintained that the basis is inelastic and unscientific.

The question has been studied by several departmental and congressional commissions, all of whom have pointed out the desirability of the adoption of space as the main basis for compensation, and several of the commissions have recommended legislation fixing space with certain modifications as the unit of service. As early as 1874 and 1876 bills were introduced in Congress providing for a system of pay on a space basis.

A minority of the Hubbard Commission submitted a report to Congress in 1877 (45th Cong., 1st sess., S. Misc. Doc. No. 14, Dec. 14, 1877) recommending the adoption of the space basis combined with the factors of weight of mails carried and speed of trains.

A committee composed of departmental officials made an exhaustive study of the subject in 1883 and recommended in a report submitted to Congress in that year the adoption of a space basis, modified, however, by the factors of weight, speed, and frequency of service.

Subsequently in 1901 the joint commission of Congress, known as the Wolcott-Loud committee, investigated the Postal Service, and while the commission, as a whole, stated in its report (published as H. Rept. No. 2284, 56th Cong., 2d sess.) that though recognizing that the question of space must be considered as having strong influence upon the question of the reasonableness of the present (1901) railway mail pay, it felt unwilling, with the evidence before it, to recommend it as the controlling standard. Representative Loud, of the commission, however, gave it as his opinion in a separate report that space should be the basis of railway mail pay, as it is, as he stated, "the principal and therefore should be the controlling factor."

Following the investigations of 1877 Congress passed a law (act of Mar. 3, 1879, 20 Stat. L., 358) requiring the Postmaster General to request all railroad companies carrying the mails to furnish under seal such data relating to operating, receipts, and expenditures of such roads as may, in his judgment, be necessary to enable him to ascertain the cost of mail transportation and the proper compensation to be paid for the same, and to report to Congress, with such recommendation, founded upon the information obtained, as shall, in his opinion, be just and equitable.

An effort was made soon after the passage of this act to secure the information required, but the reports of the companies were so meager and unsatisfactory that they were practically worthless for the purposes indicated in the statute. Subsequently the subject was considered by the department, but because of the general opinion that the railroads did not have their accounts in shape at that time to enable them to make the reports as the department needed, and the belief of the department that the spirit of the law of 1879 had been substantially complied with by the several departmental and congressional commissions that had investigated and reported on the question, no further active effort was made until 1907, when the then Postmaster General directed that an inquiry be made along the lines of the statute, it being his belief that sufficient advance in accounting methods had been made by the railroads to permit the desired information to be furnished. It was a new and difficult undertaking and it required time to determine its practicability and extent. In November, 1909, in response to requests and instructions from the department, the railroads prepared and submitted data as to their operation, receipts, and expenditures. The department subsequently collated the information, made voluminous tabulations and computations based thereon, and submitted the result to Congress on August 12, 1911, together with a tentative draft of suggestions for legislation providing for the annual ascertainment of the cost of performing the mail service by each carrying road and the readjustment of pay on the space basis.

The report was printed as House Document No. 105, Sixty-second Congress, first session. Discussion of the proposed law during the second session of the Sixty-second Congress led to the designation, pursuant to the act of August 24, 1912, of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives to make an inquiry into the subject of postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mail. This committee organized and proceeded with its investigations, making the department's suggested bill the basis thereof, but being unable to make report by March 4, 1914, as required by the law, its personnel was continued by the act of March 9, 1914, with the same authorities and powers until final report is made to Congress, which is required to be made on or before December 1, 1914.

The committee has heard during its sessions a large amount of evidence upon the question, not only from the department, but from the railroad companies and their representatives, and has collected a vast amount of very valuable and very useful information, which is undoubtedly the most complete that any commission has ever collected on this subject.

After the consideration of the question of cost and after having had the benefit of the discussions before the committee, the department came to the conclusion that the ascertainment of cost in the manner in which it was first proposed and the use of such cost as the basis for rates is not desirable nor practicable, and that some other plan of fixing the rate should be adopted. This conclusion led to the preparation of the bill presented to-day for the consideration of Congress.

The hearings before the joint committee show that the space basis is entirely practicable, that it is more equitable to the individual roads than the weight basis, and that it is more adaptable to good and economical administration of the service.

ADEQUACY OF THE RATES PROVIDED.

The rates in the bill as amended provide for paying a line rate of 21 cents a mile for a mile run for a full railway post-office car of 60 feet in length and a pro rata amount, namely, 10½ cents, for apartments 30 feet in length, in cars, and a higher than pro rata amount, namely, 5½ cents, for apartments 15 feet in length, in cars, and 20 cents a mile run for a storage car 60 feet in length. In addition to the line rate there is a terminal rate of $4 for each one-way trip of a full 60-foot car, making $8 for the round trip, and a pro rata amount for apartments of 30 and 15 feet, respectively, in cars, and $4 for each one-way trip, or $8 for a round trip, of each storage car.

These line rates and the terminal rates combined make an average for the working and storage cars of 22.63 cents for each mile run of the equivalent of a 60-foot car, but there should be added to this the amount received for closed-pouch service, which will be adjusted upon the basis of weights. When this is added and proper allowance is made for the space which will be used in conveying the closed pouches, the rate is raised to 22.96 cents for each car mile for a 60-foot car or its equivalent.

The unit rate, therefore, which is to be considered in discussing the question as to adequacy or inadequacy of the pay is 22.96 cents for a car mile of service performed by a 60-foot car or its equivalent. There can be no reasonable doubt that this rate is entirely adequate. It is far above the "out-of-pocket" expense of the companies for carrying the mails, and not only covers the actual expense but the apportioned expense upon the basis of the car-foot miles of service performed for the mails and, in addition to that amount, furnishes a large surplus for the payment of the mails' share of the other expenses which railroad companies must pay out of revenues from the passenger service. This includes such items as rents for leases of other roads, hire of equipment, joint facilities, miscellaneous rent debits, sinking and redemption funds chargeable to income, interest on funded debt, and also dividends declared and appropriations for reserves. It is evident to everyone who has thought seriously upon the subject of mail pay that the Government should not participate in many of these expenses to as great an extent as the passenger service should.

This rate of 22.96 cents may be compared with—

(1) The estimated cost of performing the mail service;

(2) The estimated average revenue received by the railroad companies for a mile of service by a 60-foot passenger car; and

(3) The revenue received by the railroad companies from the express service for the same facility furnished.

COMPARISON WITH ESTIMATED COST.

The Post Office Department made an exhaustive inquiry as to the cost to the railroad companies of performing the mail service. The results of that inquiry are set forth in House Document No. 105, Sixty-second Congress, first session. In that inquiry the department charged against the mail service all the direct expenses reported by the railroad companies and apportioned to the mail service a share of all other passenger expenses, excepting those incurred for passenger service exclusively, on the basis of the proportion of car-foot miles in the mail service to the entire car-foot miles in the passenger service, including mail and express. As I shall mention hereafter, the department has shown that this is a most liberal apportionment to the mail service and participates to a larger extent in many of the items of expense than the railroad companies have a right to expect from the Government. However, the result of this ascertainment placed the operating expense of the entire service and the taxes at an average of 18.49 cents a car mile for a 60-foot car or its equivalent. In a mile rate of 22.96 cents this leaves a surplus of 4.47 cents a car mile, which is 24.17 per cent of the operating expenses and taxes. Even if the cost of operation and taxes were actually as high as 18.49 cents, this leaves a surplus which is ample to pay all the mails' share in other expenses payable out of revenues heretofore mentioned, such as rents, equipment, interest on funded debt, and dividends, sinking funds, and appropriations for reserves. Out of the estimated actual amount of money which will be received by the railroads under the provisions of this bill for 1915, including an estimated increase of 4 per cent on the total amount for the usual increase in service during the fiscal year, the bill would provide $49,474,042 for actual and apportioned operating expenses and taxes and a surplus of $11,960,464 to apply to these other charges, including interest on funded debt and dividends on stocks.

But the apportioned charges to the mail service above the estimated operating expenses and taxes were unquestionably much too high, because it compels the department to participate to a greater extent than it should in the general expenses of the passenger service. This fact was clearly pointed out by the Second Assistant Postmaster General in his testimony before the joint committee, on page 997 of the evidence, in which, having shown that the railroads, on a most liberal apportionment of cost, were receiving more in 1910 than such cost, he said as follows:

> Attention is further called to the fact that the above apportionment of expenses—other than operating expenses—chargeable to operating revenues is made to the mail service on the basis of 6.68 per cent of the passenger apportionment. Such a plan of apportionment makes the mail service participate in this ratio in all the passenger operating expenses included in the above account in addition to dividends. When it is remembered that these items cover the whole field of operating expenses chargeable to operating revenues for the maintenance and operation of the railroads, as well as interest on bonded indebtedness and dividends on capital invested in expensive terminal stations in large cities, it becomes evident that this charge against the mail service is too large. (A very great proportion of the physical value of railroads is concentrated in their terminals in large cities. * * * These are often constructed with special consideration to the convenience of passenger traffic and expressing architectural beauty. * * * The Pennsylvania terminal in New York cost $115,000,000; the Grand Central terminal, New York, $150,000,000; the Washington terminal, $20,000,000; the Northwestern terminal at Chicago, $24,000,000; the Union Station at Kansas City, $40,000,000.—Government Ownership of Railways, Samuel O. Dunn, pp. 65, 216, 217.) It is impossible to say from data at hand how much it is in excess of a fair charge. The charge against the mail service on these accounts should not be greater than the fair value of the use of the property represented by them, and which is employed in connection with the mail service. Neither the railroads nor the department have this information, but it is evident that it must be much smaller than the sum used in the above apportionment.

Again, on pages 1481 and following of the testimony, he pointed out the fact that on the item of car equipment alone a much larger proportion of the actual cost of the passenger train is included in the mail per cent of cost, representing the proportion of operating expenses and taxes to total operating expenses and taxes—based on car-foot mile ratio—than is justified by the relative values of the passenger equipment and the mail equipment.

It must appear evident to all who give the subject any study that in any apportionment of general expenses of passenger service to the mail service the mails should not be made to participate in all of them in the same ratio of car-foot miles. There are doubtless many millions of dollars represented in the one item of funded debt, interest upon which must be paid annually, in which the mail service has no concern whatever. This funded debt will not only represent actual value of property, but also any bonds issued for other purposes. Stocks upon which dividends are declared must include watered stocks and stocks the result of road manipulation as well as stocks which represent real investment.

A further comparison may be made with the estimated cost of the operation of passenger cars, although it will be evident that this comparison is not a true one, because the cost of operating passenger service must necessarily be much higher than the cost of operating mail service. The associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who has assisted the joint committee with their statistics, estimated in the hearings the cost for operating expenses for a passenger car-mile at 19.41 cents. Adding to this the taxes of 1.04 cents makes a total cost of 20.45 cents for a passenger car-mile. The bill proposes to pay the railroads at the rate of 22.73 cents a car-mile, which is 2.28 cents a car-mile, or over 11 per cent, in excess of the estimated cost of operation and taxes of a passenger car-mile.

COMPARISON BETWEEN TOTAL APPORTIONED COST AND TOTAL REVENUE RECEIVED FOR THE MAIL SERVICE.

The Post Office Department's ascertainment of estimated aggregate cost of the mail service, based upon the data reported to Congress in Document No. 105, was submitted to the joint committee by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and is found on pages 994 and following of the testimony taken before that body. The statement there is made in detail and shows not only the actual and apportioned cost to the mail service for operating expenses and the cost for taxes but the additional apportionment to the mail service upon the liberal basis referred to of all the other expenses which the railroad companies must pay out of operating revenues. This statement is made for the fiscal year 1910 and shows that upon this liberal apportionment the cost of the service was at that time $1,616,532 less than the revenue received by the railroad companies for that year. The department might have taken credit in that statement for $900,000 more in revenues paid the railroads on account of the land-grant deductions. These deductions were made for value received on account of grants of lands, and so forth, and therefore should have been considered as received for the mail service. This would have increased the surplus payment by $900,000.

The pending bill proposes to pay the railroads in the aggregate for 1915 under the new rates and plan more than the entire appropriation made by Congress for the fiscal year 1915 under the old system and old rates. If the ascertainment made by the department in 1910 be approximately correct—the railroad companies have never succeeded in materially modifying it—it must follow that even with the liberal apportionment of cost the provisions of this bill are extremely fair.

COMPARISON WITH ESTIMATED REVENUE FOR PASSENGER SERVICE.

The testimony before the joint committee shows that the Interstate Commerce Commission found the average passenger car-mile revenue to be 25.43 cents for the total number of railroads reporting in 1911. However, a recent publication by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the Text of the Twenty-fifth Annual Report on the Statistics of Railways in the United States for the Year Ended June 30, 1912, gives the latest figures in regard to the revenue to the railroads derived from passenger traffic. From this it is ascertained that the average car-mile revenue for passenger-train service is found to be 24.92 cents for the year ended June 30, 1912, which it will be noted is 0.51 cent less than the average passenger car-mile revenue in 1911. The pending bill proposes rates averaging 22.96 a car mile for mail service, which is only 1.96 cents per car mile less than the passenger car-mile rate for the year 1912, or a reduction under the passenger car-mile rate of only 7.86 per cent. The associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission testified before the joint committee that 10 per cent reduction would fairly represent the difference between the passenger service and the mail service. It will be seen that the rates in the pending bill provide for a reduction of only 7.86 per cent. It can not be denied that the Post Office Committee has been most liberal in readjusting these rates.

COMPARISON WITH REVENUE RECEIVED BY THE RAILROADS FROM THE EXPRESS SERVICE.

The Post Office Department submitted to the joint committee a body of facts and statistics in relation to the revenue received by the railroad companies from the express business which are of the greatest importance and worthy of serious consideration in connection with mail rates. These facts are set out in pages 1271 to 1280, inclusive, of the record of the testimony taken before the joint committee. The actual first-class express rates and the actual mail rates are there shown for the carriage of 40 pounds and 100 pounds between certain points, showing representative hauls throughout the country. Fifty per cent of the full express rate in each case, which is approximately the amount the railroad company receives for carrying the express matter, is compared with the mail rate. In almost every instance the mail rate is shown to be largely in excess of the revenue received by the railroad companies from the express.

Again, a comparison is made between the revenue received by the railroads for mail service and the revenue which they would receive for it if it were paid for at the same rate per ton-mile for which the roads carry express matter. The figures stated on page 1279 of that record have been slightly modified by corrections made by the department since the record was printed, and with these modifications it is shown that if the mail service had been carried at the same ton-mile rate which the roads receive for express service, the amount which the department would have paid in the fiscal year 1913 for mail service would have been $49,389,607 instead of $51,466,030 under the regular railroad mail rates. This comparison is made on express rates before they were reduced by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Another comparison was made upon the basis of an estimated per cent of that reduction, which made the amount $41,487,270 instead of the figures given above.

It must be remembered that there are differences between the mail service and the express service, and that the railroad companies do not perform in each case the same service. However, there is a certain similarity between those services, especially with reference to particular articles of transportation. The Second Assistant Postmaster General called attention in the hearings before the joint committee to these differences and called upon the representatives of the railroad companies to appraise them, but the hearings do not show that any appraisal in money value was submitted by the railroads.

In view of this comparison, however, there can be no reasonable doubt left that the rates submitted in this bill are entirely adequate and very fair to the railroad companies.

OTHER CONSIDERATIONS AS TO ADEQUACY OF RATE.

THE MAXIMUM CAR SPACE IN EITHER DIRECTION TO CONTROL PAY FOR THE ROUND TRIP.

The bill provides that in computing the car miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run is to be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon. It also provides that in computing the car miles of storage cars the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

These provisions give the railroad companies full pay for all deadhead movement of cars where they return empty or are not needed by the Post Office Department, except in the cases mentioned. These are very liberal provisions. Unlike other classes of service, the railroad companies know when the car is authorized and furnished that they will receive full pay provided by the statute for the return of the car, although the department may not have use for its full space. In no other class of service is this guaranteed, and the company can only secure the payment for the return movement by making the charge for the one-way movement high enough to cover it.

SURPLUS SPACE ABOVE DEPARTMENT'S NEEDS UP TO THE LENGTH OF THE CAR UNIT IS TO BE PAID FOR.

The provision of the bill in fixing the three units for lengths of cars—namely, 60 feet for full railway post-office cars and storage cars, and 30 and 15 feet for apartments in cars—are most liberal to the railroad companies, because they require payment for all surplus space above the actual needs of the department where such needs are less than the length of the next higher unit of car, with the exceptions named in the bill. It is estimated by the Post Office Department that a comparison between the actual needs for space in apartment cars at the present time and the total space in apartment cars of 15 and 30 feet in length, which will be required to fill the requisitions of the department, will show a surplus of unneeded space amounting to over 15,000,000 car miles per annum. In order to simplify the authorization and furnishing of cars the bill has provided for a less number of units of length than now exist in the service, but has very liberally provided for the payment of the extra space unless a company elects to furnish a car of the exact size needed by the department.

THE GOVERNMENT MIGHT CONSISTENTLY FIX RATES LOWER THAN COMMERCIAL RATES.

It will be noticed that the rates fixed in the bill are sufficiently high to place them on a strictly commercial basis. But the nature of the mail service and the transportation of the mails on railroads is of such a character as to fully justify Congress in fixing rates lower than strictly commercial rates if public policy demands it. There are certain considerations which would justify this if it is thought advisable to give them sufficient weight. These may be briefly referred to under the following headings:

1. The certainty, constancy, and homogeneity of traffic.
2. The certainty and regularity of payment.
3. Railroads are not built primarily to carry mails.
4. The protection to their mail trains which railroads, as Government agencies, receive against unlawful acts in interference with or obstruction of the mails carried.
5. The principle of public utility.

The facts and arguments under each of these headings are set forth in detail by the Second Assistant Postmaster General in his brief submitted to the joint committee on January 16, 1914, and may be found published in full on pages 998 to 1005, inclusive, in the record of the hearings before that committee.

DETAILED STATEMENT OF RAILWAY MAIL PAY UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF THE BILL AS AMENDED.

The following statement shows in detail the different classes of service and the estimated pay for the same under the provisions of the bill as amended and as computed by the Post Office Department. The appropriations for 1915 for railroad transportation and railway post-office cars aggregate $61,600,000. The statement shows an estimated cost to the Government of slightly in excess of this, but the department will no doubt be able to effect economies so as to not exceed the appropriations.

STANDARD SIZES FOR FULL AND APARTMENT CARS.

The recommendation of the department to the joint committee was for the adoption of cars of sizes conforming to those now in use and authorized in the service. The law now authorizes full railway post-office cars of 40, 50, 55, and 60 feet in length. There is no specific payment authorized for apartment cars, but these cars are authorized by the department as they are needed, and in the present service conform to various sizes, ranging from 10 to 30 feet, the usual variation being 5 feet between each principal size.

The advantages of a smaller number of units were presented to the joint committee through the suggestion of Representative LLOYD in the first instance and were extensively discussed by the officers of the department and others who gave testimony before the joint committee. The officers of the department did not at first favor the reduction of the number of units for the reason that such a plan would necessarily require the authorization of more space, particularly in the apartment-car service, than would be immediately needed. The question, however, was approached by the department's officers with open minds, and in order to meet as nearly as consistent with the interest of the public service the views generally insisted upon before the joint committee finally agreed at the hearings before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to a provision fixing the unit for full cars at 60 feet and for apartment cars at 30 and 15 feet, with a suitable proviso as embodied in the bill which gives the department the opportunity of accepting and paying for a less length of apartment car where the company has a car of less length than the standard size, and such car meets all the needs of the department. Provision is also made for utilizing any surplus space in the full car for the purpose of caring for storage mails. These provisions meet the objections the department originally had against the lesser number of units.

EXPLANATIONS OF SECTION 13.

SEC. 13. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from July 1, 1914, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

This paragraph authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to readjust the compensation for transporting and handling the mails and furnishing facilities and services under the conditions and at the rates named in the subsequent paragraphs of the bill. This is the usual introductory paragraph of authorization.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, and closed-pouch service.

This amended paragraph provides for stating railroad mail routes and for authorizing mail service on such routes of any one or all of the four classes of service named in the paragraph.

Full railway post-office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post-office cars shall be for standard-sized cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

This describes full railway post-office car mail service and fixes a car of 60 feet in length as the standard for authorizations in this class of service, except as otherwise provided on lines 13 to 25, on page 12 of the bill.

Full railway post-office cars are cars exclusively used by the Post Office Department for the carriage of mails and their receipt, distribution, and delivery en route between termini. Their operation requires the hauling of an additional car in the train, and in this respect differs from apartment railway post-office car service, wherein a portion of a baggage car is partitioned off and fitted up for distribution purposes, the remainder of the car being usually occupied and used by the railroad company for its own purposes.

Under the present plan of adjusting compensation for railroad mail service additional compensation beyond that received for the transportation of the mails on a weight basis may be allowed for full railway post-office car service performed in cars 40 feet or more in length at rates varying with the size of car needed and used. The statutes authorizing additional compensation for railway post-office car service, fixing rates of pay therefor, and prescribing the conditions under which such additional compensation may be allowed are contained in sections 1329 to 1333 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, 1913 (Rev. Stat., 4004, and subsequent acts), and reads as follows:

SEC. 1329. Additional pay may be allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars, at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length, and $30 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for 50 foot cars, and $50 per mile per annum for 55 to 60 foot cars.

2. After July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length, and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $32.50 per mile per annum for 50-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length.

NOTE.—This statute does not authorize a pro rata compensation to be paid for cars which are less than 40 feet in length.

SEC. 1330. All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, and lighted by and at the expense of the railroad companies.

NOTE.—This statute supplements Revised Statutes, section 4005. Section 1333 prescribes different articles that shall be included in the equipment of a car.

SEC. 1331. After the 1st of July, 1911, no pay shall be allowed for the use of any wooden full railway post-office car, unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars or between the engine and a steel car adjoining, and that hereafter additional cars accepted for this service shall be of steel, or with steel underframe, if used in a train in which a majority of the cars are of like construction: Provided further, That after the 1st of July, 1916, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or with steel underframe, if such post-office car is used in a train in which a majority of the cars are of steel or of steel underframe construction.

SEC. 1332. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the railway post-office cars of a railroad company not conforming to the provisions of this act shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies after the passage of this act shall be constructed of steel.

2. No part of this amount shall be paid for the use of any car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned.

NOTE.—The word "amount" in paragraph 2 refers to the appropriation for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. Similar provisions were contained in the appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1912 and 1913.

SEC. 1333. * * * When any railroad company fail or refuse to provide railway post-office cars when required by the Post Office Department, or shall fail or refuse to provide suitable safety heaters and saftey lamps therefor, with such number of saws and axes to each car for use in case of accident as may be required by the Post Office Department, said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent on the rates fixed (by law). * * * (See sec. 1317.)

Apartment railway post-office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed and fitted up and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post-office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

This paragraph describes apartment railway post-office car service and fixes two standard sizes of apartments which may be authorized and paid for—15 and 30 feet in length, respectively. Apartment-car service is the carriage of mails in apartments in cars less than 40 feet in length and the receipt, distribution, and delivery of mails therefrom en route between termini. Ordinarily the performance of this class of service does not necessitate the operation of an additional car by the railroad company, inasmuch as the apartment is a portion of a baggage car partitioned off and fitted up for postal purposes, the remainder of the car being utilized by the company for the carriage of baggage, express, or other purposes.

Under present law no specific payment is allowed for apartment-car service, it being the theory of the statute that the rates of pay therein fixed for transportation, based on weight, were intended to fully cover the facilities furnished by apartment cars.

The purpose of fixing two standard sizes of apartment cars is to take care of the varying service conditions on different lines. At present there are a number of standard sizes of apartment cars—9 feet, 12 feet, 15 feet, 20 feet, 25 feet, and 30 feet. This bill reduces the number to two sizes, but makes provision further along for payment for cars of lesser length than that authorized at pro rata of the pay for the authorized standard lengths in cases where the company operates such cars and they are deemed adequate for the purposes of the department.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars on trains upon which full railway post-office cars or apartment railway post-office cars are not operated.

The foregoing paragraph defines storage-car mail service, provides that authorizations shall be for cars 60 feet in length, except as otherwise provided, and provides also that less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized under certain conditions.

Storage-car mail service is the carriage of mails in bulk between large centers, and differs materially from the two classes of service just described. No special type of car is necessary, all the interior fittings that are required being stanchions for separating and piling mails for different deliveries. They carry heavier loads than the full cars and apartment cars, but as the number of points of receipt and delivery is limited as compared with the number of points of receipt and delivery in the full-car and apartment-car services, the handling en route is much less in the case of a storage car.

The purpose of the proviso to the paragraph is to cover cases where a quantity of mail is required to be carried in a baggage car, but which is not sufficient to necessitate the running of a storage car. In such cases the actual space used will be authorized and paid for at pro rata of the rate otherwise fixed in the bill for a 60-foot storage car.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department, as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried.

This paragraph is virtually a repetition of existing laws and regulations, varying only slightly in language to conform to the provisions of the bill, and is self-explanatory.

Closed-pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

The closed-pouch service, as described in this paragraph, is the transportation and handling of locked pouches and sacks of mail upon trains upon which no railway post-office car service is performed. The mails on such trains are in the charge of railroad employees and are usually limited in amount and weight. It is proposed to continue payment for this class of service upon the weight basis, as providing a more equitable compensation as between trains than the space basis would provide. The amount of this mail carried on different trains varies widely.

Side and transfer mail service shall be the transportation of mails between railroad stations and post offices supplied therefrom and between railroad stations.

The amendment provides for striking out this paragraph—lines 13, 14, and 15 on page 11 of the bill.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

For apartment railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 10½ cents for each mile of service by a 30-foot apartment car, and 5¼ cents for each mile of service by a 15-foot apartment car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car, and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

For storage-car mail service at not exceeding 20 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

This provision, as amended, states the basis for payment for the several classes of service authorized in the bill. It provides car-mile line rates for the haulage of the cars and initial and terminal rates for trips of cars to compensate for the expenses incurred at terminals in maintaining, cleaning, heating, lighting, and loading the cars. The line rate for full railway post-office cars is fixed at not exceeding 21 cents for each car-mile of service of a 60-foot car, and the initial and terminal rate at not exceeding $4 for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car, or $8 for the round trip. The apartment-car line and terminal rates are fixed at pro rata of the rates for full cars, except that in the case of 15-foot apartments the line rate is made a quarter of a cent higher. The storage-car line rate is stated at not exceeding 20 cents for each 60-foot car-mile of service and the terminal rates at not exceeding $4 for a one-way trip of a 60-foot car, or $8 for the round trip.

After the department had submitted evidence as to the cost to the railroad companies of transporting the mails and it was found that an effort to ascertain this cost periodically and base the mail pay thereon would be extremely difficult, and it having appeared that the ascertained cost per car-mile of service was less than the average revenue for a passenger car-mile, a suggestion was made to the joint committee which met with general approval, that the revenue for a passenger car-mile be taken as the basis for a mail rate and that such passenger car-mile revenue be appropriately reduced for that purpose.

It has been ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission that the average passenger car-mile revenue for the railroads reporting in 1911 was a little more than 25 cents. It was suggested that the difference between the mail service and the passenger service might be expressed by 10 per cent in the passenger car-mile revenue. Ten per cent from the 25 cents would leave 22½ cents as a mail rate. This bill provides on the average 22.96 cents, including all classes of service.

The line rate of 21 cents—exclusive of the terminal rate—has been fixed for a 60-foot full railway post-office car and a pro rata of the same rate has been provided for space in apartment cars, except that in the case of 15-foot apartments the line rate is made a quarter of a cent higher. The apartment cars are fitted up and furnished practically the same as the full cars. An apartment car is one which is ordinarily run by the railroad company for its own purposes—that is, they take a baggage car and partition off a certain part for the use of the Post Office Department and ordinarily use the remainder for their own purposes. This would suggest a lower rate than pro rata for the portion assigned to the mail service. However, it is claimed that under some circumstances the companies are compelled to furnish an additional car where the department only needs a part of it. Therefore it seems a fair compromise to give a rate proportional to the full-car rate for the apartment furnished, and the committee believed that in consideration of the small railroads the rate on 15-foot apartments might be made a little higher.

For the storage car the bill provides a line rate of 20 cents a car mile (exclusive of the terminal rate). This is 1 cent a car mile less than the rate for a full railway post-office car. A storage car is not one which is fitted up, furnished, and maintained in the same manner and for the same purposes as a full car. It does not have to be heated, iced, and cleaned as does a full car, nor is it fitted up with distribution cases as such a car is. Furthermore, the service performed by the railroad company in handling the mails that are carried in a storage car is much less than that performed in handling mails which are worked in a distribution car and received and delivered at every station on the line.

In addition to the line rate on the storage cars an initial and terminal charge is provided for, which covers the cost of switching the car, cleaning and lighting it, and loading and unloading the mails at the terminals.

The terminal rate for full cars and apartment cars are uniform, the apartment-car rates being pro rata of those fixed for the full car; the rate for storage cars is the same as for full cars.

Where authorizations are made for cars of the standard lengths of 60, 30, and 15 feet, as provided by this act, and the railroad company is unable to furnish such cars of the length authorized, but furnishes cars of lesser length than those authorized, but which are determined by the department to be sufficient for the service, the

Postmaster General may accept the same and pay only for the actual space furnished and used, the compensation to be not exceeding pro rata of that provided by this act for the standard length so authorized: Provided, That the Postmaster General may accept cars and apartments of greater length than those of the standard requested, but no compensation shall be allowed for such excess lengths.

The purpose of this provision is to assist in adapting the provision of the new law to existing conditions in the service. Under the practices heretofore followed, cars of a great variety of lengths have been constructed by the companies and are still in the service. It has only been within the past few years that uniformity in such matters has obtained to any extent. It seems probable that it may not be practicable in every case for a company to furnish the standard-sized car that may be authorized upon a train, but it possesses a car of greater or lesser length which is sufficient for the needs on that train and prefers to operate such car rather than incur the expense of constructing a new car of the authorized size. This provision authorizes the Postmaster General to accept such cars and pay for their operation at pro rata of the rates allowable for the authorized length in the case of cars of lesser length run. For cars run of greater length than needed it is provided that no compensation shall be paid for the excess lengths.

For closed-pouch service on routes upon which closed-pouch service only is performed, at not exceeding the rates of compensation provided by existing law for average daily weights of mail carried over the whole route; on routes upon which apartment railway post-office car and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $20 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried, and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weight greater or less than 2,000 pounds; and on routes upon which full railway post-office car and closed-pouch services or full railway post-office car, apartment-car, and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $19 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weights greater or less than 2,000 pounds, the average daily weights to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails.

This provides for payment for closed-pouch service. As amended it provides for paying the present rates for weights of mails carried on routes upon which closed-pouch service alone is performed—that is, where there is no full or apartment car service. On routes upon which apartment railway post office and closed-pouch services are performed, and those upon which full railway post office car service and closed-pouch service, or full railway post-office, apartment-car, and closed-pouch services are performed, it provides for paying practically the present rates—that is, $20 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight in the first case and $19 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight in the second case. These are the average of top rates now paid for weights carried on these two classes of routes.

For side and transfer mail service the Postmaster General is authorized to provide, in his discretion, by regulation screen or other wagon, automobile, or mail messenger service under existing law, or to contract with the railroad company, after advertisement, for the performance of any or all service on its route. Postmasters at post offices of the third and fourth classes shall be eligible as contractors for this service.

The amendment strikes out all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 on page 13 and lines 1 and 2 on page 14, and substitutes in lieu thereof the following:

The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise; and the Postmaster General may relieve the railroads of such service in his discretion.

The amended provision continues the present laws and regulations with respect to the performance of side, transfer, and terminal mail messenger service, and authorizes the Postmaster General to relieve the small roads of this service when its cost to them is burdensome.

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act.

This amended provision is the same as existing law in every respect. The present law, however, only applies to the compensation for transportation, while this provision covers all rail mail service.

The initial and terminal rates provided for herein shall cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, lighting, heating, cleaning mail cars, and all other expenses incidental to station service and required by the Postmaster General in connection with the mails that are not included in the car-mile rate. The allowance for full railway post-office cars, apartment railway post-office cars, and storage cars may be varied in accordance with the approximate difference in their respective cost of construction and maintenance.

This defines the expenses to be covered by the initial and terminal rates provided by the bill, and provides that such rates applicable to the several classes of cars may be varied in accordance with their respective difference in cost.

For the purpose of ascertaining the average weight of closed-pouch mails per day upon which to adjust compensation, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to have such mails carried on the several routes weighed by the employees of the Post Office Department for such a number of successive days, not less than 35, at such times after July 1, 1914, as he may direct, and not less frequently than once in every year thereafter, the result to be stated and certified in such form and manner as he may direct. In computing the average weight of mails per day carried on a railroad route, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor. The expenses of taking the weights of mails and the compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings, for assistance in completing computations, and of rental, if necessary, in Washington, D. C., shall be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

This paragraph makes provision for taking the weights of mails on closed-pouch trains for the purpose of ascertaining the average daily weight upon which to base rate of compensation. It is similar in terms to the present law, except that it provides for an annual instead of a quadrennial weighing, for a period of 35 instead of 90 days, and fixes the whole number of days in the weighing period as the divisor in computing the average daily weight. This is the same rule regarding the divisor that is now applied, and has been sustained by the Court of Claims.

In computing the car miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

This provision is a recognition of the equity and justice of the claim that where the department requires a full car, or a part of a car, to be fitted up and furnished and placed in a railroad train and operated for the purposes of the department, that it should pay for the return movement of the car, if it be not used by the railroad company.

In computing the car miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

Under the present weight basis of compensation the railroads receive pay for the weight carried in storage cars on any given route fixed in accordance with the average daily weight on the route, determined by weights taken during the weighing period of 105 days. As the preponderance of the mail movement is usually in a westerly or southerly direction, the empty return movement of storage cars to the east and north is considerable. It is claimed by the railroads that it is not practicable in many cases to make use for their purposes such cars, and that their return empty to point of origin is necessary to maintain the service. In line with the principle recognized in the preceding paragraph with respect to full and apartment car movement, it seems logical and equitable to make provision to pay for storage-car service in both directions, unless the company uses the car for its own purposes in the return movement, it being ascertained that the returning cars are utilized to some extent by the companies for services other than mail.

It will, no doubt, be found practicable to utilize the empty return storage cars for the shipment of empty equipment, postal supplies, and so forth, particularly the former, which naturally moves in greatest volume in the direction in which the empty storage cars are being returned.

New service and additional service may be authorized at not exceeding the rates herein provided, and service may be reduced or discontinued with pro rata reductions in pay, as the needs of the Postal Service may require: Provided, That no additional pay shall be allowed for additional closed-pouch service on established routes until the next regular readjustment of pay therefor on such routes, and no additional pay shall be allowed for additional car service unless specifically authorized by the Postmaster General.

The paragraph is to make provision for payment for new and additional service and for suitable pro rata reductions in pay for reduced or discontinued service, and is necessary in the administration of the plan.

All cars, or parts of cars, used for the railroad mail service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction, and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe, or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railroad company not conforming to these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. Until July 1, 1917, in cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

The foregoing provision relating to the construction, heating, cleaning, lighting, and sanitation of cars is a reproduction of the existing laws on the subject, with the exception of that part beginning with the word "until," in line 9 of page 17, and continuing to the end of the paragraph, which is new, and which is added for the purpose of authorizing the Postmaster General to secure adequate service in emergencies when the regular equipment is insufficient to meet the needs of the service, as during the holiday season. For the laws now in force, see statement under paragraph relating to railway post-office cars.

Service over property owned or controlled by another company or a terminal company shall be considered service of the railroad company using such property and not that of the other or terminal company: Provided, That service over a land-grant road shall be paid for as herein provided.

The purpose is to provide for authorizing service at these rates into the large terminals such as New York, Washington, Boston, Chicago, or St. Louis, and it avoids the necessity for paying an exorbitant rate to a terminal company to get the mails into a large city.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation, when required by the Postmaster General.

In this paragraph are combined existing laws and regulations regarding the services to be required of the railroad companies in connection with mail service.

The present laws and regulations are as follows:

SEC. 1330. All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner, as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, and lighted by and at the expense of the railroad companies.

NOTE.—This statute supplements Revised Statutes, section 4005. Section 1333 prescribes different articles that shall be included in the equipment of a car.

SEC. 1341. The rate of compensation for the transportation of mail on railroads is computed upon the average weight of mail per day carried the whole length of the route. It is essential that the mail be carried with due frequency and speed; also that suitable apartments, equipped with necessary fixtures and furniture, properly lighted and heated, provided with ice water, and built in accordance with plans and specifications furnished by the General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service, shall be provided for railway postal clerks to accompany and distribute the mail when required.

2. Railroad companies, at stations where transfer clerks are employed, shall provide suitable and sufficient rooms for handling and storing the mails, and without specific charge therefor. These rooms shall be lighted, heated, furnished, supplied with ice water, and kept in order by the railroad company.

3. The specific requirements of the service as to due frequency and speed, space required on trains or at stations, fixtures, furniture, etc., shall be determined by the Post Office Department and made known through the General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service.

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails, and when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

This paragraph expresses the present laws and regulations governing the duty of the railroad companies in the transportation of persons in charge of the mails and agents and officers of the department while traveling on official business.

The laws and regulations are as follows:

SEC. 1337. Every railway company carrying the mail shall carry on any train which may run over its road, and without extra charge therefor, all mailable matter directed to be carried thereon, with the person in charge of the same.

NOTE.—This section contemplates the carrying of mails on any train with or without an employee of the Postal Service in charge.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 1339. Railroad companies are required to convey upon any train, without specific charge therefor, all mail bags, post-office blanks, stationery, supplies, and all duly accredited agents of the Post Office Department and post-office inspectors upon the exhibition of their credentials.

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

This provision corresponds with existing law, with the exception that the latter fixes the penalty with respect to full railway post-office cars at 10 per cent of the rates "hereinafter provided," and that has been construed to mean the rates fixed by law for transportation.

The present law is expressed in section 1333 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, as follows:

SEC. 1333. * * * When any railroad company fail or refuse to provide railway post-office cars when required by the Post Office Department, or shall fail or refuse to provide suitable safety heaters and safety lamps therefor, with such number of saws and axes to each car for use in case of accident as may be required by the Post Office Department, said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent on the rates fixed (by law) * * *. (See sec. 1317.)

The Postmaster General shall in all cases decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed. Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and with due speed all mailable matter, equipment, and supplies directed to be carried thereon. If any such railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, equipment, and supplies when required by the Postmaster General on any train or trains it operates, such company shall be fined such reasonable amount as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

Several provisions of existing law are comprised in this paragraph, slightly modified, and with a provision added providing that the Postmaster General shall fine railroad companies such reasonable amount for failure or refusal of such companies to comply with the requirements as he deems proper.

The laws and regulations are as follows:

SEC. 1336. The Postmaster General shall, in all cases, decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed.

SEC. 1337. Every railway company carrying the mail shall carry on any train which may run over its road, and without extra charge therefor, all mailable matter directed to be carried thereon, with the person in charge of the same.

NOTE.—This section contemplates the carrying of mails on any train with or without an employee of the Postal Service in charge.

SEC. 1338. * * * If any railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, when required by the Post Office Department, upon the fastest train or trains run upon said road, said company shall have its pay reduced 50 per cent of the amount provided by law.

SEC. 1486. The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of contractors for failures to perform service according to contract and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed, and not exceeding three times the price if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the contractor or carrier.

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of railroad companies carrying the mails under the provisions of this act for reduction in service or in frequency of service where, in his judgment, the importance of the facilities withdrawn or reduced requires it and impose fines upon them for delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the value of the service in cases where it is not performed, and not exceeding three times its value if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the railroad company.

This paragraph substantially follows the present law relating to fines and deductions, which is contained in section 3962, Revised Statutes, as follows:

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of contractors for failures to perform service according to contract and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed, and not exceeding three times the price if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the contractor or carrier.

The proposed paragraph relates specifically to railroad mail service and will not repeal the present law so far as other mail transportation service is concerned.

The provisions of this act shall apply to service operated by railroad companies, partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

This is the same as existing law and is necessary to cover certain cases where service on a route is by rail and water.

The existing law is expressed in section 1315 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, as follows:

SEC. 1315. The Postmaster General shall arrange the railway routes on which the mail is carried, including those in which the service is partly by railway and partly by steamboat, into three classes, according to the size of the mails, the speed at which they are carried, and the frequency and importance of the service, so that each railway company shall receive, as far as practicable, a proportionate and just rate of compensation, according to the service performed.

The provisions of this act respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This provides for the continuance of what is known as the blue-tag mails—that is, the periodical mails of second class that are transported in fast freight trains in carload lots between certain large cities.

This method of transporting periodical mail published less frequently than weekly and which does not carry news matter, where it can be handled in carload lots between the large centers of the second and third contract sections, has proven entirely practicable and satisfactory, and saves approximately $1,500,000 a year on railroad mail pay.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit under oath, when and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

This paragraph provides for the rendering and submission under oath of evidence of the performance of service, and conforms to the present practice and regulation.

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

This is the present law, modified so as to apply to the purposes of the proposed law. The present act provides that he may employ special assistance and rent quarters in Washington, in connection with the readjustments of pay based on the results of the weighings, and this provision is intended to accomplish the same purpose.

The law is as follows:

Out of the appropriation for inland mail transportation the Postmaster General is authorized hereafter to pay rental if necessary in Washington, D. C., and compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings for assistance in completing computations, in connection with the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes, as provided by law. (Act of March 4, 1911; 36 Stat., 1334.)

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

This provision is directed to the ascertainment of a rate which the railroad companies would derive from the carrying of express matter that is analogous in character and method of transporting to mail matter. In other words, it provides that the Postmaster General may secure from the Interstate Commerce Commission, from time to time, information as to the revenue which railroad companies receive from express companies for carrying matter analogous and similar to mail matter and under similar conditions.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

This provision is intended to give the Postmaster General authority to secure carload and less-than-carload rates for the transportation of fourth-class matter and on periodicals, and to arrange for carload or less-than-carload shipments of such matter and their transportation at such rates.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals, when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

The purpose of this paragraph is to enable the Postmaster General to secure a lower rate for a less frequent movement of a car carrying parcel-post or periodical matter. The department might be able to arrange for a faster movement than freight for a carload lot of matter and a less frequent movement than on every train that travels. Now, the policy is to put mail on every train that runs, and, so far as parcel post is concerned, there is no necessity for doing that. If there is reasonable frequency between points in the carriage of parcel post, that is all the public would ask for. If a movement of this kind can be secured at a less rate under those conditions it would be very desirable.

The Postmaster General is authorized to return to the mails, when practicable for the utilization of car space paid for and not needed for the mails, postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the Postal Service.

In the storage-car movement there will be cases where cars will come back practically empty, as, for instance, between New York and Chicago, where they go out from New York loaded and come back empty. Unless an agreement is secured from the railroad company for payment in one direction only or unless the company itself uses that car coming back, the department must pay for the return movement, and it is proposed to utilize such empty return movement for the carriage of empty equipment and supplies moving in the direction of the light movement of mail. This provision will enable the department to put the equipment that ordinarily would go by freight into these cars, thus utilizing the otherwise unused return empty space and save freight charges. By this means probably the larger part of appropriation for freight on empty equipment of $510,000 may be saved.

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and, where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this act, to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

This is the present law permitting the return to the mails, in cases of emergency, of empty mail bags and other equipment, except that it changes the period during which such action may be taken from November 15 to January 15 of any year to from October 1 to April 1 of any year. This extension is believed advisable in order to provide for emergencies that may arise during the winter season, when the mails are unusually heavy.

The law on the subject now reads as follows:

SEC. 1317, par. 9. The Postmaster General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country, immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and thereafter such postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express.

And the Postmaster General in cases of emergency, between November 15 and January 15 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

The Postmaster General may have the weights of mail taken on railroad mail routes and computations of the average loads of the several classes of cars and other computations for statistical and administrative purposes made at such times as he may elect, and pay the expense thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

This provision is self-explanatory and extends authority to the Postmaster General to collect and tabulate statistics for adminisrative purposes and to pay the expense thereof.

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

Land-grant railroads are under perpetual contract with the Government to carry the mails. Congress has not specifically legislated requiring other railroads to carry the mails. It not infrequently occurs that railroad companies other than land-grant companies threaten the Post Office Department to refuse to carry the mails under the present conditions and rates prescribed by law. Sometimes these threats come from companies operating large mail service. In other instances they are from smaller lines. In every case the Postmaster General and the officers in immediate charge of railroad mail service under him have difficulty in inducing the companies to continue the service, and in some cases, where the refusal is absolute, the department is put to great inconvenience and large expense to supply a substitute service, which is never satisfactory to the patrons of the mails. These instances of threat and refusal have become more frequent in recent years as railroad attorneys and agents and those advocating higher rates of pay for railroad service have induced the managements to believe that they should receive more money for service.

The rates should be made adequate, as they are believed to be in this bill, and Congress should provide that it is the duty of railroad companies to carry the mails.

The Constitution confers upon Congress the right to establish post offices and post roads. Congress has declared all railroads to be post roads. The carriage of the mails is a governmental function, and the Supreme Court has decided that a railroad carrying the mails is performing a governmental function and is an agency of the Post Office Department. The courts have also decided that railroads, in carrying the mails, are not acting as common carriers. Nevertheless, they enjoy certain high privileges and rights which are conferred upon them by State legislatures and are amenable to the Federal Government in the matter of interstate commerce. It should not be possible that they may refuse to act for the Government in the carriage of the mails. Under the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress with respect to mails and the postal establishment, it would seem to be clear that it is competent for that body to make the carriage of the mails obligatory upon the railroads.

SEC. 14. That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service, by the act of March 9, 1914, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, are hereby available for the purposes of this act.

This paragraph makes the unexpended balances of the appropriations for 1915 for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service applicable to the provision of this bill.

These appropriations are as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes	$56,188,000
For railway post-office car service	5,412,000
Total	61,600,000

SEC. 15. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The usual repealing clause of laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provision of the bill.

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENTS.

The bill as reported from the committee provides that the railroad companies shall be relieved from side and terminal service where now performing it and that the department shall make provision for it. The department estimates that this will cost it $2,118,000 for the fiscal year 1915. However, I understand that the railroad companies have claimed before the joint committee that it does not cost them more than $500,000 to take care of this service.

If this be true, I see no ample justification for shifting the burden to the Government at an increased cost. It appears to me to be entirely consistent to leave this side and terminal service with the railroad companies.

There are those who are insisting upon higher rates of pay for the line service of postal and storage cars than those which are reported in the bill from the committee. Among these are members of the joint committee, although they have not yet made a formal report nor submitted a bill. The officers of the Post Office Department feel that the rates reported in the bill are amply justified by the facts, and I myself feel that the railroad mail pay as it now exists is high enough. There is, however, a spirit of cooperation which prompts an endeavor to meet the views expressed, providing the public interest is not sacrificed.

I propose to offer amendments, therefore, which will leave the side and terminal service where it is now and continue its performance by the railroad companies, as it can be performed by them more economically than by the Government, giving authority, however, to the Postmaster General to relieve the small roads of the performance of that service where the cost of the same is a substantial burden to them, and also to offer other amendments which add 1 cent to the line rate for 60-foot railway post-office cars, a half cent to the line rate for 30-foot apartment cars, that being a proportional increase, and a half cent to the line rate for 15-foot apartment cars, that being a quarter of a cent in excess of the proportional part, and to also add 2 cents to the line rate for a 60-foot storage car. On the closed-pouch service the bill provides for 95 per cent of the present rate for certain lines. The amendments will restore the full rate for these lines in consideration of the endeavor to assist the small roads as much as practicable, consistent with public interest. These amendments are agreed to by the committee.

These changes will, according to the estimate of the department, and allowing 4 per cent for increase for additional facilities for the fiscal year 1915, make a cost to the Government for railroad mail pay of $62,218,566. The appropriation for the service for 1915, including both transportation and car pay, is $61,600,000. Consequently this estimate is $618,566 in excess of the appropriations made. The department hopes to effect economies which will bring the cost within the appropriation.

APARTMENT-CAR RATES.

The department submitted its recommendation to the joint committee for a proportionately lower rate on apartment cars than on full cars, and insisted upon this difference at the hearings before that committee on the ground that the apartment furnished by the railroads to the department for mail service is a part of a car—usually a baggage car—which the railroad company runs for its own convenience, using for its own purposes the remainder of the car, while a full car is one which the company furnishes for the entire use of the department and does not use any of it for its own purposes.

However, it was claimed by the railroads that at times they were compelled to furnish an additional car to the train to fill the requirements of the department for apartment space. It was also argued before the joint committee that the wholesale and retail principle should apply to apartment-car service, and that therefore the department should pay a proportionately higher rate for apartments in cars than for the same space in full cars. These higher rates have been urged upon the department by members of the joint committee, and in consideration of these representations the department agreed to make the rates for apartment-car service proportionately the same as for full-car service—that is, one-half the rate for a 30-foot apartment as for a full 60-foot car and one-fourth the rate for a 15-foot apartment as for a full 60-foot car—and the present bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads adopted that principle.

However, further consideration of this matter by the committee has resulted in increasing the line rate for 15-foot apartments slightly above pro rata, adding one-fourth per cent a car mile more than the proportional part of the 21 cents for the full car. This was done in consideration of the small lines, where the only car service would be but a small apartment.

APPENDIX A.

PUBLISHED RATES CREDITED TO THE COMMITTEE.

The joint committee considering this matter have not yet made an official report. However, in the Railway Age Gazette of June 12, 1914, a periodical published in the interest of railroads, there is a statement purporting to give rates which are favored by the committee. This statement includes the following:

The bill establishes four standards for compensation. The first unit is the 60 foot car, the second the 30-foot car or compartment, the third the 15-foot compartment, and the fourth the closed-pouch service. The rates are based on two elements, covering two distinct services. The first is the line charge, based on the car mile, the other the terminal charge, covering loading and unloading, cleaning cars and switching, for each of which operations a sum fixed by the law will be paid in addition to the line charge. For a 60-foot car the rate will be 21 cents a mile, and there will be a terminal or transfer charge of $8.50 the round trip; a 30-foot car, 11 cents per car mile and $5.50 the round trip; a 15-foot car, 6 cents per car mile and $4.20 the round trip; closed-pouch space, 3 cents per car mile and $1.20 per round trip.

The article referred to states, further, that these are the features of the "Bourne committee" and that they are embodied in a bill introduced in the House by a member of that committee on June 4 and are the results of the committee's deliberations. While no such bill has been introduced in the House and it is understood the Member who is credited with its introduction disclaims all responsibility for the article, it is further understood that the information was given out to the press by the chairman of that committee in anticipation of the introduction of a bill. A computation has been made by the department as to the effect on railroad mail pay of these rates. The result shows that for the same items mentioned in the department's estimate of cost under the bill before the House the cost to the Government would be $73,642,193 under the terms published in this statement. They would pay a rate of 26.43 cents a car mile for the equivalent of a 60-foot car for the line and terminal service. This is 1 cent a car mile higher than the estimated average revenue for a car mile in the passenger service for 1911 and 1.51 cents higher than for 1912. This is $12,042,193 more than the appropriation for the service for 1915.

The detailed statement of the application of these rates is given in the following table. These rates, however, are not approved by the House members of the Joint Committee on Railway Mail Pay:

Previous to 1880 the appropriation for railway post-office cars was not stated separately from that for railroad transportation.

APPENDIX C.

In the House of Representatives, July 29, 1914. Mr. MOON introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ARTICLE XVIII.

"SECTION 1. That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person to be appointed or elected or chosen to an office or position or service of any kind under the authority of the United States or any State of the Union for life or for a term of service longer than 15 years in duration.

"SEC. 2. That hereafter all judicial officers of the United States inferior in jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, all United States marshals, United States district attorneys, United States revenue collectors, and postmasters shall be elected by the legally qualified voters of the State, district, or civil subdivision thereof in which they shall by law be required to serve. Congress shall fix the districts, terms of service, and the time, place, and manner for holding such elections, and make all other needful laws and regulations to enforce this amendment."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr SAMUEL W. SMITH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I congratulate the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] on the eloquence he has displayed in talking about ancient history. I do not blame the Democrats in the House for swarming around him now and shaking his hands, for I presume he has told them something about which they have never read or which, if they have ever read, they have forgotten. But I understand that the subject we are here discussing is what we are going to pay the railroad companies of the United States for carrying the mails. And in this connection I want to congratulate the commission appointed by the chairman of the Post Office Committee, who investigated the necessity for a revision of the railway mail pay. I think it has been conceded by everybody who understands anything whatever about the question that the railroads have not been getting as much compensation for carrying the mails as they should receive. And in the consideration of what ought to be done in order to do justice both to the Government and the railroads the commission, although it has not reported formally, has reached a conclusion with which in the main the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads quite agree.

The present railway mail pay amounts approximately to $55,000,000 annually. And allowing 4 per cent per annum for increased weights carried would bring the pay of the railroads for the transportation of mails up to about $57,500,000 or $58,000,000.

The committee on railway mail pay formulated a plan which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has substantially adopted, which provides that henceforth the railroad companies shall be paid for space and mileage, rather than for weight of mail carried. The bill before the House contemplates the payment of a sum less than will be proposed to be paid by the committee when the pending amendments are injected into the bill.

I believe the committee on railway mail pay have reached the conclusion that the railroads should be paid 21 cents a car mile for a full railway post-office car, 11 cents a mile for a half railway post-office car, 6 cents a mile for a quarter of a railway post-office car, and 20 cents a mile for a storage car.

In addition to these mileage charges a recommendation has been made by the committee—and concurred in, I believe, by members of the commission—that on a full railroad post-office car there shall be terminal charges allowed amounting to $8 for every round trip on a full car, $4 for every round trip on a half car, and $2 on every round trip on a quarter car. The committee agrees that 21 cents a mile for line charges is about what it ought to be. I believe the conclusion reached by the commission—and certainly the conclusion reached by the committee—was based on what the railroad companies earn from passenger service.

The Interstate Commerce Commission reports show that the passenger service of the railroads of the country the year before last yielded a little over 25 cents a car mile, and last year a little over 24 cents a car mile. The committee concluded that it was not as expensive to move the mails as it is to move passengers, and they thought there should be a difference of anywhere from 7 to 10 per cent between the amounts paid for railway-mail transportation and that earned in the passenger service by the railways.

The result is that the committee have recommended, and if the pending amendments to the present bill are adopted, the payment of 21 cents a full railway mail post-office car mile, 10½ cents for a 30-foot apartment car, 5¼ cents for a 15-foot apartment car, and 20 cents for a 60-foot storage car.

To these figures are to be added the terminal charges, which include switching, lighting, and heating. The one fundamental difference between the committee and the commission is that while the commission recommends the adoption of space payment for the movement of closed-pouch service, the committee recommends the movement of the closed-pouch service on the weight basis. The figures that I have been able to compile lead me to the conclusion that the space-basis payment for the closed-pouch service would be more than $2,000,000 more expensive than the weight-payment basis will be.

Under the bill recommended by the committee the total railway mail pay, after deducting the land-grant railroad reductions, usually made of 20 per cent of the mail pay, the railroads would be paid under this bill approximately $62,000,000 per annum, including the 4 per cent allowed for the annual increase of the railroad mail business.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Is not that estimate based on the proposition that as many cars and as much space and as many trips will be made under the proposed bill as is now given by railroads in the service, and also adding 4 per cent annual increase in the growth of the mail?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; in reaching these figures it has been assumed that there will be as many miles traveled by the cars used for the transportation of the mails in the coming year as was traveled during the past year. And we also assume that the volume of the business will increase, as it has done in the past, by about 4 per cent.

The figures made by the committee approximate $62,000,000, and the present railroad mail pay is $58,000,000. So that, I say, the committee is recommending the payment of $4,000,000 more to the railroads for transportation of the mail under this bill than we are paying them under the present plan.

If the figures and all the plans suggested by the commission, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, were adopted, the railroad mail pay during the year succeeding the enactment of this law would amount to $69,000,000. So that the figures of the committee, if all the amendments we are about to suggest shall be adopted, will be approximately $7,000,000 lower than the figures of the commission, if they should introduce a bill and it were adopted, according to the figures which I have been able to obtain in connection with their study of the question.

I propose in connection with what I have to say here to print in the RECORD a statement of the number of miles traveled by a full railroad post-office car, the number of miles traveled by half a car, the number of miles traveled by a quarter of a car, and the approximate number of trips made under given conditions by the closed-pouch service, as well as the number of miles and number of trips traveled by the storage car.

In this connection I wish also to print a detailed statement of how many trips each car of every class makes, what we are paying for terminal charges, and what each class of the service amounts to; and I shall compare the figures upon which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads agree with the figures which I understand the commission to recommend.

Mr. CLINE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. What reason does the commission give for the abandonment of the weight-and-mileage proposition and going to the space-and-mileage proposition?

Mr. MADDEN. Both the commission and the committee agree upon that. In the first place, the country is divided into four grand divisions, four contract section divisions; and in each contract section of the country we have a quadrennial weighing, and upon that quadrennial weight of the mails as ascertained in 105 days' weighing the payment by the Government is made to the railroads during a period of four years. During all that period we allow an increase of 4 per cent annually without knowing whether it really is a legitimate increase or not.

The recommendation for the adoption of the space basis and the mileage basis is upon the theory that it is much more simple; that it is more scientific; that it places within the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General the opportunity for executive ability in that he will have the power to order either a quarter of a car or half of a car, as he may think the needs of the service requires, whereas on the weight basis we were required to pay for weight fixed regardless of whether we carried the weight or not. Under this system of space and mileage we have the right to move a car, a full railroad post-office car 60 feet in length, for 21 cents a mile. That 21 cents a mile includes not only the car and the heating, but it includes the contents. It includes the men we have working the mail. We know exactly what the cost is to the Government every day.

There is no chance for juggling figures. We believe that this will result in an economy to the Government, and, at any rate, it will result in placing in the department charged with the responsibility of moving the mails information upon which they can base the exact cost of the operation of the department from day to day. I want to congratulate my friend from New Jersey

[Mr. TUTTLE] and my friend from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who, with others on this commission, have worked out this scientific basis for the movement of the mail, for to them credit is due, and we members of the committee are only echoing what they suggested as the result of their long study and hard toil.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has referred to the figures compiled by the commission that has been working on the subject for a number of years. To what extent are those figures available?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe that any official figures have been made by the commission; that is, no member of the commission can authoritatively state that they are the figures of the commission, but I think every member of the commission can state that, as far as I am able to ascertain, there is a unity of thought among the members of the commission as to what would be the proper figures. I am not speaking by authority, but if I make a misstatement I would be glad to have the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] correct me.

Mr. GOOD. Does not the gentleman think it would be the part of wisdom to defer legislation until Congress has had all the information from the members of this commission that have been studying it for a number of years?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, during the years that I have been a Member of Congress my experience has been that no Member of Congress ever studies these questions except the Member who is on the committee having direct charge of the work, and I want to say to my friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], that the committee having direct charge of this work has given intelligent study to the question and is now giving its view in the form of a bill which we hope will be adopted, and I believe that no good purpose would be served, either to the railroads or to the people or to the Government, by the delay that might occur as a result of the suggestion of my friend from Iowa, for I thoroughly believe that the figures which we have made are sufficiently compensatory to justify the enactment of the law. They are not too high.

The railroads are complaining that we are making the figures too low. I think myself they are not too high. I think perhaps the figures in some respects named by the commission were rather high, and while the figures made by the committee may be rather low, yet, I believe, on the whole, the figures recommended for the railway mail pay by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are as nearly equitable as it is possible to make them without seeming to favor either one side of the case or the other.

These are maximum figures, so that if they were too high, and this bill became a law, it is within the power of the Postmaster General to contract for the movement of the mails for less money than those figures would indicate, for his authority to pay is confined to not more than the figures indicated in the bill, and "not more than" means that the Postmaster General, if he is patriotic, as all Postmasters General are, would do his duty and see to it that no dollar of the public money was paid to any person for the movement of the mails to which he was not entitled.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, can not he do that now?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In connection with what the gentleman has said, I think he ought to say that there has always been carried in the law since 1873 the words "not exceeding," but no Postmaster General has ever paid a less rate than those provided by law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I may say to my friend from Kansas, in reply to his statement, that this bill differs radically from any other bill that has ever been enacted, in that it provides that the railroad companies shall move the mails, and no law to that effect has ever heretofore existed. This law makes it a crime for the railroad companies to refuse to move the mails when required by the Postmaster General to do so, and many people who are anxious that no injustice shall be done either to the people or to the railroads fear that with this clause making it a crime for a railroad company to refuse to move the mails when required to do so by the Postmaster General, the Postmaster General might make figures so low as to make it impossible for the railroad to move them. But I do not anticipate any such trouble. I do not believe that the Postmaster General would be so unjust. I believe that the Postmaster General, whoever he may be, would always treat the case on a fair, just, business basis.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Suppose the rates fixed would not give reasonable compensation, and therefore would be taking property without due process of law, does the gentleman think that provision could be enforced?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; I have not any idea that it could; but we always have a remedy in the courts; and if the railroad companies could show that the prices suggested by the Postmaster General for the movement of the mails were confiscatory, of course no court in the land would oblige the railroad companies to move those mails for those prices.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like also to suggest that I presume the gentleman is aware of the fact that the Constitution of the United States affords ample protection along that line?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. FINLEY. You can not take private property for public use without proper compensation.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely. The car-mile earning from the passenger service of the railroads in the United States last year was 24.37 cents, and this bill as recommended by the committee, when amended as suggested, will make the railroad mail pay average about 22.96 cents, including terminal charges, or it reduces the price paid for the transportation of the mails about 7 per cent below what the railroads earn in the passenger service of the country.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TUTTLE. Where does the gentleman get the figure of 24 cents plus?

Mr. MADDEN. From the latest report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TUTTLE. For the year 1913?

Mr. MADDEN. I have it here, I think. It is the latest report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It shows that the year before it was 25.43 cents, and this year it is down to 24.37 cents. Of course that might be due to the fact that the passenger traffic was not as dense this year as last year. That is always a factor that must be dealt with in the movement of railroad trains, and that will be one of the factors that will have to be dealt with in the movement of mails under this new system.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. How do the rates provided for in this bill compare with the rates paid by express companies to the railroads for carrying parcels and expressage?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not familiar with that, I am frank to say, and I would not be able to give an intelligent answer to the question, but my understanding of it is that quite a different service is performed. The Government gets from the railroad quite a different service from that which the express companies get. There is no comparison at all. We are dealing in high-class mail; the express companies carry package freight.

Mr. Chairman, there is one question that may arise, and that may occur to a great many people here, and that is what effect is this going to have on the parcel-post rate? This does away with the parcel-post agitation altogether, so far as the railroad movement of parcel post is concerned, and I have no doubt but that in the very near future there will be a readjustment of the parcel-post rates, so that for a longer distance the people of the United States will be able to get a better rate for the movement of their packages.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield before passing away from that subject in reference to the express rates; I do not know whether my colleague heard the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] yesterday or not?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I did.

Mr. MANN. What is the similarity or dissimilarity between the service rendered by the railroads in reference to mail and express?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was asking in what respect the two services compared. In reply I may say that since the Rural Delivery Service has gone into effect we have added burdens that the express companies have not, for they will not deliver outside of a certain radius in a town, but we deliver within a distance of 20 miles away from a post office and we pay men $1.200 a year now as rural mail carriers, and on that service last year there was a loss of $28.000.000. If that were added to the loss sustained in other directions by the Post Office and none of that loss was made up by the receipts in great cities, the Parcel Post System as now conducted would face a tremendous deficit every year.

Mr. MANN. What I want to inquire about is, what is the difference between the service, if any, rendered by the railroad companies to the express companies and to the Government in the carrying of mail?

Mr. MADDEN. The railroad companies load the mail and they unload it and they move it from the station to the post office if the post office is within a certain distance from the railroad station.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Do I understand the gentleman to say the railroad companies load and unload the mail and move it from the post office?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely, in every city they load and unload it.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I think the gentleman is merely mistaken.

Mr. PLATT. They do it if the post office is within 80 rods of the station.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not. If the railroad station is within 80 rods of the post office the railroad company carries the mail to the post office. If it is more than 80 rods from the post office there is a screen wagon or other service for the movement of the mails from the railroad station to the post office, but in every case all over the United States the railroad companies pay all the cost of loading the mail, all the cost of unloading the mail, and they carry the men free who sort the mail. They light, heat, and clean the cars; they furnish the drinking water and ice, and all that for the men employed by the Government, but in the express service they simply carry the weight of the packages that may be put in the express car.

Mr. HULINGS. And the express messengers.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Take the case of two packages, one of parcel post and the other an express package, in reference to the rapidity of transportation and their handling they are receiving about the same consideration to-day?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about express rapidity?

Mr. BARTON. And parcel post—two packages.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, then there would be no difference whatever. Now, I want to go to the question of the civil service, in reference to assistant postmasters. Section 3 of this bill provides that all assistant postmasters in the United States in the future, and those who are already in office, shall be required to take a civil-service examination. There can be no object on earth for the adoption of any such measure as this except to destroy the civil service. I do not agree with my friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of our committee, when he says that men should be placed in the service of the Government on a fixed tenure, and the reason I do not agree with him on that is that a man learns nothing in the Government service that is of any use whatever to him in commercial life, so that if a man serves 10 years in the Government service he is utterly useless in any other place, and the justification for keeping men in the Government all their lives is, first, they become more efficient by reason of their ability and understanding of the Government minutiæ, and second, it is impossible for them to get anything to do anywhere else after they leave Government service. There is a prejudice against men working for the Government in all commercial houses, and all a man would have to do to prevent himself from getting employment anywhere in commercial life, after leaving the service of the Government at the end of the 10-year period would be to say that he had been a Government clerk for 10 years, unless he was an extraordinarily efficient man.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman does not understand the provision in the bill relative to requiring assistant postmasters to stand examinations applies to any assistant postmasters except those who were covered into the service under a blanket order and who went in without any examination.

Mr. MADDEN. Read what it says.

Mr. FINLEY. I have read it.

Mr. MADDEN. Read it again so we will all hear it. I want to know what it says.

Mr. FINLEY. It reads as follows:

> And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to require all applicants for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the gentleman from Tennessee said all men now in the service were covered in under Executive order.

Mr. FINLEY. There are about 2,500 assistant postmasters who were covered into the service by the order of President Taft without examination.

Mr. MADDEN. We only have 2,500 assistant postmasters in the United States; so if there were 2,500 covered in by Executive order, they are all there by that order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I beg to differ with the gentleman. There are far more assistant postmasters.

Mr. MADDEN. How many?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, thousands.

Mr. MADDEN. A thousand more?

Mr. FINLEY. More than that.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not see where they are. I had a report from the Civil Service Commission giving me the number of assistant postmasters in the United States.

Mr. FINLEY. I am of the opinion that this only includes those who would be subject to examination under this proposed law.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I am subject to correction. I am not going to make an unequivocal statement.

Mr. FINLEY. I am sure of that, and that is why I called the gentleman's attention to the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. However, the enactment of this provision of the law would be iniquitous. It is unjustified; it is unjustifiable. It can be recommended on no other ground except that Democrats want places regardless of whether they are justified in getting the places or not. I think that men who have qualified themselves by service to do the things that the people of the United States expect them to do are entitled to protection from the Democratic office seekers.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. FINLEY. If it be true that there are some assistant postmasters included in these 2,500 who were covered into the service without examination, who are inefficient and incompetent, and whose inefficiency ought to be ascertained by some one, could the gentleman, in the interests of the good of the service or good government, have any objection to the proposed change in the law?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman could show me, if I was managing the post office or any business in the world, regardless of whether it was Government business or not, that any man under my jurisdiction was inefficient, unworthy, or for any other reason ought to be removed for the good of the service, I would find a way to remove him. But I would not under any circumstances agree to the enactment of a law like this, which is a mere subterfuge to set aside the civil-service regulations of the country and make an opening wedge, so to speak, for the entry into the public service of a lot of men who might be unworthy of the confidence of the public.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman not agree that this provision in the bill provides a lawful and orderly way for ascertaining the incompetents? Now, if they were removed by Executive authority, without any sort of examination and on the charge of inefficiency, would not there be a hue and cry raised that partisanship was being indulged in?

Mr. MADDEN. I admit if this law is enacted that it will be a lawful means of ascertaining the qualifications of men who seek these places, and it will be a lawful means by which those men who are in the places and now well qualified can be removed without creating the criticism which the gentleman refers to.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman contend that each and every one of these 2,500 assistant postmasters now in office under this executive order of President Taft are entirely efficient and competent?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not make any pretense of knowing anything about that. I simply assume that the administration has means to ascertain a man's fitness, and they can remove a man who occupies a place as assistant postmaster now if they want to do so. And they can name the man they want to succeed him if they want to do so. Now, why not do it? Why not be frank about it? Why not be Democrats in fact as well as in name? Why come here to the House and to the country with the subterfuge or pretense of wanting to do something to conform with the law, when, as a matter of fact, all you want is to get the places? Why do not you remove them? That is what I would do. I would be willing to have you remove them—perfectly willing. I think that Democrats need the places and ought to have them, but I am not in favor of destroying the civil-service law in order to give them the opportunity to get them. Now, I am heartily in favor of the adoption of this railroad mail pay schedule. I believe it is a conservative, fair recommendation for compensation to the railroads of the country, and I regret exceedingly that it is coupled up with a political scheme which has for its purpose the elimination of 2,500 men who are worthy from the public service. And I would feel that I was unpatriotic, that I was unjust to the people of America, that I was untrue to my oath as a Member of the House if I voted for any such bill as this, no matter how meritorious it is, with that attachment.

I regret very much that the Democratic members of the committee, every man of whom I have the greatest respect for, every man of whom is my friend, all of whom I would go anywhere to please, found it necessary to drive away their friends from the support of this bill by putting into it this civil-service subterfuge. There is not a man on the Post Office Committee who is more anxious to help the committee to do the thing that it ought to do than I am, and I think every member of the committee will agree that that is true. And I want to vote for the bill to regulate the railroad mail pay. I want to vote my convictions upon this question. But you have made it impossible for me to do that by tying to the bill a thing that has no relation whatever to that question and forcing me to vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.] Every Republican in the House, so far as I have been able to ascertain, would like to vote for this railroad mail pay bill, because they believe it is a just bill; but every Republican in the House, as far as I know, would be bound in honor to vote against the bill with this political appendage attached to it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like your opinion as to how much additional pay it gives to the railroads by reason of the amendments the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have adopted to the original bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would make about $3,000,000 difference. It would make about $3,000,000 more than it would if we did not have the amendments.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And if this bill with the amendments becomes a law, would it increase or decrease the pay to railroads?

Mr. MADDEN. If this bill becomes a law, it will increase the railroad mail pay from about $58,000,000, at present, to about $62,000,000. I have these figures in detail, and I shall show them to be the correct figures; and the difference between this bill and the bill which would be recommended by the commission, so far as I am able to ascertain, would be $7,000,000. So that——

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, may I correct the gentleman right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TUTTLE. The statistician for the commission estimates that under the proposed commission plan the appropriations for the year 1915 would be $67,000,000 plus.

Mr. MADDEN. And the 4 per cent would make it $69,000,000?

Mr. TUTTLE. There is no provision for the 4 per cent, because in his judgment the rearrangement of the apartment cars will be such that there will not be any increase for the year 1915.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I will say, in reply to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE], that if there is no provision made by the commission for 4 per cent increase, and their bill will amount to $67,000,000 without that, if I understand it correctly, there would still be a difference of $7,000,000 between us and the commission, because if we did not allow the 4 per cent increase our bill would be slightly over $60,000,000; so that, however you figure it, there would be $7,000,000 difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I am obliged, gentlemen, for the consideration you have given me. [Applause.] I wish to ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting some figures in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of some figures. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the figures referred to:

[1] Train-miles of closed-pouch service per annum estimated as of June, 1914, from reports of field officers of the department, apportioned to the two classes, namely, trains having from 3 to 7 feet of closed-pouch space (23.85 per cent of total train-miles reported), and trains having 3 feet or less of closed pouch space (76.15 per cent of total train-miles reported).

The department has not sufficient data upon which to make a reliable division of closed-pouch service on train requiring 3 and those requiring 7 feet of space, as these are not needed nor kept in the regular transaction of business. The best that can be done at present is to make an examination of the special reports submitted in 1909.

Referring to the tabulation of 493 closed-pouch trains shown in a "Statement of closed-pouch service," transmitted with the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster General of the 2d instant to the chairman of the joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mails, obtained from the original statistics reported to the department for the month of November, 1909, it was ascertained that the trains carrying a maximum number of pouches and sacks of 35 or less at any time during the period aggregated 771,805 car-foot miles of service on 476 closed-pouch trains. The department estimated at that time, of space devoted to closed-pouch mail, would allow 2.92 linear feet of space to 35 pouches or sacks. Trains carrying over 35 pouches and sacks aggregated 241,764 car-foot miles of service, on 17 closed-pouch trains.

The total trips for the 17 trains embraced in the first class named, is estimated at 30 trips per month for each train (7 trips per week), or a total of 510. The total trips for the 476 trains embraced in the second class of trains named is estimated at 28 trips per month for each train (one-third at 6 trips per week and two-thirds at 7 trips per week), or a total of 13,328. The percentage of trips for closed-pouch trains carrying over 3 feet of space would, therefore, be 3.7 per cent of the total covered by the tabulation, and for such trains carrying 3 feet or less of space, 96.3 per cent of the total trips.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1624. An act to regulate the construction of buildings along alleyways in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I expect to be brief and to occupy only a few moments, but I will thank the Chair to advise me as to the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important bills that has been presented to this or any other Congress. It embraces a dozen or more subjects, the most of which should not be in this bill, and I doubt, for reasons which I shall hereafter state, if the subject of railway mail pay should be considered by Congress at this time.

The question of railway mail pay has long been a mooted one, which has provoked endless discussion in and out of Congress and upon which volumes have been spoken and written. Various commissions have been appointed and reported; none quite satisfactory to both interested parties. Finally, in August, 1912, a Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Transportation of Mails was appointed, consisting of Senator Jonathan Bourne, jr. (chairman), Senator Harry A. Richardson, Senator John H. Bankhead, Representative John W. Weeks, Representative James T. Lloyd, and Representative William E. Tuttle, jr.

Since the appointment of this joint committee Senator Bourne has retired from the Senate, as has been said, to devote his whole time to this very important and complicated question.

Senator Richardson has also retired, and Representative WEEKS has gone to the Senate. But, notwithstanding these changes, all these gentlemen have continued to take a very deep interest in this subject and have expected to make a comprehensive and scientific report covering the whole subject matter.

Of Senator Bourne it can be said that he has retained his residence in Washington and given practically his whole time to this subject, and it has been the universal opinion, in view of the ability of the men composing this commission and of their untiring efforts to arrive at a conclusion that would be equally fair, both to the Government and the railroads, that they would make such a report as would settle this question for years to come. Therefore I regret, Mr. Chairman, that this proposed legislation is before the House at this time, and especially that the subject of railway mail pay is presented in a bill along with numerous other subjects, several of which, like the subject of railway mail pay, should be presented in separate and distinct bills.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the statement upon the authority of Chairman Bourne that the report will be forthcoming any day. I do not think I am disclosing any confidences of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when I say that Representative TUTTLE, of the committee, on the 13th day of July read a letter from Chairman Bourne in which he said the report would be forthcoming in three weeks, so that you can see that the time is near at hand when we can confidently expect a report from this commission.

This bill, so far as railway mail pay is concerned, ought not to be considered until that report is received and Members have an opportunity to read and digest the same, notwithstanding the amendments which will be offered later on as to pay for space, and so forth, which are substantially the same as the commission is expected to report. This information we get through the kindness of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] and that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who are not only members of the commission, but also members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House.

There are other important recommendations to be made by the commission which we should have the benefit of. For example, I think the Postmaster General is clothed with too much power in the bill. I am speaking broadly now, for we do not know who may be Postmaster General in the years to come, and how far he may use the authority granted in this bill. I refer to the words "not exceeding," as we find them in the bill. Senator Bourne has this to say regarding the same:

[From the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, Thursday, July 9, 1914.]

SENATOR BOURNE ATTACKS RAILWAY MAIL PAY BILL—ASSERTS MEASURE IS UNPARALLELED IN HISTORY OF RATE REGULATION.

WASHINGTON, July 8 (special).

If the Post Office Department has its way, the railroads will not only be compelled to carry the mails, but will be compelled to carry them at rates the department elects to pay, according to Jonathan Bourne, jr., chairman of the joint congressional committee on railway mail pay. Mr. Bourne issued an interview to-day in which he vigorously criticized the railway mail pay bill proposed by the Post Office Department.

"In its persistent efforts to secure dictatorial power the Post Office Department has broken all records," said Mr. Bourne. "The department bill H. R. 17042 provides that 'not exceeding' certain rates shall be paid to steam railroads for transportation of the mail. The same bill also contains a clause compelling the railroads to carry mail.

"It is claimed that 'not exceeding' is but a continuance of existing law, but heretofore the railroads having not been compelled by law to carry mail. They are supposed to have accepted the rates as a voluntary act which in itself was assumed to be sufficient guaranty that rates will not be too low, and it was only necessary for Congress to fix maximum rates, but this assumption was not sound, as a railroad would hardly dare to refuse to carry mail because of irritation resultant from such action in the community in which the road operates.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission is now authorized to fix maximum freight rates, it being left to the railroads to fix the minimum. It would be considered preposterous that the commission should fix the maximum rates at which railroads must carry freight and leave the shippers to fix the minimum. Yet this is the very thing that the Post Office Department proposes for mail pay in the departmental bill. Congress is to fix the maximum rates and the shipper—the Post Office Department—is to fix the minimum rates, and the railroads are to be compelled to carry the mail. This is a proposition without parallel in the history of rate regulation. It is bureaucracy run mad."

Mr. Chairman, we will be greatly interested to have the views of the Member from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE], who is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and also a member of the commission, who I understand will soon address the committee. Fortunately, two members of the commission in the House have been members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I am sure that they will give us a great deal of interesting and valuable information when they address the committee—information which will materially aid in perfecting the bill—and I congratulate each of them upon the splendid work which he has performed.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the amendments which are to be offered later on, and to which I have already referred, respecting railway mail pay provisions in this bill, I would be willing to support this bill if there were not other objectionable features, one of which I will call attention to at this time. Laying all politics aside, we ought all to agree that section 3 of this bill should have no place in a measure of its importance and character. The bill which would be based upon the report of the commission is expected to confine itself strictly to railway mail pay, while this one requires that all assistant postmasters, including those carried in the classified service by Executive orders, shall take a civil-service examination within 90 days.

These are permanent officials of the various post offices that have remained for the most part undisturbed because of their proved efficiency, and it is with no disrespect to the postmasters, many of whom have recently been appointed, that I say that these assistant postmasters know much more than they do or can for some time to come respecting the management of the various offices. And, speaking for those in the district which I have the honor of representing, I want to say that, without a single exception, they are competent and qualified, and should not be disturbed except for cause.

In this connection I want to add that if the claim be true that they should be removed because they are inefficient, the postmaster has his remedy by making the same known to the Civil Service Commission and to the Post Office Department, and if a fair investigation of the same confirms the statement of the postmaster, then they will be removed. But, as a matter of fact, on the contrary, I know it to be true that in more than one instance postmasters, new as well as old, want these faithful employees retained because they are efficient and well equipped for the discharge of their duties, but under this bill the whole list, without any exception, will be thrown open for appointment, giving Democratic applicants a chance which does not now exist to win Federal jobs, there being in round numbers about twenty-five hundred of these assistant postmasters.

This is only an indirect application of the old spoils system in the name of civil-service reform, and certainly has nothing to do with the question of railway mail pay.

If this bill, with the amendments which are to be proposed, becomes a law some say that railroads will be overpaid; others say that they will be underpaid. Without expressing any opinion as to what the result will be, I hope that they will be fairly compensated for their services and justice done both the Government and the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time did I occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan occupied 12 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. REILLY of Connecticut having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with out amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 288. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved May 2, 1914.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, one of the proposals among the many and important provisions in the measure under consideration is to change the method by which the Government pays the railroads for the transportation of the mails. The basis of pay for the last 41 years has been the weight of the mail carried and the distance it has been transported. It is proposed now to make the basis of pay to the railroads space used in transportation.

This change from one system of pay to another should not be made without balancing the Government's account with the railroads. Under the old system the Post Office Department, by the use of a glaringly erroneous computation in determining the average daily weight of mails, the basis of pay, paid out of the public funds, against the plain provisions of the law, a sum that aggregates from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000. This should be recovered for the Government, and I shall, during the consideration of this measure, offer an amendment designed to effect this recovery. As I proceed to-day I shall set forth the matter at length, turning my attention in the beginning to the new system of pay which is proposed.

For the proposed change involves matters of the gravest consideration to the Government. The amount which the provisions of this bill will turn over to the railroads is tremendous and ought to make Congress pause and give the fullest deliberation to the methods by which it is reached. The annual payment at the initiation of the new system of pay will be in the region of $62,000,000, according to the estimate of the chairman, Mr. MOON, which is some one or two million dollars more than is now expended for the service. We will spend the first year under this bill one-fifth of our annual revenues from the tariff. It stands, therefore, as an item of expenditure, not only first among the burdens in the various bureaus of the great postal system, but as payment for a single service among the greatest outlays known to any Government. It follows that no change in the method should be made, then, without the most zealous scrutiny and thorough survey. The change proposed is from weight to space. Weight, as a factor to be used in determining the amount of mails carried, is fairly definite. Space, as a factor to be similarly used, is not. Neither is absolutely definite under laws as they are ordinarily administered. But weight is relatively a tangible, computable, definite, fixed factor as a basis for administrative guidance and control, and space is not.

I have said that weight is not absolutely definite as a factor under usual practices of administration. Let me explain. We pay the railroads now for the transportation of the mails on the basis of the average daily weight of mails carried. To determine this average the mails are weighed for a certain number of days—105 days, in fact; the weights for these days collected into a dividend and with a divisor of 105, a quotient is secured for the average. Waiving for the moment the item of padding the mails and the use of a false divisor of 6 on a dividend of 7 days' weights, a practice which obtained for 34 years, it must be evident after a little reflection that 105 days' weights divided by 105 do not necessarily even then give a true average daily weight for a year, the term of payment, when the weights of mail differ at various seasons of the year, as they do. It is known with considerable definiteness that there is a regular increase and decrease in the volume of mail by seasons. Much less mail is carried in July of every year than in January of the same year. If the weight of the mails were to be shown by a line drawn with variations from the horizontal, the line would be found to be ascending from August to September, on through October, November, and December, reaching its highest point in January, February, and March, and holding fairly high in April and May, and declining through June to the July and August low level again. With the exception of the New England section, the 105 days' weighings are invariably placed over the spring of the year when the line is almost uniformly high. Now, a true average daily weight for the year can no more be obtained by that process than it could be obtained by taking the aggregate for the month of July with its low weights and dividing by its 31 days, or similarly the month of January with its high weights. The true average daily weight could be found only by a weighing extending the whole year with the number of days in the year used as a divisor, not a practicable device. The nearest approach to the true average is in use in some of the European countries, where the mails were weighed for a year, and a certain week's weights in November divided by 7 were found to be identical with the year's weights divided by 365.

The railroads therefore have always had the benefit and advantage of a favorable weighing period. But, false as the daily average weight figure has been in this general way, and false as it was for 34 years by the departmental use of a six days' divisor on seven days' weights to find as a quotient the average daily weight, the factor of weight has been to some degree determinative of legislative appropriations and administrative discretion. As is well known to all of us, for mail weighings the country is divided into four sections. The mail is weighed in each of the sections once every four years. The Congress pays for the transportation of the mails on the average daily weight as determined from that weighing. The amount allowed by Congress is fixed, inflexible, and definite. In a lesser degree it is also determinative upon the executive department in its allowances of pay for what are known as full railway postal cars, where the Government pays, in addition to the pay for weight, for the use of an entire car in which mail is separated. That weight is a definite control of administrative discretion is shown clearly by the circumstance that it was the very lack of this definite element which led to its adoption. In 1867 the pay for the carriage of the mails was based partly on an indefinite "size of mails." The railroads themselves reported "the size" of their mails. The Post Office Department, in order to ferret out excessive claims, ordered a weighing of all mails for 30 consecutive days. These totals proved cumbersome means of comparison, and they were reduced in the department to average daily weights, whether by the use of a correct or incorrect divisor it is not now possible to tell.

But whether false or true, as averages these figures served as something definite and certain by which the Post Office Department could determine whether the railroads and what particular railroads were claiming undue and excessive "sizes of mail." That is, the unit of weight came into the history of mail transportation, because the Government felt the need of a definite factor of measurement. This was not an era of antagonism to the railroads. It was one of supreme confidence in them. But the department felt the need of a fixed measure, and in 1873 the present system of pay on the average daily weight, with rates fixed on a sliding scale, with distance included in the computation, was adopted. Additional pay for full railway post-office cars, pay for space in cars measuring 40 feet and over in length, was also allowed. The administration of the new law was favorable to the railroads in many ways. The pay was originally made high, out of consideration of the fact that a weighing took place only once in four years, and the weights during the four years' period were increasing. In the computation of the pay on the heavier routes rate of pay was a sliding scale up to 5,000 pounds, average daily weight, with a lower flat per ton per mile rate above 5,000 pounds. But the railroads which had average daily weights of hundreds of thousands of pounds were not paid the per ton per mile rate for all the average daily weight, but were paid the high rate on the first 5,000 pounds, a rate of $171, and the per ton per mile rate on the remainder, a rate of $21.34. They were also given favorable weighing seasons; and the advantage of an average daily weight, found by the use of a false divisor, which, as I have pointed out amounted in a period of 34 years to an overpayment of between $70,000,000 and $80,000,000. For a portion of the period they were allowed, contrary to law, additional pay for space in apartment cars—car space of 30 feet and less in length where the whole car is divided with express or baggage.

In the first years of the new system of 1873 there was a general popular outcry against the enormous pay to the railroads for carrying the mails. There was no specification in the general charge that they were being paid too much. There was no public knowledge of the use of the false divisor or illegal pay for apartment cars. The Congress had adopted a definite measurement—weight—and had fixed a rate of pay. The result was not satisfactory. Naturally the Congress did not abandon thereupon the definite factor of weight. But it reduced the rate of pay 10 per cent in 1876 and 5 per cent in 1878, a reduction, stated with mathematical accuracy, of 14½ per cent.

Then once more there followed a long period of agitation over the amount allowed the railroads for this service. It arose from two sources—first, a portion of the public which believed that the railroads were getting too much, and voiced its protest through debate in Congress; and second, those railroads which believed that certain other railroads were getting more than a fair share of the routings of mail and voiced their protests at the department and through their friends in Congress, in the belief that any disturbance might result in some benefit to them.

After the fashion of legislative bodies and administrative bureaus confronted with vexatious problems, investigations by commissions and otherwise were instituted—several of them—with no results, culminating in the Walcott Commission of 1898, which reported, after extensive hearings and the employment of an expert accountant, with some indefiniteness that the railroads were not overpaid.

The commission's expert, H. C. Adams, however, held that the pay should be reduced 5 per cent.

In 1904 some of the railroad employees, who are experts in this field, were agitating for a change in the length of the weighing period. Presumably they had come to the conclusion that a longer period would give them a higher daily average weight. There were others who did not believe it would. Congress trebled the weighing period in 1905. During the first weighing under the new period in the West the San Francisco earthquake occurred. Pointing out that the earthquake had disarranged the mails, the railroads asked Congress to permit temporarily the use of 49 days' weighing; that is, up until the occurrence of the earthquake.

They were backed up in their request by the Post Office Department. Congress permitted the use of the shorter period for that year. The shorter period showed higher average daily weights for the railroads. It was a profitable change for them, and since the longer weighing period has not been popular with the railroads. But Congress held to the longer period in subsequent years, and as public agitation grew moved on to the business of other reductions. In the reduction of the number of days in the weighing period, following the earthquake, it had come to me that the department was using a six-day divisor on a seven-day dividend to obtain an average daily weight; that is, the department was including Sunday and week-day weights in the whole weighing period, but using only the number of week days as a divisor. I presented the matter to Congress. The department, in a communication to Congress, maintained the accuracy of its practice. Congress refused legislation that would compel the use of a correct divisor.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, the matter was first called to the attention of the Post Office Committee, of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] was a member, and the Post Office Committee took action upon it, but it went out of the bill in the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. The first mention of the false divisor was by myself in a speech on the floor of the House. It was not first mentioned in the committee. It was afterwards mentioned in the committee, and the contest was made there. I will go into the action in the committee and in the House a little later with particularity. Suffice it to say at this point that Congress did in 1907 reduce the rates of pay to the railroads on average daily weights above 5,000 pounds and on full railway post-office cars. Immediately following this action, the Postmaster General adopted a correct divisor, which resulted, in its application over the four weighing sections, in a saving of $5,000,000 annually. Still later shipment of return empty equipment, which had been carried in the mails as mail weight, was sent by freight, a reform for which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] was largely responsible by his individual efforts.

Through these agencies the pay of the railroads was reduced on a total approximating $50,000,000 a year by the sum of something like $10,000,000. Since then the railroads have borne a desperate air of injury, which gathered outrage and inflammation upon the adoption of parcel post, which has reduced their revenues from express business. They have sought a change. The illegal advantages they had enjoyed under the old system as administered had been in large part boiled out. They wearied of it. Their general attitude had come to be one of unremitting complaint and protest, an attitude based on the proposition that a protest might do the double office of securing more pay for them or preventing further reductions and at the same time silencing the public. But whatever their motives and hopes and fears, their protest has been incessant. Four years ago, under the authority of the law, Postmaster General Hitchcock appointed a commission to determine whether the railroads were underpaid or overpaid. The commission reported that through a readjustment of railway mail pay, with 6 per cent profit allowed the railroads, a saving could be made to the Government of about $9,000,000. The commission apparently believed that the railroads should be allowed, in addition to cost and the 6 per cent, also a compensation which would equal the $9,000,000, a conclusion tending to demonstrate that in the opinion of the commission the railroads' present pay was just.

Two years ago, in 1912, Congress created a joint commission to make inquiry into the subject of compensation for the transportation of mail. The commission has never reported. It was, in June last, about to report, I understand, a bill when the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads [Mr. MOON] introduced the bill which we now have before us. This is said to be similar to the bill which the commission was to put before Congress, the chief difference being that in the commission's bill it was not left discretionary with the Postmaster General to pay the railroads less than the fixed rates, while in the Moon bill the Postmaster General may pay "not exceeding" the rates fixed, a discretion which has always been in the law but which has never been exercised against the railroads.

The Moon bill does, however, give the Postmaster General this power. The commission bill does not. Since the introduction of the Moon bill amendments have been prepared, and were this morning offered by Mr. MOON, which increase the rates to approximately what are said to be carried in the commission's unoffered bill. In answer to my questions this morning, Mr. MOON said the latter amendments—that is, those offered this morning—will increase the pay over that in the original Moon bill about $3,000,000.

Some of the railroads have had the attitude of earnest antagonism to the original Moon measure; but this attitude has become in a measure chronic, and I do not doubt that the amended bill meets their approval and that secretly they are jubilant over it. The bill gives them admittedly a million dollars more than they are now receiving. I am certain it will be more than that in practice.

The advocates of the new system feel certain that in the future the initial amount will not rapidly increase, but that is a guess. Experience alone will demonstrate the facts in that regard.

What is the new system? A proposal to pay a rate for the space used multiplied by the distance the car is hauled and in addition to pay for switching, cleaning, lighting, and unloading.

At present we do not pay for space in apartment cars or storage cars; under the new system we will. At present we do not pay terminal charges, switching, cleaning, lighting; under the new system we will.

Closed-pouch service, under the proposed commission system, where pouches occupy space in cars greater than 3 feet and less than 7 feet, will be paid for on space. They now go by weight. The Moon bill provides weight.

In the commission bill, which has never appeared, there was a provision, I understand, that the Government would pay for side and transfer service, hitherto performed by the railroads. It is also in this bill, but I understand is to be stricken out. If it is stricken out now it will, no doubt, be added in the Senate. It is estimated that there will be an annual expenditure under this item of $2,118,820, an added burden on the Government.

Closed-pouch service is the transmission of smaller lots of mail in pouches. Side service is the delivery of mail from the railway station to the post office where the post office is within 80 rods of the railway station, a service performed from time immemorial by the railroads.

The rates of space fixed in the bill as introduced by Mr. MOON—and they will be changed by amendments offered by him—are as follows:

Service.	Rate per car-mile.
	Original Moon bill.	Moon bill with pending amendments.
	Cents.	Cents.
Railway post-office cars	20	21
Apartment cars, 30-foot	10	10½
Apartment cars, 15-foot	5	5¼
Storage cars	18	20

The terminal cost to the Government under the amendments offered to the Moon bill are as follows:

Rate per one-way trip.

Railway post-office car	$4
Apartment 30-foot car	1
Apartment 15-foot car	1
Storage car	4

The estimate of the total cost to the Government under the new system submitted is as follows:

Annual pay.

SERVICE.

Total line cost (256,367,234 miles)	$58,011,980
Closed-pouch, estimate on weight basis	2,230,796
Total railroad mail pay (262,367,234 miles) (includes 6,000,000 car miles, being the total annual closed-pouch space in exclusive closed-pouch trains carrying such weight of mails, equated to a 60-foot car basis)	60,242,776
Periodical matter by freight	703,904
Weighing and ascertainments	50,000
Total	60,996,680
Less land-grant deductions	1,171,136
Mail pay under provisions of this proposed bill, June 30, 1914	59,825,544
Add 4 per cent for fiscal year 1915	2,393,022
Mail pay under provisions of this proposed bill, June 30, 1915	62,218,566

These are estimates. It will be interesting to compare them two years hence with actual expenditures.

The efficacy of any law, however rigid in its terms, depends in large measure upon its administration. If this proposed law should have rigorous administration, it would probably reach at the beginning, in a degree, the level of efficacy claimed by its advocates. If it is administered in the manner in which the present law has been administered, the expenditures under it will be in a few years appalling.

We are moving away from a definite factor—weight—to the indefinite factor—space. The amount of space needed in a given instance, without other determinate element in the computation, is a matter dependent upon the judgment of men. We are going back to the indefinite "size of mails," which we left in 1867.

There are 100 and more subordinate executives in the country who will make recommendations to their chiefs, the superintendents of mails, for space, and the superintendents will in turn make their recommendations to the department at Washington. Each executive, as is natural, has pride in his district, keen appreciation of its needs, anxiety to perfect organization, concern for everything and everybody in his bailiwick. There will be care and economy in the beginning; but what of the result to the Government after the new plan has been assimilated into a governmental bureau system? How many years will it be until the people will be complaining that the cars are not carrying much mail? How long will it be until Congress will be appointing postal commissions to determine what is the average load of railway mail in the country? How long, with this expenditure creeping steadily upward, will it be before Congress will be assured that business is increasing so tremendously that the space pay must be increased? How long will it be before there will be a group here declaring that the Nation should never have left the weight basis and demanding that the country go back to it?

In my opinion it will not be long. Several things will hasten it. Parcel post, that magnificent addition to public service, is in its infancy. We are not fairly launched in it. Transportation of parcels by weight is one thing; transportation of parcels by space occupied is another. In the nature of things the bulk of post parcels is a greater factor than their weight. The lighter, bulkier things go by mail, and the necessities of expeditious dispatch, in place of deposit, in distribution in cars, and delivery in wagons, require space and more space. The people are not going to suffer any diminution in the development of parcel post, and they are going to find speedily that payment for space occupied rather than by weight is a factor.

But even a greater factor in the certain increase in space used than new business is the growth of the service of distribution of mail in transitu. The early transportation of mail by railroad consisted of the dispatch by one postmaster of sacks and pouches of mail to another postmaster. The pouched mail passed intact from one place to another. In the course of time crude cases of little pigeonholes were set up in cars, pouches were opened by "route agents," and distribution of mail was made to a certain extent before the train reached its destination. To-day this part of the service has reached that stage of development which makes it the very heart of the whole postal system. The full railway postal car has a crew of expert distributors, men of the highest skill, who are separating the mail with the most minute distribution. The great mail trains out of New York City for the West carry men who are routing mail to towns in California, to the south, and to towns in Oregon, to the north, before the train has reached Philadelphia. The genius of our postal system is dispatch. Separation in transitu is its highest expression. It is the very center of modern communication.

The whole tendency is to develop the system at this its highest point. Distribution in moving cars is of certain growth, and as it grows it will call for more and more space. The Nation will not tolerate curtailment or retrenchment here. It will insist, as it always has, on expedition. And increasing expedition means increasing space on moving cars. And space hereafter, under the provisions of this bill, will be paid for in all classes of cars. The people will pay the bill, and Congress will hesitate to add needed improvements to the service because of the enormously growing expenditures.

Weight, together with the popular prejudice against extra pay for the use of postal cars, has always been a check on this arm of the service. With weight eliminated and all payment based on space, the increase here will be very great, the number of the full postal cars multiplying rapidly and apartment car routes graduating quickly into full postal cars.

There is entering into the question, also, the great problem of the proper dispatch of second-class matter which periodically recurs and which instead of clearing under the space system will be further beclouded, to the vexation of all concerned, Government, publisher, and public.

Empty equipment which now goes by freight is also now to go back in the mails.

Moreover, the whole population has been trained in postal affairs to think in terms of weight. The man who posts a letter pays for it by weight. The charge on the book, the parcel he sends, is determined by its weight. The whole system has had in it as one of its determinate elements for 60 years the factor of weight. Until parcel post was inaugurated, distance, compared to weight, in many branches of the service was negligible.

It should be said that for many years there has been an advocacy of space rates. The clearest theoretical advocacy of it is found in the separate report filed by Eugene F. Loud, of California, in 1901, as a member of the Walcott postal commission. But at that time Mr. Loud favored it only theoretically, because he believed there was a lack of sufficient data to warrant its inauguration. He had served on the commission, and with the rest of the members of the commission had rejected as impracticable subjects of comparison for mail rates, express, passenger, baggage, and freight rates. It is interesting to note in this connection that all commissions save possibly the last, the one upon the findings of which this bill is presumably based, have suffered the greatest confusion in determining what is a fair rate to the railroads.

The existing commission has cut the Gordian knot by basing mail pay rates on an estimate of passenger-train revenue and comparing the estimated revenues of the railroads of an express car for 1 mile of travel and the estimated revenues of a passenger coach for 1 mile of travel, and computing the revenue that ought to be allowed for the space used by the mail from that. It is cutting the Gordian knot, for back of the estimates as to a just and reasonable rate is the vast field of railroad accounting, capitalization, and valuation, the relation of passenger and freight accounts to the whole railroad fabric, original cost, cost of duplication, depreciation, and going values, intricate and involved factors which the Interstate Commerce Commission is now trying slowly to work out.

There has been for 40 years a zealous effort to maintain that the railroads were not overpaid. I believe they have been overpaid. They were overpaid when they were allowed pay for apartment cars at one period. They were overpaid for 34 years in being given the benefit of a false average daily weight. And it is noteworthy that since they were deprived of this illegal advantage they have not failed to attempt to obtain from the courts the right to draw from the Government the money which they have been prevented from drawing since the department in 1907 began to use a correct divisor—a sum now estimated to aggregate from $25,000,000 to $31,000,000.

The Walcott Commission declared, in 1901, that the pay of the railroads was reasonable and compensatory when the false divisor was in use.

The present commission declares, I understand, that the present sum paid is compensatory, although reductions in the rate of pay have been made, the correct divisor adopted, and the pay reduced by many millions.

Both commissions can not be correct. One thing is certain—the railroads were not entitled to the excessive pay which they received by the use of a false computation over 34 years and their accounts with the Government should be squared. The Government ought not to be out of pocket what was illegally and erroneously paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, some time has been reserved for me, and I yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. That gives the gentleman what I was going to ask that he have.

Mr. MURDOCK. The railroads have sought in the courts to prove that the old divisor was the legal divisor. They have lost their contention. Had they won they would have been entitled to many millions of dollars which have not gone to them since the new divisor was used in 1907. But they lost, and the Government is entitled to the money paid them through a false computation in the years between 1873 and 1907.

To argue otherwise is to hold that as a litigant the Government has less rights in the premises than the railroads; that one rule shall apply to one party to the controversy and an entirely different rule to the second party; is to contend that so far as the Government is concerned in the controversy with the railroads, the Government stands only to lose, the railroads only to win.

A recital of the activities of the railroads in this matter makes this clear. In December, 1906, in a speech in the House I pointed out that the Government, through an erroneous interpretation of the statute, was weighing the mails a given number of week days and Sundays, and to obtain an average daily weight was dividing the total weight for the period by the number of days, less Sundays, basing the practice on the existence of the word "working" in the postal acts of 1873 and 1905. The latter act, which merely increased the length of the period from 30 "working days" to 90 "working days," was as follows:

Provided, That hereafter before making the readjustment of pay for transportation of mails on railroad routes, the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct.

I said that the loss to the Government by the use of a divisor of six on seven days' weights amounted to something like $5,000,000 a year—a figure which was afterwards verified. Up until the time I mentioned the practice to the House, there had been no public note of it anywhere, so far as I can find, in speeches, hearings, reports of committees or commissions, or in departmental reports, and I have read practically all of those dealing with the subject of railway-mail pay.

But after my speech in December, 1906, and my introduction of a resolution, the Post Office Department submitted to the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads an exhaustive document defending the practice of the false divisor, and giving all the weight of expert testimony upon a highly complicated system of pay against my contention. This document was submitted January 5, 1907. The then Second Assistant Postmaster General, W. S. Shallenberger, concluded his recommendation to the committee as follows:

In view of this condition of the service, the intention of the law, as disclosed by the history of the subject and the practice and construction placed upon it by the executive officers who were charged with its execution, of the contemporaneous declaration that in this respect the law adopted the practice which existed before its passage, and of the long-continued and unbroken maintenance of this construction upon the highest legal authority, I have to submit that the average daily weight as ascertained by the existing practice of the department is the correct one contemplated by the statute.

At the same time that the department contended that its interpretation of the statute was correct other important data were produced. Out of a pigeonhole came a theretofore unpublished order of Postmaster General Walter Q. Gresham, made September 18, 1884. It was as follows:

ORDER 44.

That hereafter when the weight of mails is taken on railroad routes performing service 7 days a week the whole number of days the mails are weighed, whether 30 or 35, shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

Here was the discovery of the false divisor and an attempt to correct it. But Mr. Gresham did not remain Postmaster General. By the death of Mr. Folger a vacancy occurred in the office of Secretary of the Treasury. At midnight a little over a week after he issued order 44 Mr. Gresham took the oath in his home here as Secretary of the Treasury, and went into other than postal activities. He was succeeded as Postmaster General by Mr. Frank Hatton.

Mr. Hatton sent a letter to the Attorney General in regard to the law for the payment to railroads for the carriage of the mails. In it he made no mention of the Gresham order, which was not until 1907 made public. He submitted a method of computation and two supposititious examples which are utterly confusing. No such routes as he submitted as examples then existed. The rate allowable per mile per annum cited by him as $150 was not then $150. "Pay per ton per mile of road per annum" and "pay per mile run of road per annum" are not part of the computation of pay. Here is the curious letter to the Attorney General:

OCTOBER 24, 1884.

SIR: The act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. L., p. 558), regulating the pay for carrying the mails on railroad routes, provides:

That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely:

"On routes carrying their whole length, an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175. * * *

"The average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 30 * * *."

Upon a large number of the railroad routes mails are carried on six days each week—that is, no mail is carried on Sunday. On others they are carried on every day in the year.

It has been the practice since 1873, in arriving at the average weight of mails per day on these classes of service, to treat the "successive working days" as being composed of the six secular or working days in the week, which is explained by the following illustrations:

Two routes, Nos. 1 and 2, over each of which 313 tons of mail are carried annually.

On route No. 1 mails are carried twice daily, except Sunday, six days per week, and are weighed for 30 successive working days, covering usually a period of 35 days. The result is divided by 30, and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,252
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	47.92
Pay per mile run of road per annum	do	11.9
Rate of pay allowable per mile per annum		$150

On route No. 2 mails are carried twice daily, seven days per week, and are weighed for 30 successive working days and for the intervening Sundays, the weight on the Sundays being treated as if carried on Mondays, the weighing, as before, covering usually a period of 35 days. The result is divided by 30, and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,460
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	47.92
Pay per mile run	do	10.2
Rate of pay allowed per mile per annum		$150

I have thought it necessary to give the foregoing illustrations, in order that the practice of this department under the law cited may readily appear, and I will thank you to advise me whether that practice is in compliance with or in violation of the statute.

If not in conformity with the law, will you please indicate the correct method by which the average weight per day should be obtained and the compensation adjusted thereon?

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
Postmaster General.

If this letter or the Gresham order No. 44 had been published at the time, either one or both, the question of the divisor would have been at issue 22 years before I raised it.

In answer to this letter from Postmaster General Hatton, there came to the Post Office Department this opinion, out of form, incomplete in itself, and, without the inquiry which elicited it, baffling in its obscurity:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, October 31, 1884.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL.

SIR: I have considered your communication of the 22d instant, requesting to know whether the construction placed by the Post Office Department on section 4002, subsection 2, prescribing the mode in which the average weight of mails transported by railroad routes shall be ascertained is correct, and am of the opinion that that construction is correct and that a departure from it would defeat the intention of the law and cause no little embarrassment.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM A. MAURY,
Acting Attorney General.

For 23 years this letter was the warrant the Post Office Department held for its construction of the law. It was filed away in a pigeonhole there, and it was also to be found in the published opinions of the Attorney General for 1884, but signed there, not by William A. Maury, but by S. F. Phillips. It was a costly letter, whoever wrote it. It cost the Government something in the neighborhood of $60,000,000.

When the department in 1907 submitted its report to the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that its practice was correct, I contended that the interpretation of the statute was erroneous. I brought the matter up in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and by a very close vote the committee inserted in the general supply bill an amendment striking the word "working" from the law. The majority report of the committee supported the amendment. A minority report was made by Mr. Sibley, Mr. Snapp, and others.

In the meanwhile a then existing postal commission—the Penrose commission—had made a report, recommending, among other things, changes in the pay allowed railroads for carrying average daily weights of mail above 5,000 pounds, and in the draft of the bill submitted by this commission the use of a false divisor, as then upheld by the department, was confirmed in the following clause:

* * * the average weight to be ascertained as now provided by law, and such compensation to be computed in the same manner as and subject to all the restrictions, limitations, and reductions now prescribed by law.

This never became law. But the recommendations of the commission as to changes in the pay for mail weights above 5,000 pounds were adopted with modifications by the House Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, which in its general supply bill had now made four changes of moment in regard to railway mail pay.

1. A reduction in the pay for weights above 5,000 pounds.
2. A direction to the department to change the divisor by striking out the word "working."
3. A reduction in the rates for the use of postal cars.
4. Elimination of return empty mail bags from mail weights.

The saving proposed by the new divisor provided was clearly greater than that accomplished by the other three provisions. The first three provisions were certain to be attacked by points of order under the then rules of the House on the claim that they were changes of existing law. It was certain that points of order would be made. There was talk of getting a special rule to cover and save some of the items from points of order—a frequent device. But no special rule was forthcoming. Instead, on February 18, the then chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, before the consideration of the bill by paragraphs had begun, received recognition to suspend the rules. His motion was as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the final passage of the bill (H. R. 25483) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, it shall be in order in the House to offer the following, under the conditions prescribed in Rule XXVIII, covering suspension of the rules:

Ordered, That in the engrossment of the bill (H. R. 25483) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, the Clerk be directed to insert after the paragraph of appropriation "for inland transportation by railroad route, $44,660,000" the following:

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mail on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds, by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, the rate shall be 5 per cent less the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds; and on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 48,000 pounds, the rates shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds up to 48,000 pounds, and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds at the rate of $19.24 upon all roads other than land-grant roads, and upon all land-grant roads the rate shall be $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of said 48,000 pounds.

"That after July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $32.50 per mile for 50-foot cars and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length."

In parliamentary practice a bill is engrossed, read a third time, and passed. Under the order I have just quoted the bill was to be finally passed and then engrossed, and the Clerk was to insert in the bill two of the provisions reducing railway mail pay. In other words, two of the provisions were, in effect, to be lifted out of the bill and reinserted in the bill after its passage, and thus saved from points of order. The divisor proposition was to be left exposed. The order is unique in the history of parliamentary bodies; no similar device has ever been resorted to in the American Congress. It stands alone, superlative in its field. The House was under the obvious necessity of voting for it, because by voting it up a partial reduction of railway mail pay could be accomplished. By voting it down presumably all reductions would be lost. The House voted it up.

Believing, as I had contended, that it was not necessary to make any change in the wording of the law to compel the use of a correct divisor, when the paragraph in the bill appropriating a stated sum for mail transportation was reached, I offered an amendment which I believed did not change existing law and which was not subject to a point of order. It was as follows:

Amend, by adding, after the word "dollars," in line 2, page 21, "Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for the transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed."

A point of order was made against this. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole sustained the point of order. I appealed from his decision. The Chair was sustained by an overwhelming vote.

Later the point of order was made against the provision in the bill directing a change in the divisor by eliminating the word "working"; the point of order was sustained and the provision went out. The postal supply bill passed the House. In the Senate Senator LA FOLLETTE offered my amendment. There was neither explanation, debate, nor dissent. It went into the bill, which then came to the House. Suspecting the Senate amendment would be killed in conference, I made an attempt to have the House accept the Senate amendment. I was beaten. I tried to secure a record vote without success. The divisor amendment which had been added in the Senate was eliminated in conference.

On March 4, 1907, the day of the adjournment of Congress, there was published in the Washington papers a notice that the Post Office Department had changed the divisor to seven by an order, the final form of which is this:

Order No. 412.

Ordered, That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

The railroads at once challenged the justness of this order. So the matter was submitted by the department to Attorney General Bonaparte, and on September 27, 1907, he sustained order No. 412 in a lengthy opinion. He said the statute was not ambiguous, but clear. He declared:

If Sundays are not "working days," the law does not permit the mails to be weighed on Sundays; if they are "working days," their exclusion from the divisor renders the result of the computation false on its face.

The railroads took the matter to the Court of Claims of the United States. They had seen within a year the department officials on both sides of the proposition. They had also witnessed the House of Representatives, by sustaining the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, declare that the use of 7 as a divisor would be a change of law, and that therefore the use of 6 was in accordance with existing law.

If in the years subsequent to the issue of order 412 Congress had passed a law changing in terms the law in regard to the divisor, the railroads would have used it in court as proof that order 412 was not according to law, that the practice of a six-day divisor from 1873 to 1907 was legal, and that they were entitled to a recovery from the Government of the sum saved to the Government from the date of issue of order 412 to the date of change of law. But Congress has not changed the law regarding the divisor.

The test case brought by the railroads was the Chicago & Alton Railroad Co. versus the United States. The Court of Claims some six months ago decided the case in favor of the railroads. A rehearing was asked and granted, and on May 18, 1914, the Court of Claims dismissed the petition of the railroads. The Government had won. The railroads have appealed on the findings of fact to the Supreme Court.

The railroads before the Court of Claims rested their contention mainly on the propositions that the meaning of the statute was fixed by (a) contemporaneous and long-continued exposition by the Post Office Department; (b) that in construction of the statute recourse should be had to debates in Congress, reports of committees, and the failure of Congress to change the departmental practice.

It has been held by the courts in the construction of a doubtful and ambiguous law that contemporaneous construction of those who were called upon to act under the law and were appointed to carry its provisions into effect is entitled to very great respect.

But this statute was not ambiguous or doubtful. The Court of Claims says:

If the statute in this particular were ambiguous or doubtful, the exposition by the department so long continued should be given great weight and a controlling effect under the authorities supra, but we do not so construe the statute.

The court also held that the debates in Congress were not determinative of an erroneous construction of a statute by a department, although debates may be consulted in the ascertainment of the history of the period.

The Court of Claims said in summing up:

Our conclusion is that said statute as amended in the particulars involved in this case does not authorize the application of the rules of contemporaneous and long-continued executive exposition, but that it can be and should be given the construction which its words in their usual and generally accepted meaning import, and that the amendment of 1905 was not an adoption of any preexisting departmental practice which is controlling upon the interpretation to be given by the court.

The railroads had contended that in 1905, when the law was amended extending the weighing period from 30 to 90 successive "working" days, the practice of the department in using a divisor of 6 had been confirmed by Congress. The use of 6 as a divisor was not known to Congress in 1905, and was not debated, and was not then at issue.

Now, after 41 years, the old system of railway mail pay is to be changed. Under the old system the Government suffered gross injustice by a glaringly false and illegal computation in the department, which, when challenged, the department defended; which Congress, when its attention was called to it, refused to direct the department to correct, a computation which eventually was corrected by order of Mr. Cortelyou, Postmaster General under President Roosevelt, whose order has been sustained by the courts. In the change from the old system to the new a fitting time presents itself to my mind to balance the books. Had the Government lost in the courts it would have been called upon to pay. The Government won, and the railroads should pay. When a proper place is reached in the consideration of the pending measure I shall offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the Postmaster General shall withhold from all transportation lines which were paid for the carriage of the mails between the year 1873 and June 7, 1907, on a basis of the average daily weight of mails found by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days included in the weighing period, all payments under the provisions of this act until an amount equaling the overpayments to such railroads by reason of the use of an erroneous divisor, shall have been withheld.

I shall not be surprised at an adverse reception of this proposition. I have ceased to be surprised at the reluctance of Congress in this matter. But no man will combat it on its merits. And in view of the previous attitude of Congress in the case, I believe it is incumbent on Congress to take the initiative here. It owes it to itself and to the country.

The railroads, as I have stated, have appealed to the Supreme Court. They are seeking to win the many millions of dollars which have been saved to the Government since 1907 by the use of the correct divisor. Why should the Representatives of the Government permit the controversy to be one-sided? Losing in the courts, as they have lost, upon the finding of the courts that the practice in the department which overpaid them had no warrant in law, it is clear to me that the Government has the right to recover its loss of $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 from 1873 to 1907. The Congress, for the Government, should now proceed to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee occupy some time now?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I desire to discuss that section of the omnibus bill which relates to the readjustment of the compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of mail.

This subject has been one of controversy ever since the railroad superseded the stage coach in 1838. The history of the Railway Mail Service has been one of almost ceaseless contention and dispute between the railroads and the Government over the adequacy of the rates paid and the proper basis of payment. The antiquated, complicated, cumbersome, and defective method used in computing the amounts due for the railroad service has never been satisfactory, practical, or fair, and has never been understood by our people. The general impression, however, has always been that the Government was imposed upon and was paying well in excess of what the railroads earned or deserved for their services.

When the railroads first came into the service, in 1838, their compensation was limited not to exceed in any instance 25 per cent "over and above what similar transportation would cost in post coaches." In 1838 this compensation was further limited by an act restricting the cost on any route not to exceed $300 per mile per annum. In 1845 the railroads were classified, dependent upon the size of the mail, the speed of the trains, and the importance of the service, and compensation was limited to $300 per mile per annum for the first class, $100 per mile for the second class, and $50 per mile for the third class. These rates prevailed for a period of 20 years, wholly arbitrary and subject to the varying judgment of the department officials. Not until 1867 were the mails weighed in order to secure a more equitable assignment of roads.

During the late sixties the distribution of mail in transit was begun, and it was soon recognized that if the railroads were not only to transport the mail itself, but also to supply, equip, and haul post offices for the distribution of mail, the weight basis was not adequate or just, and in the law of 1873 the classification of mail routes was abandoned, and the average daily weight of mails carried the whole length of the route with due frequency and speed was made the gauge of compensation, and an additional allowance was provided for railway post-office cars. The result of this arrangement, which is still in effect, was that the railroads are paid about 90 per cent on the weight basis, and 10 per cent of their compensation is for the railroad post-office car service for space furnished. The rates provided by the act of 1873, although protested by the railroads at the time as inadequate, were arbitrarily reduced 10 per cent by the law of 1876, and were further reduced 5 per cent in 1878. The allowance for full railway post-office cars fixed by the law of 1873 was also reduced by the law of 1907 upward of 20 per cent. On March 2, 1907, a still further reduction of 5 per cent was made on all weights from 5,000 pounds to 48,000 pounds and practically 10 per cent on weights above 48,000 pounds. On June 7, 1907, the Postmaster General issued an order changing the divisor from 6 to 7 in computing the average daily weight of mails, which resulted in another reduction of about 8 per cent in the pay of railroads.

Land-grant roads receive 80 per cent of compensation provided in these acts, and in May, 1910, the law was changed, so far as it affected land-grant roads, by reducing the rate fixed for carrying each 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds by 10 per cent. The following is the schedule of the rates allowable under the original act and those in effect since these reductions were made:

50-foot car	40.00	32.50

These reductions have all been purely arbitrary, and in most instances were due simply to a belief or an opinion that the railroads were receiving excessive compensation, although this has never been demonstrated, nor have the investigations of those who have studied the question revealed an overpayment. On the contrary, the Wolcott-Loud joint commission, after having this matter under advisement for three years, in 1901 reported that—

> Upon a careful consideration of all the evidence and the statements and arguments submitted, and in view of all the services rendered by the railroads, we are of opinion that "the prices now paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails" are not excessive, and recommend that no reduction thereof be made at this time.

The whole system of payment has been a constant source of irritation ever since it has been in effect and has perplexed the minds of legislators, perhaps, more than any problem connected with the Postal Service.

The present law is concededly defective in the following particulars:

DEFECTS OF PRESENT LAW.

First. It pays the same rate per ton-mile, irrespective of whether the haul is long or short, thus violating a universally recognized principle of freight transportation. The rate per ton-mile should not be the same when the ton is carried 500 miles as when it is carried only 5 miles.

Second. It is confusing in providing two rates of pay for the same service. When a certain route has one post-office car passing over it daily the law provides one rate for the weight of the mail in the car and another payment for the car itself. It would be much simpler and more desirable to have one rate for the loaded car. An illustration of the misunderstanding of this dual method of payment is the often-repeated assertion, sometimes from postal authorities, that the "rentals" for a single year would suffice to purchase the cars and pay for their upkeep. Congress on several occasions has been asked to consider the Government ownership of cars as a result of this fallacious contention.

Third. The present law ignores the frequency of service in applying the wholesale and retail principle. Thus if two routes have the same average daily weight, the payment is the same, irrespective of whether the weight is loaded on 1 train or 10 trains.

Fourth. The present plan is wrong, because it does not compensate railroads for apartment cars in which mail is distributed. The apartment car must be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by the railroad companies the same as a full car, and if payment is made for the use of a full car there is no valid reason why railroads should not receive proportionate compensation for a part of the car.

Fifth. Under the present system it has been demonstrated that there is no equality as between the long-distance roads and the so-called short lines. The fact is that the great trunk lines of the country are apparently overpaid, while the smaller and poorly patronized roads are grossly underpaid.

Other defects are that the present law does not sufficiently direct incentive to economize in loading the car. It provides for quadrennial weighings, thereby requiring the railroads to carry the increase in volume of mails without compensation, when they are justly entitled to pay for all the service they render; and it compels the railroads, where a post office is within 80 rods of the station, to deliver the mail to the office and thereby perform a service which can not be considered a legitimate railroad function.

That such a system is irrational, unscientific, unbusinesslike, and unfair has been admitted by all who have given it any attention or study, and a radical modification and revision has long been demanded.

Various commissions named from time to time have attempted to solve the problems involved. In 1876 the Hubbard Commission, in 1883 the Elmer-Thompson-Slater Commission, and in 1898 the Wolcott-Loud Commission in turn investigated, reported, and made recommendations without any action on the part of Congress. In addition to these commissions the Post Office Department itself has been making diligent efforts to ascertain a proper basis of pay which would be fair alike to the Government and the railroads, and in 1909 Postmaster General Hitchcock, under authority of the law of March 3, 1879, obtained a vast amount of important and useful statistical data upon railroad operations, particularly those of the passenger-train service, the amount of car space devoted to passenger service proper, express service, the mail service, and the operating expenses and revenues.

The results of this inquiry are contained in a very comprehensive report by the Postmaster General under date of August 12, 1911 (H. Doc. 105), as to the operation, receipts, and expenditures of railroad companies transporting the mail, with recommendations for legislation. With the submission of this report the department presented a bill embodying its conclusions, which was introduced in the Senate. This, the so-called Hitchcock plan, provided for payment on the basis of cost and space; its principal features may be briefly summarized as follows:

HITCHCOCK PLAN.

1. From information supplied by the railroads the Postmaster General shall annually determine the cost of carrying the mails on each road, cost meaning operating expenses and taxes. The apportionment of such "cost" is subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The mail pay due each road is to be determined by adding to such "cost" 6 per cent and such additional amounts, "if any be necessary," to make the whole payment a reasonable return on the value of the property "necessarily" employed in the mail service. (This determination of a capital charge is apparently not to be reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.)

2. Land-grant roads shall receive only operating expenses and taxes—that is, nothing for the use of the capital.

3. Settlements are to be made with the 795 roads, not by the 3,400 mail routes.

4. The car-foot miles devoted to the use of mails are to be ascertained during a statistical period, provided that the space in distribution cars is to be measured according to the authorization of space by the Postmaster General, the department being charged for the round trip with the maximum space authorized in either direction.

5. It shall be unlawful for railroads to refuse to carry mails.

This plan was regarded as impracticable and unworkable because of the almost insuperable difficulties in the way of ascertaining the cost of the service, because it put a premium on inefficient and extravagant management, because it penalized economical management, and because it increased rather than diminished the difficulties of administration and adjustment.

The data assembled were of great value, the suggestions of the department were worthy of all consideration, and in view of the urgent need of a new system which would meet the requirements of the service, in the closing days of the second session of the Sixty-second Congress a joint committee, consisting of three Senators and three Members of the House, was appointed and authorized—> to make inquiry into the subject of * * * compensation for the transportation of mail, and to report at the earliest practicable date.

This commission promptly began its labors and carried forward its studies and investigations with as much dispatch as was compatible with thoroughness, but was obliged to ask for a continuance by the Sixty-third Congress, and has been directed to report before December 1, 1914. We have met so many unexpected complications, we have been so hampered by difficulties in securing accurate statistics, and we have had such widely conflicting statistical information to reconcile, that we are not yet prepared to submit the final report of our findings and conclusions.

The Post Office Department, however, desiring immediate action in order that the service may be readjusted to meet the requirements of the enormous growth of business caused by the extension of the parcel post, has urged legislation before the close of this session of Congress, and, at the request of the Postmaster General, Mr. Chairman MOON, of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, on June 4 introduced the bill, which, with certain amendments subsequently recommended by the Post Office Committee, is now under consideration.

The constructive features of section 13 are, without exception, those evolved by the joint commission, and the plan here presented, with certain important modifications, is the plan which will be recommended by that commission. A distinct departure from the present system is proposed, and a plan is suggested which I confidently believe will settle this much-mooted question for such time as the present transportation conditions exist.

Space is substituted for weight and space as the measure of the service rendered.

Space is, in fact, the basis of all rate making. In carload freight business space is taken into consideration in that a minimum weight per car, varying with the bulk of a commodity, is fixed, and the shipper must pay at least the minimum carload rate regardless of the amount of freight in the car. In fixing the rates on different commodities shipped in less than carload lots the bulk as well as the weight receives consideration. In the passenger service rates are based entirely on space. The weight of the passenger and his baggage is not taken into account. In the Pullman service the same is true. The weight of the modern railway post-office car is upward of 60 tons; the average mail carried is slightly in excess of 2½ tons. It can not be contended that the variation of a few hundred pounds would affect the expense of transportation. The storage car weighs from 50 to 60 tons, but it rarely contains as much as 10 tons of mail, and, compared with the dead weight of the car, the varying weight of the contents is inconsequential. The space basis should be adopted because it is a definite and scientific gauge by which to fix the compensation; because it permits fluctuations of mail pay with every material fluctuation in the service; because it eliminates the cost and the inconvenience of the quadrennial weighings; because it minimizes waste by encouraging economy in utilizing car space; and because it provides a system so definite, clear, and simple that any citizen can understand it. But the chief advantage lies in the fact that the space system minimizes the possibility of injustice being done to either party in interest—the Government or the railroads. The Government will, of course, economize on space authorized and use the minimum required, while the railroads will be sure to be compensated for what they furnish; no more, no less.

Other commissions, committees, and postal experts have repeatedly recommended the substitution of space for weight in measuring the service rendered by the railroads, but they have all failed to suggest a practicable, workable plan to which the space basis could be adapted. It remained for my distinguished colleague upon the commission, Mr. Lloyd, to hit upon the four-unit scheme, which has been demonstrated to the commission and to the department to be the fairest possible basis of payment for the ever-changing volume of mail carried under ever-varying conditions throughout the length and breadth of the country. This scheme has so appealed to the great experts in the Post Office Department that they have abandoned their own and accepted the Lloyd plan as the best that has yet been devised.

The four units to be used as a basis for compensation are the 60-foot car, 60 feet being the standard length of the modern passenger car, the 30-foot apartment, the 15-foot apartment, and the pouch mail which is carried in baggage cars. Under this plan the Government is absolutely protected, as the sole right of authorization of car space rests with the Postmaster General, and the railroad receives credit the instant it complies with the authorization. By the adoption of these units the system is standardized in a way which should be a benefit to the Government and to the railroad, and it should prove of great advantage to both, especially in developing a careful economy of space.

The present practice of adjusting rates but once in four years is abandoned, because it results in forcing the railroads to carry a large amount of mail without pay—14 per cent, if the annual increase in the weight of mail transported has been 7 per cent, as the Government revenue from postal receipts has been on the average for the last 10 years. This practice is unfair to both the Government and the railroads—to the railroads when it does not pay for all services rendered; to the Government when it pays for services not rendered. A plan is here substituted whereby instant credit may be given for increased service, and besides doing justice to the railroads it saves the Government approximately $400,000 annually in the cost of the quadrennial weighings.

A new feature in rate making is introduced. Two charges are provided for, a terminal charge which is fixed regardless of the distance traveled, graduated according to the amount of space authorized in the car by the Postmaster General and constructed scientifically upon the basis of the switching and cleaning costs in the movement of the car. The other charge is the line charge upon a car-mile basis. By the segregation of the terminal from the line charges there is created a plan which equalizes the long-and-short haul, equalizes the payment for service rendered between the short lines and the trunk lines, and applies the wholesale and retail principle which is lacking under the present system.

The railroads will be relieved of the side and transfer service of delivery, which, as Gen. Stewart says—is not strictly a railroad service and is productive of a vast amount of disagreement and controversy between the railroads and the department. Very often—in the case of short lines, for instance, where the pay is very small for the service, they may be required to pay out half, or even more, than they get for the performance of this side and transfer service, which works, of course, an injustice and an inequity to those particular lines.

Says the Second Assistant Postmaster General—

It is no more reasonable to compel the railroads to deliver mail to a post office after it reaches their terminals than to require them to take passengers to their homes upon their arrival at the stations or to deliver freight directly to the consignees. A railroad should not be required to transport mails on a city street or a country road.

Mr. Chairman, being convinced of the soundness, the practicability, and the desirability of this method of adjusting the railway mail pay, we face the knotty problem of determining the rate to be applied, and no phase of this subject has received such close and conscientious attention as has that of the rate of pay for the service rendered by the railroads. We have been actuated solely by the desire to do justice both to the railroads and to the Government, and we have earnestly striven to arrive at the rate which would compensate the railroads fairly for their service and at the same time protect the Government from imposition. After reaching the conclusion that space should be the measure of the service rendered and that the car mile should be the unit of pay, the next step was to fix the rates upon the car-mile basis.

There were no statistics or data upon which the commission could safely rely for the ascertainment of a correct rate, and the accounting systems of the railroads failed to indicate with any precision what would be compensatory rates in the various branches of the railroad service, but the conclusion was reached that the interests of the Government would be most surely protected by the adoption of a rate comparable to that received from the passenger service.

The passenger rates are claimed to be slightly, if any, above the cost of the service. The railroads insist they are not even remunerative, and the Interstate Commerce Commission found in the 5 per cent case, recently decided, that passenger fares were not bearing their share of the transportation burden; but as their reasonableness has been passed upon by the legislatures, the railroad commissions, and the courts in most of the States of the Union, we feel warranted in accepting them as at least legitimate. Assuming the reasonableness of the passenger rate, it remained to determine what difference there should be in the rate for the carriage of the mail.

On the one hand it was held that the compensation for carrying the mail should at least equal that received from the passenger service, because both in law and in the practical operation of the railroads the mail is given preeminence over all departments of transportation, not even excepting passengers. Mail trains must be given right of way over all other trains; the mail must go on the fastest trains; the mail must be carried on any train the Post Office Department may select; no mail must be left behind, and railroads must always furnish sufficient car space regardless of the suddenness or unusualness of the demand that may be made; mail cars must be furnished with best appliances that art and science afford and modern sanitation demands; mail cars must be stationed where they can be easily and conveniently approached; railroad employees must give mail their first attention on arrival of trains. In fact, the mail service demands the very best that the modern railroad can offer to the passengers in the way of convenience, speed regularity, frequency, and safety. These are the important factors in the passenger service—they are the chief factors in the mail service—and, with few exceptions, the operating expenses of the passenger service should be shared pro rata by the Postal Service.

On the other hand, the Post Office Department maintains that the rate for carrying the mail should be well under the commercial rate charged for passenger service. Gen. Stewart believes that the following considerations, if taken into account, will justify a much lower rate than the commercial rate for the carriage of mails, namely:

First. The certainty, constancy, and homogeneity of traffic.

Second. The certainty and regularity of payment.

Third. Railroads are not built primarily to carry mails; in other words, the mail service is a by-product.

Fourth. The protection to their mail trains, which railroads as Government agencies receive against unlawful acts in interference with or obstruction of the mails carried.

Fifth. The principle of public utility.

The testimony given in our hearings did not show that there was either certainty or constancy in the volume of mail traffic. On the contrary, it appears that widely varying quantities of mail are presented for shipment; that there is a vast difference in the outbound as compared with the inbound; and that there is a necessity for providing at all times for maximum conditions, as failure to do so subjects the railway carrier to fines. As to the homogeneity of the traffic, to satisfy oneself one has only to visit a terminal office where the mails are distributed to have an ocular demonstration that the mails of to-day are anything but homogeneous. In addition to the first and second class items, it will be found that there is the widest possible diversity in the character of the traffic, including the bulky, the perishable, and the fragile.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I see the gentleman is watching the clock. I desire to say to him that if he wants more time I will give it to him, so he need not bother with the clock.

Mr. TUTTLE. That is very kind of the gentleman.

Assuredly the Government is not entitled to any discount because of the certainty and regularity of its payments. The department makes monthly settlements with the railroads, while the passenger service is without exception paid for in advance, and the payments received for the freight and express business are practically simultaneous with the transaction.

The mails can hardly be regarded as a by-product, although it may be conceded that the railroads were not built primarily to carry them. The mail was an important article of transportation long before the railroads were built, and it is altogether likely that the builders of the railroads had in mind all possible traffic and included the mails in their calculations. While the certain and speedy transmission of the mail is absolutely necessary to the success of railroad operation, even Gen. Stewart was "glad to say that if it were not for the railroads mail service would be a very insignificant thing."

To me it is no more reasonable that the mails should be treated as a by-product of the passenger service than to consider freight a by-product of that service or to hold that the passenger service is a by-product of the freight service. The railroads are entitled to payment for every service they perform, no matter how insignificant it may be in comparison with others. The Interstate Commerce Commission gave as its opinion that—

Each branch of the service should contribute its proper share of the cost of operation and of return upon the property devoted to the use of the public.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I do not wish to break up the continuity of the gentleman's thoughts, but I regard his speech this afternoon as one of the best I have ever heard delivered in this House on the subject. I see on page 3 of the bill, in line 24, a clause relating to assistant postmasters. I recall very vividly that both my colleague and myself have gone on record repeatedly as favoring the retention of assistant postmasters within the operation of the civil-service law; and while the present clause relating to assistant postmasters is nowhere near as drastic as was the original one that was presented to the Houe, I want to ask the gentleman how he now feels with regard to the retention of assistant postmasters in the civil service.

Mr. TUTTLE. I regret that I have not time to go into that. I will say, however, that I am, and was in the committee, in favor of the retention of assistant postmasters under the present civil-service arrangement.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Knowing the gentleman's desire to strengthen the civil service, because of his expressions both here and elsewhere, I expected that answer from him, but I was anxious to know what his opinion was.

Mr. MOON. May I interrupt just a moment?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. I am anxious to know from both the gentlemen why it is that they want to make a distinction in favor of assistant postmasters, and why it is they do not want them examined, when the President wants all others except them examined? What excuse is there for saying that you shall not examine assistant postmasters when everybody else has got to be examined? This section carries out the spirit of the civil service. It does not destroy it. It simply destroys an Executive order which does destroy the spirit of the system.

Mr. TUTTLE. I prefer not to be interrupted at this time.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I should like to have time, if I may, to answer the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TUTTLE. My time is very limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey declines to yield at this time.

Mr. TUTTLE. The right of eminent domain enjoyed by the railroads inures as well to the advantage of the public, and in theory and practice railroads pay for this right and should not be held up for additional gratuities for the maintenance of the Postal Service. The protection of the armed forces of the United States in time of strikes is often suggested as a reason for an additional levy upon the railroads, but such an argument is scarcely worthy of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. TUTTLE. I think five minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I yield to the gentleman 5 minutes, or 10 minutes if he desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, the Government should pay a rate compensatory for the service rendered, and I agree with the conclusion of the Wolcott-Loud Commission that—

Not only justice and good conscience, but also the efficiency of the postal service and the best interests of the country demand that the railway mail pay shall be so clearly fair and reasonable that while, on the one hand, the Government shall receive a full quid pro quo for its expenditures and the Public Treasury be not subjected to an improper drain upon its funds, yet, on the other hand, the Railway Mail Service shall bear its due proportion of the expenses incurred by the railroads in the maintenance of their organization and business, as well as in the operations of their mail trains.

It appears to the commission, therefore, that the car-mile compensation for carrying the mails should closely approximate that received for the carriage of passengers. The Interstate Commerce Commission reported that the average operating revenue per car-mile for all classes of passenger-train service was 24.96 cents, and the distinctly passenger revenue—that is, the revenue derived from passenger service, exclusive of the express and mail service—was about 26 cents per car-mile. The Post Office Department's estimates show that the mails are charged 5.78 per cent less of the passenger-train operating expense than the passenger service proper; and assuming that earnings should be proportional to expense, these figures indicate that the difference between passenger and mail earnings per car-mile should be 5.78 per cent. Deducting this percentage from 26, leaves 24.50 cents.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Did your committee have accurate data upon which it could determine, and did determine, the cost of operation per mile of passenger service?

Mr. TUTTLE. We determined it largely upon the figures in Document No. 105, which contains information compiled by the railways for the Post Office Department, and also from statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COX. Document No. 105 is a document compiled by the Post Office Department, based on an investigation which the Post Office Department required the railroads to make back in 1909.

Mr. TUTTLE. That is correct.

Mr. COX. You took that and made your deductions from it?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. COX. So your data was as accurate as the commission were able to get?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. COX. And as accurate as the railway companies were able to furnish the figures?

Mr. TUTTLE. That is correct; and the difference in the expense of carrying the mail and carrying passengers is shown by that report to be 5.78 per cent. This and other deductions convinced the commission that 25 cents per car mile was a fair and compensatory rate to be paid for the railroad transportation of the mails, and a schedule of terminal and line rates was proposed which when prorated to a 60-foot car mile basis produced an equivalent to a payment without land-grant deduction of 24.69 cents per car mile, and after the deduction to 24.22 cents per car mile.

The rates recommended by the commission and the estimated expenditures through the application of those rates is presented in a table which I will include as a part of my remarks.

[1] The number of trips are as tabulated, but this is known to be too large because tabulation was made on basis of railway post office routes instead of car runs. Thus, a car from Washington to St. Louis and return should be charged with only one round trip terminal allowance, but in our tabulation, which was made by division, this was taken as three trips. This would not affect the line charge, but somewhat overstates the terminal charges.

Closed-pouch service taken as consisting of 25 per cent 7-foot units and 75 per cent 3-foot units, which undoubtedly overestimates the proportion of the 7-foot units, and hence the total estimate for closed pouch is too large.

The department bill, or the bill now before us, while embodying the plan worked out by the commission, provides for a lower rate of compensation, and, according to their estimates, under its operation, the car-mile rate will be about 22.73 cents.

For the purpose of comparison I desire to print this estimate also:

[1] Includes 6,000,000 car miles, being the total annual closed-pouch space in exclusive closed-pouch trains carrying such weight of mails, equated to a 60-foot car basis

The department bill continues the weighing of the closed-pouch mails, which the commission believes should be paid for upon the space basis also. While it is true that under their plan there will be a saving in the cost, the saving will be at the expense of the small, weak railroads, who are probably the greatest sufferers under the present system, and who should receive generous rather than parsimonious treatment at the hands of the Government.

There are several other features of this bill at variance with the conclusions of the commission, some of great importance, some relating to important questions of Government policy, but these will be taken up when the bill is under consideration for amendment.

The application of the commission rates, the correctness and fairness of which we are convinced, results in an estimated increase in the total pay for railway mail transportation of possibly $3,000,000 in addition to the cost of the side and transfer service, which should be borne by the Government.

The application of the rates in the bill before us will undoubtedly decrease the total amount of railway mail pay.

For myself I am not so much concerned over the question of a slight increase or decrease in the aggregate amount paid for the great service rendered by the railroads as I am for fair and just action on the part of the Government.

Our duty is to perfect a method and to determine as far as possible what is a just compensation to be paid for the carriage of the mails. The railroads are necessarily dependent upon the fairness of Congress for reasonable conditions. They must carry the mail at any rate and upon almost any terms we may fix. Their refusal would be regarded by the public as a defiance of the Government. Congress, therefore, is under the highest obligation to provide tolerable rates and terms.

The plan we have before us is sound, practical, and intelligible, and although in my judgment it does not provide for adequate compensation for the service of the railroads, although it leaves too much discretion in the hands of departmental officials, although dissenting from its provision in many particulars, I realize that legislation at this time is imperative. I hope the bill will be passed. Its enactment will add to the already long list of the great achievements of the Sixty-third Congress in constructive legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it your understanding that this bill fixes the maximum rates that are to be paid to the railroads?

Mr. TUTTLE. The Moon bill fixes the maximum rates.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And it is your understanding, also, that the Post Office Department is clothed with the authority to fix the minimum rates?

Mr. TUTTLE. Under the "not exceeding" clause.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Yes; under the "not exceeding" clause.

Mr. TUTTLE. They undoubtedly can, though that is not their practice.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And that being the case, the railroads would not be consulted at all, would they?

Mr. TUTTLE. I can not answer for the practice of the department.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If the bill under consideration absolutely fixes the maximum rate and the Post Office Department is clothed with the power to fix the minimum rate, wherein do the railroads have anything to say about it?

Mr. TUTTLE. In my opinion, they will have to accept the judgment of the department.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman regard that as absolutely fair and just?

Mr. TUTTLE. For myself, I do not favor the "not exceeding" phrase as it occurs in the bill. I should prefer to see the authority remain in Congress rather than in the department.

Mr. FOWLER. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Under the Moon bill that is before the committee, the railroads will have the same opportunity to contract for carrying the mail as they do now?

Mr. TUTTLE. I think not; this makes it unlawful for them to refuse.

Mr. FOWLER. They will contract in the same way?

Mr. TUTTLE. I do not understand so.

Mr. FOWLER. Do I understand that the gentleman contends that the railroads will not have anything to say about it?

Mr. TUTTLE. That is my understanding.

Mr. FOWLER. No authority to let contracts hereafter?

Mr. TUTTLE. There may be under other provisions in the bill which give the department authority to make special arrangements to carry the mail by freight or express.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. MOON. It is true that under the bill the railroad companies are bound to carry the mails when ordered by the United States. That is true everywhere. It is also true under the law and the Constitution that if the railroad rates offered by the Government to the roads for payment for carrying the mails are such that they do not desire to carry the mails on the ground that they are confiscatory, that question can be fought out and determined in the courts.

Mr. TUTTLE. My understanding is that the railroads have to perform the service and then appeal to the courts.

Mr. MOON. Not if the railroads are willing to take the chances of not performing them. And is it not true that if you did not use the language, the railroad companies would be at an advantage, and the Government would be at the mercy of the railroads in all these matters?

Mr. TUTTLE. I do not think so.

Mr. MOON. If I may take the gentleman's time a minute, suppose the conditions were such on a route and the conduct of the railroad company was such that they refused to deliver with the proper expedition the mails, the Government would have no power to control them if the language "not exceeding" was not put in the act. They would perform any sort of service and the Government would have to come to Congress to make the railroad take a less rate when they performed an inadequate service.

Mr. TUTTLE. That would be left within the power to fine them for inefficiency.

Mr. FOWLER. The rate at which the mail is to be carried is fixed in the bill. Now, a railroad desiring to carry the mail will enter into a contract with the Government to carry it, although the terms are fixed.

Mr. TUTTLE. There is no contract required.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I think both gentlemen are right in this contention. Under this bill the Government authorizes the space that is to be used. The Government makes the authorization of the space, and there is an implied contract that the railroad company will furnish the space at the price fixed by law, and while there will be no instrument in writing signed by one party and the other by which they agree to carry the mail at a rate fixed, on the other hand there is an implied contract that they will do it, and there is a command of the law that they must do it, and that they must carry it at the rate fixed by law.

Mr. MOON. Is it not like it is now, a statutory contract?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly; it can not be otherwise.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how much time I have used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has used 1 hour and 47 minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD].

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, rarely have I heard a speech on the floor of this House so well prepared as the speech just delivered this afternoon by my colleague and good friend, Mr. TUTTLE. If he had rendered no other service to the people of his district, each of us and all of us, whether we are Democrats or Republicans, might well say that he should be returned to Congress to carry out the mission which he started when he became a member of the great committee in charge of the present bill. [Applause.]

I had not expected to speak on the bill this afternoon, but when the chairman of the committee asked a question of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] relative to section 4 of the bill, which takes assistant postmasters from the protection of the civil service, I felt it my duty, as a Member of this House, to give to the members of the committee my views, which were only settled upon after a careful investigation into this subject.

I had been tendered the postmastership of Jersey City. [Applause.] Events political over which I had no immediate control compelled me to decline the place that was so generously tendered me by the President of the United States. I expected after my term of service concluded here on March 3, 1915, to take upon myself the duties of that position in Jersey City. In order that I might go into office equipped for the service, I investigated the question of retaining assistant postmasters under the protective wing of the civil service. I want to say to the Members here this afternoon that I have devoted days to looking into this question from a practical as well as a theoretical standpoint.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman misapprehends the section. It does not propose to take the postmasters from under the civil service.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I said assistant postmasters.

Mr. MOON. Assistant postmasters. It does not propose that. It simply proposes that they shall be examined for the civil service, and not covered into it by an Executive order, without examination.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, of course the chairman of the committee and myself have no disagreement about what is intended in the bill. We know what is the intention of the chairman of the committee, and I want to say to him that there is not a man on the floor of the House for whom I have greater respect than for the big, generous, and highly efficient chairman of this committee, and if there is one thing in the world that he is known for on both sides of the House, it is being willing always to write down his convictions and stand by them once they are written down. He and I differ radically regarding this question. He thinks that these places belong to Democrats exclusively. I think they belong to men who have been named and, having proved their efficiency, are now learning the lessons that he learned as a youth; that the Democratic Party is willing at all times to protect the men who are in the civil service. And I regret exceedingly that the expression of an opinion contrary to the spirit of the civil service should come from any man on the Democratic side of this Chamber.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman does not seem to comprehend fully the effect of this section. It does not interfere with, but it strengthens the civil-service proposition by requiring a civil-service examination. The gentleman says that I want Democrats. The gentleman is mistaken about that. My preference, of course, would be for Democrats, but I want this open to an examination in accordance with the civil-service law. I do not think that any administration ought to cover twenty-five hundred men of one party into office by Executive order. The Republicans that want these places are as much entitled to a show at them under a competitive examination as the Democrats, and this bill gives them the same show.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair with the gentleman from Tennessee. I honestly think that that is his conviction on the subject, but as a matter of fact, taking it from a practical standpoint, my good friend from Tennessee knows that the Democrats would be given the preference under a Democratic administration, and Republicans would be given preference under a Republican administration.

Mr. MOON. Would not that be a dishonest administration of the civil-service law?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I am not going to answer that. The gentleman has answered it himself. I believe that he is anxious to do the square thing, and all that I want to do in the 20 minutes' time that has been allotted to me is to tell him what I have ascertained as the result of hours of work of investigating into this question.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Suppose this section is a law, worded just as it is, could the gentleman conceive any way, manner, or plan whereby any assistant postmaster could be appointed except through the civil service?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No; I do not believe that I can.

Mr. COX. Then, if this becomes a law, it does not take them out of the civil service, does it?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. It might. It might have that effect in the instance that I have cited to the Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It does take these men out from under the civil service.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois and myself have the same view upon this subject, and I am very glad to say that occasionally our Republican friends in this House are right, and whenever they have been right, I have been willing to stand by them, but that is so seldom that my record has not been tarnished to any appreciable extent.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Do not these positions belong to the people, the same as the post offices?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Why, bless your soul, of course they do. That was the reason I was given one of the places. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that there are various kinds of civil-service positions, and this is one that is placed under the classified civil service, but not under the competitive classified civil service. Is not that true?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. That is true, of course. Everybody knows that. What does the gentleman want to ask?

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that all that this bill seeks is to place these positions under the competitive classified service?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Twenty-five minutes ago the chairman of the committee expressed that much more clearly than the gentleman from Illinois can ever hope to, and I wish that he would let me proceed without interruption.

Mr. FOWLER. One more question. Is it not a fact that if these places are placed under the competitive classified civil service, it will give everybody a chance to take the examination and go in on his merits?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Why, of course, I stated that. Certainly that is the fact.

Mr. FOWLER. Then that makes it a complete civil-service position?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Oh, the gentleman is in error absolutely with regard to that last statement, and I refuse to yield further, because I have only a few minutes remaining. The best portion of my time has been taken up in answering questions that have been disposed of 15 or 20 minutes ago.

Mr. FOWLER. But the gentleman has not disposed of that question by a long shot.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the bill, which otherwise is a very satisfactory measure, should be encumbered with section 3. If the chairman of the committee wanted to take up a subject other than is properly the subject of the bill, I should have been pleased to have the question of the retirement policy for clerks and carriers, whether rural or city, considered. If the same amount of time had been given to the consideration of this important question, I am fully convinced that the bill, even at this time, would have contained a clause granting a measure of relief in the way of retirement to our efficient post-office employees that would be just alike to the Government they serve and to the men who so well serve the Government.

From time to time during the last three months it has been my privilege to insert in the RECORD the policies of various corporations, railroads as well as mercantile, toward their employees regarding the retirement of them after they had served the concern for which they worked faithfully and honestly in the aggregate of 30 years. And let me dwell for a moment on the policy of the public-service corporation in the State of New Jersey. Let me say what they have done for their employees has been followed by the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., and here, the latter part of July, less than two weeks ago, the traction companies of the District of Columbia followed in the wake of the progressive New Jersey corporation and granted to its employees at the end of 30 years of service a retirement plan based upon the number of years which they had served the company, and on the average rate of wage for the last 10 years received by them. And we ask, nay we demand, that the corporations of the country live up to the requirements of the Sherman antitrust law. We demand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like about five minutes more, so much of my time having been taken up by inquiries.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. We demand from the corporations a rigid adherence to the law. We want all business men of America to show the way to the world in business honesty and integrity. Now, I want this Nation of ours to show the way to the world in caring for the men who serve it honestly and faithfully. I recall that in the city of Newark a young man, a resident of my district, went out one day in the holiday season of 1913 with a bag of mail weighing 58 pounds on his shoulder. That young man, going through Broad Street—the principal street of Newark—slipped on the ice and broke his arm. He asked a policeman who was standing by to send for a doctor. His mail bag was by his side. His arm was dressed there in the streets of the city of Newark. He sent a message to the post office asking for a man to come to take his mail bag. When his arm was dressed he reported to the postmaster of Newark, "I am ready with my good arm to help the boys out to deliver the mail that has accumulated during this busy season." [Applause.] This is characteristic of the service that is being rendered to our Government by the men in the post-office service, and when we ask for a retirement plan for men of this character, when we point the way to corporations that have in the past been charged with crime, and they say to this Government, "We are doing this for our employees," we must hang our heads in shame and say, "You may do it, but we will not."

I want to say to the Members of this House that just as surely as to-morrow's sun will rise just so surely will this Government of ours eventually grant an honest, just, and equitable retirement plan not only to the men who carry and deliver our mails but to every man and every woman in the classified service of this Government. And I do not want to see the American Nation shamed into an acceptance of a just and honorable plan. I want to see our Nation do that for its employees which it is endeavoring to do for the world to-day.

That magnificent Jerseyman who stands at this hour in the midst of a great sorrow forgets a dying wife, a loving, loyal helpmate long enough to say to the warring nations of Europe, "Thank God! America is not involved in this strife. If I may be of any service as the President of a nation signatory to The Hague Peace Conference, I offer my services and place them at your disposal toward the end that universal peace may reign throughout the world." [Applause.] And I want to see this House place itself on record, just as we have done among the nations of the world. So may we in a lesser degree show an example to the great corporations of America that we have made an honest, careful, conscientious investigation into this subject and we are convinced that the best service that we can render to the Government is to say to every man and to every woman who comes into our employ, "If you serve us faithfully for 30 years, we will take care of you and your family in the declining years of your life." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as much time as he desires to use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the subject of railway mail pay is rather abstruse in character and difficult to comprehend, and for years, running back almost a generation, it has been on different occasions investigated by special committees of Congress. The history of the carriage of the mails by railroads is rather interesting. When this service was first inaugurated in 1837 the railroads were not to receive more than 25 per cent than that paid for similar conveyance by other means. In 1839 the rate was fixed at the statutory price of $300 per mile for the year, regardless of the amount carried. In 1845 this plan was changed so that the service was divided into three groups, payment being made according to service, according to weight of mails, speed and character of trains, and frequency of service, whereby the railroads were paid for the first grade or the most efficient service $300, for the second grade $100, and for the less frequent service, the third grade, $50 per mile per annum. In 1867 we find the first instance of mails being weighed, and this process has continued until the present time, when it is proposed to substitute a new method entirely. In 1873 the present graduated scale of payment, varying with the average daily weight, was fixed by Congress. The highest rate was for the smallest unit of 200 pounds or less a day, for which the railroads were to receive $50 a year, and graduated according to weight to 5,000 pounds a day, when they were to receive $25 per annum.

In 1876 the various rates in the graduated scale were reduced 10 per cent, and again in 1878 were reduced 5 per cent, and those rates continued as the fixed charges of payment until 1907, when an additional grade was added. Instead of the reduction in the sliding scale of payment stopping at 5,000 pounds, it was raised to 48,000 pounds, and the rates reduced 5 per cent up to the 48,000-pound grade, and in that grade reduced 10 per cent of the former ton rate. Besides this reduction in tonnage pay, the Congress, in 1907, also materially reduced the pay for the so-called railway post-office cars, of which I will speak later.

So to-day, so far as the tonnage rate of pay is concerned, the railroads received for the maximum amount, which is the small unit of 200 pounds daily, $42.75, or its equivalent, on a ton basis of $427, whereas for a ton, where the railroads carry 48,000 pounds daily, the railroads receive $19.24, or less than one-twentieth of the highest price for the smallest unit. I wish to impress upon the committee that this is a graduated scale of payment, prorated and diminishing with the increasing daily average weight, and recognizing the well-established traffic rule that with the increasing weight the cost of the service diminishes.

From the discussions in the press and in periodicals, the public has obtained the idea that the railway mail pay has been increasing inordinately the last several years, when in fact the compensation to the railroads has really been less proportionately, as compared to the gross postal expenditures, than for any other character of service. In 1870, for instance, we paid to the railroads for the carriage of the mails $5,128,000 out of a total expenditure for postal service of $23,998,000, or 21.4 per cent. In 1880, $10,498,000 out of a total of $36,542,000, or 28.7 per cent. In 1890 the percentage of railway mail pay toward the total expenditures was as high as 35 per cent. From that date down the proportion has been gradually decreasing, because, as the statistics show, the weight or tonnage of mail carried on the railroads has been increasing so that they are being paid the ever-lowering graduated rate of pay until that of the last class of 48,000 pounds is reached. So in 1903, for instance, the percentage of railway mail pay toward total postal expenditures was 30 per cent; in 1907, 26.8 per cent; in 1909, 22.4 per cent; in 1910, 21.4 per cent; in 1911, 21.4 per cent; in 1912, 20.4 per cent.

The reason why there has been such a marked decrease in the last few years has been not only due to the fact of the increasing volume of mails carried on the railroads whereby they would obtain this lower rate of pay, but for the further reason that Congress in 1907 reduced the scale of pay 5 per cent in all grades, and an additional 5 or 10 per cent on these higher-weighted routes, and also because we reduced the railway post-office car pay, which is different from the tonnage pay and which I will presently explain, and more decidedly by reason of the establishment by post-office order of the divisor proposition of computing 7 instead of 6 as the divisor for a week to obtain the average daily weight.

At the present time the annual rate of expenditure to the railroads in the four contract sections of the country, as of June 30, 1914, aggregate $50,833,360. That does not include the payment for the railway post-office car service. That is a distinct payment based upon the idea that we should pay them for the space used by the Government in assorting the mails in these cars exclusively used for post-office services. That practice was established in 1873, when the scale of pay for that character of service was $25 per mile per annum for a 40-foot car, $30 for a 45-foot car, $40 for a 55-foot car, and $50 for cars over 55 feet in length. At the time of the general reduction made in 1907, these rates were radically reduced to the present rate, when the Government pays $25 for a $40-foot car, $27.50 for a 45-foot car, $32.50 for a 50-foot car, and for a 55-foot car and over, $40.

You have heard much discussion on the floor of this House in times past to the effect that we have been paying an extraordinary amount for the use of these so-called railway post-office cars, the cost of which averages about $12,000. It has been estimated that the railroads receive for each car $3,400 a year for that special pay for space used. That $25 per line per car for a 40-foot car or $40 for a 55-foot car is for a complete line of going and return, or one-half of that amount for carriage one way. On the proposed basis the compensation to the railroad for the use of a railway post-office car will be largely in excess of the present rate. Under the present basis, in addition to the pay for the rental of these cars and the haulage of them, they receive the tonnage pay for the weight of mail which is carried in them, which averages about 2½ to 3 tons to a car, making the average returns for those cars in the neighborhood of 18 and a fraction cents per mile per car per annum.

In the current Post Office appropriation bill we provide for railway mail pay based on tonnage rates $56,188,000 and for railway post-office car rates $5,412,000, or a total of $61,600,000. The proposition that is presented to the House is a most radical departure from anything that has ever been presented to the Congress for the payment of railroads for the carriage of mail.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. STAFFORD. With pleasure.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has known for years, because he has made several speeches on this subject, that one of the railroads' contentions in regard to the justification for the use of a full railway post-office car was not the amount of mail transported but the hauling of space used in the distribution of the mails. Now, with the adoption of this plan proposed, that philosophy passes necessarily, because we are going to pay under this new plan as much for the transportation of mail or more for storage cars than distributing cars?

Mr. STAFFORD. We are going to pay 1 cent less for the storage cars.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood it was 22 cents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the bill as amended we are to pay 21 cents per car per mile for one railway post-office car of 60 feet in length, whereas for storage cars we are to pay 20 cents—1 cent less.

Mr. MURDOCK. Inasmuch as we now pay almost as much for the transmission of the mail in a storage car as we do in a distributing car, that old philosophy of haulage of space for distribution disappears, does it not?

Mr. STAFFORD. The railroads emphasize, as a justification for that charge—and it is well bottomed—that we are paying for the haulage and not the mere use of the cars, and the new plan is in consonance with the position of the railroads in that particular rather than in opposition. If the railroads were furnishing a car for use on a siding the year around, they could well afford to let the Government have it for merely the cost of depreciation and for a return on the investment of 6 per cent. But the gentleman realizes that the railroads must be compensated for the wheelage charge.

As developed in the hearings had before the joint committee, the actual cost of transportation—that is, the cost of the operation of passenger cars per passenger train per car mile—is 19.41 cents, whereas under the existing return to the railroads for these railway post-office cars, including not only the rental or haulage charge, but also the pay for weight of mails carried, is only 18.84 cents, or 57 cents less than the cost of operation alone; so that the claim frequently made on the floor of the House that this is an outrageous charge to be paid to the railroads for the carriage of these railway post offices lacks any foundation in fact whatever. The new basis as presented by the committee follows out that theory of paying to the railroads on the basis of space 21 cents for a full railway post-office car of 60 feet in length, 10½ cents for an apartment car of 30 feet in length, 5½ cents for an apartment of 15 feet, and paying for storage cars at the rate of 20 cents per mile on the basis of a 60-foot car.

It may be interesting to present some figures to the House which have not been presented heretofore in the discussion of this matter as to the respective amounts that develop from these respective characters of service.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the gentleman goes into that, do I understand him to say—I want to get it correct—that under the proposed plan we will pay more for a full railway post-office car than we pay now?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that. As disclosed in the hearings had before the joint committee, the returns to the railroads to-day for a full railway post-office car, including not only the rental charge, to which I have referred, but also including the average return for the average weight which is carried in the railway post-office car for the separation of the mail en route, averaging from 2½ to 3½ tons per car——

Mr. MURDOCK. Paid for by weight?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the return paid for the weight, according to the usual method of tonnage pay, is 18.84 cents, whereas the cost of the actual operation of that car, according to the figures prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is 19.41 cents, so that, so far as this railway post-office service is concerned, the Government has been receiving a service for which it has not fully compensated the railroads.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the gentleman was going to develop the apartment service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. What is the objection to the Government owning its own railway post-office cars?

Mr. STAFFORD. Before this proposition of changing the basis of railway-mail pay was so suddenly thrown upon the committee—and it was a suggestion that came without a moment's notice to the members of the committee—it was proposed and included as a part of the Post Office appropriation supply bill this year that the Government should begin the experimentation of owning these railway post-office cars. But that involves the whole question of Government ownership. What advantage is it to the Government to build and equip these cars if we can have the railroads furnish them? We would be obliged, if the Government owned these cars, to go into the business of car building; we would have to establish plants in various districts of the country for the repair of cars. If anyone had studied the question of Government ownership, he knows that the cost is much greater under Government ownership than under private ownership. He knows that a great plant can be much more economically run under private ownership than under Government ownership, and there is nothing that demonstrates that so positively as the Postal Service itself.

I have stated here before, and I repeat it again, that there has been less progress in this Postal Service than in any other business corporation of like character under private management. There have been no real additions to the service except in the last two years, when we introduced the parcel post and the postal savings adjuncts, since the time of the Wanamaker régime, when he installed the special delivery and the pneumatic-tube system. Truly, we have grown, but we have grown along red-tape lines. There has been a marked growth in the Postal Service in the past 20 years, but it has been merely an enlargement. If the gentleman will stop and think for a minute as to the difference in cost under private ownership as compared with Government ownership, he will see that it is much greater under the latter. In addition, there is little progression under Government ownership; there is lacking the incentive that distinguishes the individualistic from the socialistic standard.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The gentleman has stated the practice that has obtained in certain portions of the country, and——

Mr. STAFFORD. I yielded to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. You stated the proposition that the postal agency is not efficient as compared with private agencies. Now, has the gentleman any data of a comparable character on which to base or by which to confirm that statement?

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the rural carrier service as an example to show the inequality of payment that prevails there. I do not wish to be diverted on this line; I will only branch off on it for a moment. Here we have the rural carriers in different parts of the country performing different kinds of service. In the North and far West under severely adverse conditions, and in the balmy and sunny South under much more favorable conditions. The rural carriers receive no added compensation for the service rendered under adverse conditions. They receive the same uniform payment, regardless of the amount or character of the service performed, and so on down the line. There is uniformity in pay, it is true, but it is not based upon the character of service performed. I could go on and multiply other instances to illustrate the point.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. How are you going to regulate the service on a uniform basis under those circumstances?

Mr. STAFFORD. It should be regulated according to the amount of service performed by the carrier, whether he is carrying large quantities or small quantities. To-day one rural mail carrier starting from a large city district will be loaded down from day to day, requiring three or four horses to perform the service, whereas in other parts of the country having good roads the service can be performed on a motor cycle.

Mr. CLINE. I understood that the gentleman mentioned the weather as one of the elements in the equation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Surely the gentleman does not want to intimate that you can regulate the pay of a rural mail carrier according to the weather?

Mr. STAFFORD. You can regulate the pay according to the amount of service the carrier performs and also according to the amount of expense to which he is subjected. If the mail service were a private establishment the rural carrier would very likely receive compensation for the horses and for the expense he is put to, whereas now there is this inequality of payment to which I have referred.

Mr. CLINE. There can not be any question but that that feature ought to be recognized as to the amount of service rendered, but you certainly can not introduce the weather into the equation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman well recognizes that in the North, where we have very severe winters and plenty of snow, it is much more arduous and much more taxing on the horses to convey the rural mail than it is in the South, where they do not have those conditions, and that it is much harder to carry the rural mail in a mountainous country than it is in the plains States, where they have no bad roads whatsoever.

I wish now to go on from the point where I was temporarily diverted in explaining the respective amounts paid for these various services.

For the full railway post-office service it is estimated by the Post Office Department that at the rate of 21 cents per mile for a 60-foot car there will be paid $21,692,000; for apartment-car service, at the rate of 10½ cents for 30 feet, there will be paid $17,398,000; for apartments of 15 feet or less there will be paid $4,137,000; for storage cars, $10,283,000; or a total of $53,510,000.

These rates do not include the compensation that is intended for terminal service. We intend to pay the railroads for initial and terminal service at the rate of $2 per car, both for the initial service and the terminal service, the terminal service being for the loading and unloading of the car by railroad employees and the initial service being for the shunting of the car from the yard to the station and to the train, making for the round trip $8 for a railway post-office car and the same for a storage car of 60 feet in length, and at a proportional rate for cars of lesser size.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will there be any instances where there will be an initial charge but not a terminal charge?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; in every instance there will be both initial and terminal. The gentleman can conceive some instances where there will be terminal services for which there will be no compensation, and if I am in error I wish to be corrected by the gentlemen of the joint commission who are present. For instance, in my home city of Milwaukee, located on the Chicago-Minneapolis division, the route is from Chicago to Minneapolis. The mails are loaded and unloaded by the railroad company at Milwaukee without receiving any compensation for that service. If I am in error, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman is entirely in error. There is an initial and a terminal charge in every case.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to put the case very clearly. The route starts at Chicago and goes to Minneapolis. The railroad company receives $4 at Chicago, $2 for initial and $2 for terminal, and also when it reaches Minneapolis it receives $2 terminal and $2 initial; but it receives nothing for the dispatch of the mails and the loading of the mails at the intermediate points.

Mr. LLOYD. Of course, in no case is that true. The initial charge is when the train starts. The terminal charge is when it reaches the end of its route.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the railroad company performs the same character of service at the intermediate points, so far as dispatch and receipt of mail is concerned. That is a service for which it receives no compensation.

Mr. LLOYD. I understand that; but the gentleman said there was no initial and terminal charge. There is some initial and terminal charge in every kind of service.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had paid close attention to what I said, he would recall that I said there is no return to the railroad for the terminal work en route after the car starts.

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly not, because that is not initial and terminal work.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there is service performed by the railroad company at these respective stations for which they receive no compensation.

Mr. LLOYD. There is no initial service performed, because the initial service is cleaning and lighting the car, and switching the car and placing it in position. No service of this kind is rendered en route.

Mr. MURDOCK. If it is a full railway post-office car running from Washington to Baltimore, that car would receive $2 at Washington and $2 at Baltimore, and then on its return trip would earn an additional $2 at Baltimore and a final $2 at Washington, or $8 for the round trip.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; $8 for the single complete trip. Let me explain, $2 for the terminal and $2 also for the initial charge at Washington, and the same amount at the end of the trip at Baltimore; and again, if another car is added to the train at any place en route, that car would undoubtedly receive both initial and terminal compensation.

I wish, now, to give the total amount for terminal cost, as estimated, not giving the amounts seriatum for the respective characters of service, but giving the total amounts as determined by the department. The terminal cost is estimated at $4,500,970, making a grand total, with the $53,510,768 for line cost, of $58,011,738. The total railway car mileage of all the respective services aggregates 256,367,234 miles, which makes the average rate 22.63 cents for both line and terminal service. That will be the return to the railroads per car mile for these respective services. This rate, as I understand it, is predicated by the department and by the committee upon the average revenue to the railroads for passenger-car mile service, which in 1911, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission report, was 25.43 cents; in 1912, 24.92 cents; and prior to that time the average was estimated to be 25.43 cents. That is, the average return to the railroads for each passenger car for each mile traveled was these amounts. It is generally conceded that there should be a reduction of 10 per cent from the returns for passenger-car service to that for pay to railroads for carrying the mail. Ten per cent of this 24 or 25 cents would be 2.4 or 2.5 cents, which brings the amount somewhere near the rate as proposed by the Government. If I am in error, I would be pleased to be corrected by either member of the joint committee who are honoring me by listening to my remarks. That 10 per cent reduction follows the suggestion of M. O. Lorenz, who is the associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission and who has given more study to this question than any other person outside of the committee connected with the investigation of this subject. It is only proper in this connection to call attention to one remark he makes in the very beginning of the report, where he says, on page 850 of the hearings:

> On the basis of the commercial principle the conclusion is reached that 22½ cents for a 60-foot mail car hauled 1 mile, with a separate payment for side and terminal services, would constitute a fair adjustment for the first year, being an increase over the present rate of pay, but still probably an underpayment, the exact determination of a fair rate being left to be decided after more complete experience and statistics have been gained.

There are some other rates that confirm the position of the joint committee and of the department in accepting the figures of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the average revenue returns to the railroads on passenger traffic as the proper basis for the determination of the rate of mail pay in this instance.

I have here a large number of figures giving a compilation of payment to the railroads for a similar character of service for the hauling of private passenger cars and also for hauling loaded baggage cars. I am not going to burden the House by a recital of the rates. They vary in respect to the character of the service, but I am going to point out this pertinent case. That is, the Pennsylvania and New York Central Railroads charge for a special baggage car loaded, which is the nearest instance I think we have to a full mail car, or what is known as a storage car, 25 cents per mile. When the distance is from 500 to 625 miles, they charge $125, that being based on the smaller distance for 500 miles; and for 625 miles and over the rate is 20 cents per mile.

The Pennsylvania and New York Central Railroads, well recognized by everybody to have the best accounting systems in the country, make a charge of 25 cents for a loaded baggage car for any distance under 500 miles when offered, no matter by whom, and I think it is safe to assume that the rates as based by the department and the committee as a foundation upon which to proceed in this matter is not an unfair rate to the railroads.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Under what circumstances did they make a charge of 25 cents per car mile for baggage service?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not all the details before me.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. What kind of service was it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps I was not explicit enough. It was for a special baggage car loaded, to be carried for any private person. I assume, for instance, that theatrical companies sending scenery and trunks, and it may be that they require more than one car, maybe two, and they would charge for each extra car loaded 25 cents per mile in addition to the passenger rate of the theatrical company, which is entirely independent of this question.

I have here the rate charged on all the railroads of the country, as shown by the statistics compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and although they vary from 25 to 30 cents per mile in many instances for the carriage of a private passenger car, to a flat rate based on a certain minimum number of passengers, the most pertinent case that I could find as a justification for the basis of the unit adopted by the joint committee was the rate established by the Pennsylvania and New York Central of 25 cents for the special baggage car.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. And they have to haul it back empty for nothing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman knows that the railroads usually arrange so as to have it come back loaded. They have that fine arrangement where they do not lose much by empty car haulings. I have not referred in my review of the bill to pay for the closed-pouch service, which is to be determined virtually under the old rate of payment. That amounts in the aggregate to $2,230,000. In closing permit me to call attention to the aggregate amount estimated by the department to be paid to the railroads for all character of services, including that to be sent by freight, under the bill which is presented for consideration. The total pay in 1915 will amount to $62,221,191, or about $625,000 more than the amount carried in the present Post Office bill for that year.

As I said at the outset, or intended to say, and as has been so frequently said before, everybody recognizes that the present basis of pay—that is, on the tonnage basis—is archaic.

No one knows which railroads receive more than they should. No one knows which railroads receive less. It is not scientific. Congress has grappled with it, but when we have reduced the rates of pay on occasions, certainly in 1907, it was merely a wild guess that was made to reduce the total pay to the railroads on those lines which the Congress and the committee believed were receiving too much pay, especially those carrying more than 48,000 pounds of mail daily the year around. The joint committee now presents a scientific proposition. I recognize that there is danger of abuse. I recognize that the department officials in the administration of this new system—and I wish to emphasize that at this time, because we are about to pass this bill and adopt this system—may find that abuse will arise in not having all of the space utilized. Any person who is acquainted with the history of the Postal Service during the last 10 years knows that there were many instances where full railway post-office service was put into use when there was no need for it, that there were additional cars used, involving an expenditure in some instances of half a million dollars, when there was no need for that service. We must leave it to the postal employees. There will be no incentive on their part to crowd their cars. Their main idea will be to place the mail in the storage cars, so that it can be easily reached when it has to be sorted en route. Certainly there will not be that incentive to have the storage cars crowded, as is sometimes the case at present, to 50 tons, as the interest now of the railroad employees is to fill the cars to their maximum limit. Under the new plan it will be to the interest of the railroads to have as many cars or as much space utilized as is possible, and the only thing that makes me pause in advocacy of this new system is the danger of its abuse.

We all know that if it had not been for the inauguration of the parcel post this new plan would never have been presented at this time. We know that if the present rate of pay is continued in force, if this plan is not adopted, that inside of two years or three years, when all of the railroads of the country will be receiving their proper return for the additional burden of the parcel post, there will be a deficit, a growing deficit in the postal revenues. Let me elaborate in one particular as to that phase of it. Here is the fourth contract section, the far Western States, where the railroads up to June 30 last were receiving $17,210,000 for the carriage of the mail. The mails have been weighed this past season in that district as the basis of the pay for the next four years. Prior to the establishment of the parcel post it was the plan of the Post Office Department to figure an increase of 4 per cent each year, or 16 per cent of the total amount for the additional pay to the railroads resulting from the usual increase of mail from business development. Since the establishment of the parcel post, the department has estimated 24 per cent increase instead of 16 per cent increase for the four-year period, and I am informed by the Post Office officials that in some instances, notably those lines running out of San Francisco, the mail has increased 50 per cent over the weighings four years ago, by reason of the parcel post. Next year comes the weighing in the third contract section, that great Middle West section, west of Pennsylvania and running out to the Rocky Mountains, including the Dakotas, and running as far south as the Ohio River, and including the State of Missouri, where the mail pay at present is $16,736,000, and where they are receiving no compensation to speak of—oh, a half million dollars or thereabouts—for this added parcel post, where the added tonnage runs into hundreds of thousands of pounds. I venture to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the railroads are carrying parcel post there to the extent of $2,000,000 for which they are not receiving any pay at all. If the present schedule of pay continues, instead of paying the railroads $16,736,000 after June 30 of next year, we will be paying them $21,000,000 and perhaps $22,000,000.

This proposal for a change in method of railway mail pay has been occasioned by the introduction of the parcel post. If we had not inaugurated that system, with might and main I would have opposed this proposed plan, because I recognize that the old plan of paying on the tonnage basis safeguarded the interests of the public as well as they could be safeguarded. But we have a condition confronting us. We have gone into the express-carrying business, we have gone into the freight-carrying business, and we must recognize the existing practices in paying for the haulage of freight and express. While express payment is not based on space, yet it is largely predicated on that idea. Freight charges on carload lots are based on that idea. As we have gone into this new feature, which is adding to the Postal Service the carriage of merchandise mail, we have to meet the conditions.

From my review of this subject in the time I have been able to give it, apart from the consideration of other matters, I am willing, in view of the investigations made, to support this proposition. I only fear, as I said, that it will be abused; that the total amount will mount up in time to come, because of the lack of scrutiny, of the want of private interest on the part of our Government employees to take advantage of filling the car space to the maximum; that it will grow and grow until it will mount very high.

We might as well recognize conditions as they are. With the joint committee advocating higher rates than were proposed by the department, if the bill is finally adopted, the rates that we are now agreeing to will not be the rates that will be finally enacted into law when it is returned from another body, and when the bill will carry four, five, or more million dollars for total railway mail pay. But the plan is scientific. If it is abused, the fault will lie at the door of the Government, through neglect or default of our Government employees. We have to keep up with the parcel post; we can not depart from it. It is established, and no one to-day would advocate a recession of that service to the public. And so, as I said a few moments ago, I am going to support and vote for this proposition. As to the other substantive propositions of the bill, 12 or more, I will reserve discussing them until their consideration under the five-minute rule. I wish to thank the committee for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee occupy some time now?

Mr. MOON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to address myself to the consideration of naval affairs, but under the special rule adopted a few days ago for the consideration of this bill the debate is limited to the subject matter of the bill now under consideration, so what I have to say will be confined to it.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] in his remarks criticized one of the features of the bill—that portion which deals with assistant postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, and which provides that they shall be placed under the competitive classified civil service. Undoubtedly he does not understand the full meaning of this section. I have always had a high regard for him, but from his remarks and his answers to certain questions propounded to him by me and other Members of the House concerning the object of this part of the bill he does not know anything about the question. [Laughter.] He seems to have lost his balance and his respect for Members who prodded him with questions. In his remarks he stated that he was tendered the post office at Jersey City, N. J., by the President, but that he declined it. If he does not know anything more about the duties of a postmaster than he does about the civil service, I am inclined to think that he was justified in declining it.

There are several degrees in the civil service as it has been administered, but the gentleman does not seem to have acquainted himself with them, as he does not seem to know the difference between a half-grown civil-service status and a full-grown status. We have the classified, the nonclassified, the competitive, and noncompetitive classified, and we have the Panama Canal civil-service positions, all of which have a definite meaning; but the gentleman does not seem to know the difference between them and becomes alarmed at the provisions of this bill dealing with this question.

We have about 2,560 assistant postmasters in the first, second, and third class post offices now, all of whom are not under the civil service; only those who are serving in first and second class post offices are under the civil service. The clerks of first and second class post offices are required to take a competitive civil-service examination, and the majority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in their wisdom, have come to the conclusion that assistant postmasters should do likewise. So section 3 of the bill now before us provides that the Postmaster General shall require all applicants for assistant postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive order heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, after the passage of this act.

This provision does not lessen the force of the civil-service law, but it adds to it and makes it more complete. While I am not in sympathy with the civil-service law because of its tendency to create life tenure in office, which is undemocratic, yet if we are to have a civil-service system in America it should be based upon rules of fairness and equity. A civil service which puts in office men only of one political party for life is most unfair and should not be tolerated by a liberty-loving people; but a civil-service which gives all, regardless of politics, an opportunity to enter a competitive examination, the highest applicant winning the prize, is more equitable. Yet it can not be justified unless there is a limitation placed upon the time of the service.

According to a report I received from the Civil Service Commission, the civil-service positions on June 30, 1912, were divided as follows:

Competitive classified	236,061
Noncompetitive classified	61,388
Unclassified	59,423
Panama Canal	28,191
Total	385,063

On June 30, 1912, by Executive order, President Taft placed 36,332 fourth-class postmasters under the classified civil service, covering in for life all who were then in office without requiring an examination. Soon after President Wilson was inaugurated he, by Executive order, placed all these postmasters under the competitive classified civil service. Had such order not been made the people would have had no chance to change any of the fourth-class postmasters during their lives, except by removal on charges, by death, or by resignation. By President Wilson's order all fourth-class postmasters whose salary is $180 and more are required to take a competitive civil-service examination except those who have a civil-service status by virtue of the Executive order of President Roosevelt in 1908. Under his order all fourth-class postmasters whose salaries fell below $500 a year were not required to take a competitive civil-service examination, and wherever vacancies occurred a post-office inspector was sent to the community where the office was located and he selected a man, recommended him to the Post Office Department for appointment, which was usually made. Under this system the Republican administrations have been able to fill not only all fourth-class post offices but all other civil-service positions with Republicans for life.

When this administration came into power we found about 400,000 Federal positions under the civil service, 95 per cent of which were filled by Republicans, and only 5 per cent filled by Democrats. The method by which this unfairness was carried on can not be justified, because it savored of too much politics. What is known as the "spoils system," or "To the victor belongs the spoils," is much more creditable because it is founded upon the principle of reward for political service. A system of civil service which is purely political is a sham and a disgrace. If we can not improve former methods resorted to under the guise of civil service, it would be far better to repeal the law and go back to the old system of giving the Federal positions to faithful party workers. If the civil service is unable to reform former political methods of putting in office men of the dominant party, then there is no virtue in it and its life-tenure feature adds an evil which will rise up in the future like an ungovernable child to plague us, as a menace to a republican form of government. If we keep on, it will not be long until practically all of the Federal positions will be under civil service with life tenure. There are but few left now. Men who now hold these positions claim them as their own the same as if they were chattels. Soon we will find these public servants changing from servants to masters, and we will have a job on our hands then. I feel quite sure that the time will come when we will see the error of life tenure in these public places, although some of them do have small salaries. I favor a law limiting the number of years which can be held consecutively by anyone in the civil service. We will then not only get rid of the evil of life tenure but we will get better service.

All public servants should be required to answer to some responsible body for the manner in which they have discharged the duties of the positions which they hold. All public offices and all public positions belong to the people, and those who are placed in such places are public servants of the people, and, in my opinion, they should answer directly to the people at stated and definite periods for the discharge of the duties committed to their care in all cases where it is practicable, and, when not practicable, they should answer indirectly to the people through some one or some commission who are elected directly by the people and who have the appointing power. Men who are kept in office for life soon forget the people and become indifferent, arrogant, and dictatorial. Life tenure in office is a relic of imperial government, based upon the false theory that kings can do no wrong and their right to rule is divine. Our Federal judges furnish an example of the evil of life tenure. The conduct of some of them has been so corrupt that they have been impeached, convicted, and thrown out of office in disgrace, while the judges of the States who are elected by the people rarely go astray.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, as the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads stated this afternoon, the position of the Post Office Department with reference to the railway mail pay is clearly set forth in this bill. After I addressed the committee this afternoon some one asked me to state the position of the railroads with reference to this bill. I hold in my hand a letter, of which I suppose every Member of the House received a copy, addressed to the chairman of the committee by Ralph Peters, chairman of the committee on railway mail pay, dated July 1, this year, and without objection I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

Mr. MOON. What is that which is going to be put in the RECORD?

Mr. LLOYD. He is going to have a letter read in his own time.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY MAIL PAY,
New York, July 1, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Committee on Railway Mail Pay, representing 264 railroads, operating 218,000 miles of line in the United States, has been urged by the presidents and other executive officers of the railroads throughout the country to appeal to you and through you to the representatives of the people in Congress assembled for fair treatment in fixing any basis of compensation for the handling of the mails.

A personal effort was made by members of this committee to secure from you a hearing on the bill recently introduced in Congress by your committee, but without success; therefore we submit this open letter.

We desire to protest against the method of paying the railroads for the valuable service rendered the Government, as contemplated in House bill No. 17042.

Our first and logical reason for making this protest to you is that this question is now pending before a joint congressional committee, which has had the whole subject under most careful consideration continuously for more than two years, and has announced that it is about ready to make its report. The introduction of bill No. 17042, in effect, forestalls the report of this joint committee and commits Congress before the results of that investigation are made known.

The joint committee of Congress is a bipartisan body, and the Post Office Department has had the fullest opportunity of presenting the views of its officials before it, many of them having appeared as witnesses. The railroad companies have been called upon at great expense to furnish complete detailed information regarding their mail service, and the evidence introduced, occupying 12 volumes, is thought to embody the most complete and exhaustive testimony that has ever been collected on the subject. The passage of House bill No. 17042 would practically ignore the action of your own joint committee.

This is the fourth bill which the Post Office Department has framed and recommended on this subject within the past two years, each differing materially from the others.

Its first notable announcement was that, upon the basis of the statistics which it had published, the railroads of the country were overpaid $9,000,000 per year for carrying the mails, a conclusion reached by excluding from the consideration of cost any return upon the capital used and employed by the companies in conducting the mail service. So glaring was this error that the department was compelled to rectify it and modify its claim of overpayment down to $221,000 in testimony before the joint congressional committee.

The proposed bill will, in our opinion, reduce the compensation of the railroads for carrying the mails several million dollars annually, while we are now underpaid at least $15,000,000 per year for the service we render.

The compensation for carrying the mails on the basis of weight and distance has shown a large growth, due to the reweighing in two sections of the country. The appropriation bill adopted in March, 1914, provides for this growth, but House bill No. 17042 makes a basis that will produce several million dollars less pay than has been provided in that appropriation bill.

There are two sections of the country where the mails have not been weighed since the parcel post was introduced, and it is inconsistent to make a new basis of pay that will not fully provide for the large growth of the mails in those sections. Furthermore, there has been a very large increase in the weights of mail in the first section that was weighed after the inauguration of the parcel post, and no allowance has been made for that service.

If the proposed new basis of pay has been figured out at rates that will produce approximately the compensation paid under the weight basis, the rates should not be adopted until the weights and compensation for same have been ascertained for the entire country by a simultaneous weighing in all sections.

When the parcel-post legislation was enacted and the railroads petitioned the department for a weighing so that they might secure full compensation for carrying this greatly added volume of traffic on their passenger trains the answer given by the department was "Wait until the congressional committee makes its report."

The railroad companies do not favor the adoption of any space basis for ascertaining what is proper compensation for carrying the mails. The mails are freight, and they are becoming more and more so as the weight of the parcel post increases and the Government enters more and more into competition with the railroads in the carriage of commercial freight.

Space in cars under complete control of officials of the Post Office Department as a basis of payment for this service is an anomaly; it will not fit your mail service, and in our opinion it will tend to the reduction of facilities and general inefficiency.

In this service the Government is a shipper, and no other shipper demands the right to fix his own rates. It uses the facilities of the companies in competing with their own service, and in view of the published intimations of greatly added revenue from the carriage of parcel post common fairness would seem to demand that the railroad companies should be permitted to share in the increased revenues that the Government collects from the people for the use of these facilities.

The wiser policy, it seems to us, will consist in modifications and improvements of the existing system, based, as that system is, upon the method of compensating railroads for carrying freight that is universally recognized as sound; such modifications to be an annual weighing of the mails, payment for the use and haulage of apartment post-office cars, relief from the messenger service, and other reforms.

We have no means of knowing what the report of the joint congressional committee will be, nor what basis of mail pay it will recommend, but we feel that we can nevertheless consistently urge that no action upon this very important subject, involving such radical departures from existing law and practice, be taken without at least having the complete testimony giving the reasons for the position taken by the railroads, as well as the conclusions of your joint committee laid before Congress.

Knowing that Congress appreciates the fact that the railroads are a vital and necessary part of the life and prosperity of the country, and therefore entitled to fair treatment and full compensation for the valuable and indispensable services they perform for the people, we, the operating men, who are responsible for the daily workings of these great arteries of traffic, respectfully ask that you consider their side of the question, as well as that of the Post Office Department, before you reach your conclusions. The people are fair, and we believe their representatives desire to be so. House bill No. 17042 is not fair.

Respectfully,

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY MAIL PAY,
By RALPH PETERS, Chairman.

(Representing 264 railroads operating 218,000 miles of line in the United States.)

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the letter which has just been read expressed the views of the railroads with reference to the pending legislation at the time the letter was written—July 1. I have received no information in the way of a letter or public document as to what their views are since the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have submitted additional amendments to the bill which will increase the pay of the railroads, as I understand, about $3,000,000, and doubtless no other Member of Congress has received any further information.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the railroads did not ask for any hearing from the committee, as stated in that letter, until long after this bill was reported to the House. Heretofore they have had very ample hearings upon that question before the committee and also a very lengthy hearing before the joint committee of the two Houses on the subject. They have been fully heard all along, and their purpose is nothing but delay.

Of course, if this matter is postponed until there can be a report from the joint committee, there can be no legislation enacted at this session. That seems to be the only purpose. The statements contained in the letter as to the losses to the railroads are such that I am obliged to enter my protest against them as statements of fact, in the light of the knowledge that is before the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized for 15 minutes.

[Mr. COX addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF MRS. WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death of Mrs. Wilson, the wife of the President of the United States. I think the House wishes to show a proper mark of respect at this time, and I therefore move the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 586.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we stand speechless to-day under the shadow of a national sorrow. In the departure of the companion of our Chief Executive we are led by a way that we knew not and suffer a great grief we looked not for. But we can not doubt the wisdom of Thy mysterious providence. Thy purposes are hid from us, but Thou art the same merciful Lord who doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men. Give us the spirit of humble submission to Thy divine ordering, and may the consolations of Thy grace be given to Thy servants in the grief-stricken home. May they be strengthened by that blessed hope that cometh from above and by the devotion and sympathy in the hearts of all our people. We ask it for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise to a statement of personal privilege.

There never is any excuse for a grown man when he loses his temper, and nothing can be said in justification of it; but sometimes something may be said in extenuation. I shall not even attempt the latter task.

Two or three days ago I was much angered by this outbreak of senseless war, setting all Europe aflame, and feeling mad all over, down to the very bottom of my shoes, and somewhat sick and irritable, too, I lost my temper; and about the only excuse for it is voluntarily to mention the fact.

What I did I intended to do deliberately and I intend to persist in it, because of the variance of opinion between a majority of the committee and myself as to the immediacy of the emergency that is resting upon us. That variance is so great that I can not serve upon the committee in justice to myself. But there was no sort of excuse at all for my going any further than merely asking to be relieved from duty on the committee. What I did seems to me justified, but my manner of doing it was not.

I realize that I ought not to have used some rather strong adjectives which I did use. I was very much pleased to pick up the RECORD the next day, which was brought to me while I was in bed sick, and to see the very kind words that were uttered concerning me by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I regret as much as he does to part service and company with the members of a committee upon which I have tried to do good work, and upon which I have seen a great many others do good work. But it did not seem to me that it was necessary to take seven days or to refer to a subcommittee the proposition to express the judgment of the Senate that we sympathized with the President in any effort he might make for universal peace. I felt that that ought not to have required seven minutes. I felt then and I feel now that of itself forms a breach of opinion between me and the majority of the committee that is simply unbridgeable. But I want to say there was no excuse for one to lose his temper. When one loses his temper one loses his head. The chief person to regret it is myself. That goes without saying. It is the first time in a long period of public service that I ever lost my temper in public. I hope it will be the last time.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the desk two telegrams, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 31, 1914.

Hon. J. A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Believe bill introduced to-day by Chairman ALEXANDER to remove five-year limitation in Panama act is simplest, most practical method to meet grave shipping emergency. It is free from neutrality complications or subsidy objections and deserves nonpartisan support.

AMERICAN EXPORTER.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 6, 1914.

Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

New Orleans Board of Trade is on record in favor of the enactment of such legislation as will permit foreign vessels owned by American citizens and American corporations to be transferred to the American flag. We now reiterate our indorsement of this policy, with the view of restoring our American merchant marine, and respectfully urge that no limitations of a restricted nature be made that would prevent the various steamships owned by American citizens and American corporations from availing themselves of the privilege to be granted under this law. We feel that the time is now opportune to restore the American merchant marine to the seas, and hope that Congress in its wisdom will pass proper legislation without delay.

NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE,
JEFF D. HARDIN, President.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5734) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909, to the State of Kansas, and I submit a report (No. 731) thereon. The bill simply proposes to extend the enlarged homestead law to the State of Kansas, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 438), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

2. The amount required for the operation of Government dredges, plants, and other equipment for further improvements on river and harbor work heretofore adopted by Congress, after making allowance for balances on hand, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a short editorial from the Oregon Sunday Journal of August 2, 1914, having reference to the importance of the passage of the river and harbor bill, both as an economic proposition involving the transportation question and a matter of economy because of the necessity for the continuation of the projects now under way, but which will otherwise necessarily be discontinued by reason of a lack of funds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

UNDERLINED WITH GOLD.

The Mississippi system of waterways is the Nation's greatest natural asset. The Spaniards dreamed no idle dream when they pictured the great trunk river as underlined with gold. The Mississippi system affords a source of wealth, boundless in extent and immeasurable to the human understanding. John Law beheld it and went mad over the idea of its possibilities. But, while Congress talks and certain Senators sputter over the rivers and harbors bill, all Government work on the world's greatest natural waterway has closed down.

Second to the Mississippi system is the Columbia. In its possibilities for saving transportation money to the people it, too, is underlined with gold.

But Government work for increasing its navigability is shutting down, while Senators at Washington are knifing the rivers and harbors bill. The operations at Celilo closed down Friday and will remain stagnated until another rivers and harbors bill is passed, a process that will tie up millions already spent by the Government on the project for a whole year if no rivers and harbors measure passes at this session.

In two weeks the work at the mouth of the river will also cease. The $500,000 contributed by the people of Portland and Astoria to keep the work going until Congress could provide further funds will then be exhausted and the work remain at a standstill until Congress acts, whether it be at the present session or a year hence.

And it is so all over the country. Great Government operations are to remain idle with Congress splitting hairs over nothings and straining at gnats while swallowing camels.

The Spaniards were right. Every waterway in the United States in its possibilities is literally underlined with gold. The shapes of mountain lakes are no more surely fixed by their rocky shores than the possibilities of profitable production are determined by facilities for transportation. Transportation affects everything every human being buys or sells, everything he eats or wears; in fact, everything he uses in any way, except air, sunshine, and generally water.

Thus the supreme importance of transportation to mankind is shown by the relative sums paid out by the people of the United States in a single year for railroad freights, as compared with the sum paid out in revenues to the Federal Government. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, the average amount per capita collected by the Government in duties on imported merchandise was $3.84. The average per capita during the same year collected by the railroads of the United States from the people was $30.86. That is to say, the transportation taxes collected by the railroads totaled more than eight times as much as the duties collected on imports by the National Government. So while we talk and debate about protective tariffs and revenue tariffs without cessation, it is the transportation tariff that is of far greater importance to the people, because it is more than eight times more vital to them in its influence on their welfare.

But there are facts far more impressive. During the 15 years ending in 1908 the total receipts of the National Government from all sources, including postal revenues, but not proceeds of bonds, were $8,908,359,045. For the same period the sum collected from the people by the railroads was $25,619,370,500. That is to say, the transportation tax collected from the people of the United States for the period by the railways alone exceeded the total revenues of the National Government by $16,711,000,000.

In fact, the total receipts of the railways of the United States for a single year lack only $5,000,000 of equaling the combined total revenues of eight of the principal nations of Europe. What issue in the United States approximates the transportation issue? How indefensible is the action of the faction in the Senate which is haggling over nothings and using all kinds of subterfuge and Indian strategy to defeat the river and harbor bill?

Again, how accurate were the Spaniards when they pictured the Mississippi as underlined with gold. In 1907 the average rate received by railroads of the United States for transporting products to market was 7.82 mills per ton-mile. The average charge on products carried by water in and out of Lake Superior in that year was eight-tenths of 1 mill per ton-mile. That is to say, the railroad charge per ton-mile was more than nine times as much as was the water rate in and out of Lake Superior.

From these facts can not the Senators of the United States gain a conception of the tremendous importance of water transportation to the people of this country? Can they not see that when they are fighting a river and harbor bill on any pretense they are literally fighting every producer and every consumer in the United States?

Is it for such a purpose that Senators are elected and paid salaries and the great and vital interests of all the people placed in their keeping?

Do they fight the river and harbor bill as a service to the railroads of the United States?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read resolutions adopted by the Caldwell Parish Fair Association in regard to the importance of the speedy passage of the river and harbor bill, showing that its failure would work very great damage on all that portion of Louisiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

COLUMBIA, LA., August 3, 1914.

Be it known and remembered that at a meeting of the Caldwell Fair Association held at Columbia, La., on the 3d day of August, 1914, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas the river and harbor bill now pending in the United States Congress is in danger of failure to pass at this session of Congress; and

"Whereas the passage of said bill is of paramount importance to the commercial interest and agricultural welfare of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi; and

"Whereas the improvement of the Ouachita River by the construction of locks and dams is a great necessity and should be completed at the earliest possible date, in the interest of the people of north Louisiana in general; and

"Whereas the failure of the river and harbor bill to pass at this session of the United States Congress will delay the unfinished work on the locks and dams for a year or more, and in the meantime the work already done will be almost a total loss to the Government, since the uncompleted structure must inevitably be destroyed by the recurring high stage of water during the winter and spring, thus entailing a loss of many thousands of dollars to the Government: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Caldwell Fair Association, That the prosperity of the people of north Louisiana depends in a great measure upon the construction of an enduring line of levees along the line of the Mississippi River, as well as the construction of a system of locks and dams in the Ouachita River; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Senators JOSEPH E. RANSDELL and J. R. THORNTON."

C. P. CARROLL,
Acting President Caldwell Fair Association.
S. G. JARRELL,
Secretary Caldwell Fair Association.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have the following telegram read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BISMARCK, N. DAK., July 28, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The producers' commercial interests and our people generally throughout the upper Missouri Valley view with grave concern and feeling of resentment the possible * * * defeat of the river and harbor bill. * * * It should be borne in mind that the commerce of the Upper Missouri River has shown steady increase in volume lately and this year will greatly exceed any of the past, with a probability of continued increase, in view of which it would be peculiarly unfortunate and disastrous if there should be no appropriation made this year to continue winter snagging, removal of rocks, and revetment of river banks at several places in order to hold the channel where commerce exists. * * * With changed character of hull construction and propelling machinery on boats, with gasoline, crude oil, and electric motive power applied to river, lake, and waterway commerce, we hope no one will wish to hamper or destroy western waterways or remove their influence on railroad rates or foreign competitors. We believe, under existing and contemplated national legislation, the railroads and waterways may be utilized by joint connection through Federal regulation, and no doubt on a mileage basis. For these reasons, may we hope for your hearty cooperation in legislation that will make ample provision and appropriation by the present Congress for river and harbor improvements generally throughout the United States?

BISMARCK COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By F. L. CONKLIN, President.

[The asterisks indicate clauses read and subsequently ordered to be stricken out.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I note there are references to a couple of Senators there. It probably requires no imagination to reach the conclusion that I am included. I have no sensitiveness whatever in regard to it; I am perfectly willing to have the telegram inserted in the RECORD; but I think the proper place to discuss the allegations made in the telegram and the alleged statement of fact is here on the floor of the Senate. Some portions of it will not by any means bear analysis and they are contrary to fact.

Mr. GRONNA. This telegram was received by me, and I am not responsible for it. I was going to suggest that that part of it referring to any Senator be stricken out of the telegram. I ask that that may be done by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless it is stricken out, the Chair will exercise the present power of the Chair to keep it from the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that it be stricken out.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire who sent the telegram.

Mr. GRONNA. The Bismarck Commercial Club.

Mr. KENYON. As I caught the reading of the telegram, there is a very serious reflection in it upon some Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There undoubtedly is.

Mr. KENYON. I do not care, myself, about it. There is no truth in it.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that any reference to a Senator be stricken from the telegram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objectionable matter will be stricken out, and the telegram may go in the RECORD in that form.

CURRENCY ASSOCIATIONS AND CROP MOVEMENT.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I rise to observe that since the development of war conditions in Europe the price of cotton in the South has declined something like ten or twelve dollars a bale. This threatens a loss to that section of probably over $100,000,000 unless something can be done to aid our people.

I send to the desk a telegram, which I ask to have read, as it bears on the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

CORSICANA, TEX., August 6, 1914.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

We appreciate value of amendment providing large volume of emergency currency, but plan will fail of its purpose unless concert of action on part of all banks in territories having to move crops is had, and promptly. Banks seem slow to move. To get concert of action and prompt and effectual results, suggest that Secretary of Treasury and Comptroller of Currency notify all eligible banks that they are expected to join nearest currency association at once. They should also wire banks of all reserve cities urging that they organize associations cooperating with other cities so organizing, to end that no conflicts result. Think Comptroller of Currency should take up matter with the several State bank commissioners, urging all State banks eligible to join currency associations. If plan is carried out thoroughly and promptly, millions of dollars may be saved to the South in maintaining price of cotton.

J. A. JOHNSON,
President Corsicana National Bank.
G. J. HEFLIN,
President First National Bank, Frost.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to add that a few days ago the southern Senators and Representatives held a meeting to discuss the cotton situation. As a result of that meeting a committee was appointed, of which the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was made chairman. That committee is now giving thorough study to the situation, and may make a report within a day or two. The Texas delegation in the House of Representatives is also meeting to-day, endeavoring to find some solution of this problem. I should be glad if Senators on both sides of the Chamber would keep this matter in mind.

SILVER MINING INDUSTRY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in common with other Senators and Representatives from the mining States of the Union, I have within the past 24 hours received a large number of telegrams, of which two which I will now read are fairly representative.

The first is from the governor of Colorado, who says:

DENVER, COLO., August 6, 1914.

CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I trust our delegates in Congress will urge Treasury Department to continue purchase of silver at the Denver Mint and maintain price at 50 or better. Such action of great importance to this State. Will you kindly take up matter with other Members?

E. M. AMMONS.

The next is from Mr. A. E. Reynolds, a lifelong mine owner and operator, a very conspicuous and honored resident of my State, a lifelong member of the Republican Party, and, above all other things, a citizen and a patriot. He says:

DENVER, COLO., August 6, 1914.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

You have been advised by other telegrams of the proposed action of the smelting companies in regard to the purchase of silver whereby they will advance 25 cents per ounce on receipt of the ores, the remainder to be paid after a market price is established. This action, in my judgment, will close both mine and smelters in Colorado, and probably in other mining States. You will excuse me for suggesting that this calamity could be avoided, provided the discretionary power of the Secretary of the Treasury whereby he purchases silver for subsidiary coinage is made mandatory to the extent of requiring the purchase for a stated period of all the silver produced from American mines to the extent of not to exceed the past year's production, this purchase to be converted into subsidiary coin for the uses of the country. In my judgment, the entire amount indicated here would be absorbed in the small coinage, to the great benefit of the country and to the detriment of nobody. If the mining industry is to be saved in this emergency, immediate action of some kind is required. The price should be established at not less than the average for the past 12 months, instead of using the emergency to squeeze down the values.

A. E. REYNOLDS.

Mr. President, the silver-mining industry of the country has undergone much transformation during the last 15 or 20 years consequent upon the exhaustion of the old Bonanza deposits. Since the days when the question of bimetallism was an acute one, and absorbed the undivided attention of the entire country, a number of the great and then seemingly inexhaustible deposits of silver—seemingly inexhaustible from the eastern standpoint—was in process of mining. Since that time their contents have been extracted, and the silver produced in the United States, generally speaking, is a by-product. The mines are now exploited for the baser metals principally, their gold and silver contents being incidental to the production of zinc, of copper, and of lead. Hence any further reduction in the market price of the by-products, which in many enterprises constitute the profit of the enterprise, necessarily causes a general feeling of fear and apprehension lest it result in the suspension of all operations.

I do not at present intend to suggest any legislation upon this subject, but merely take advantage of the occasion to refer to some phases of the subject which, I trust, may be reassuring to those who are at present so much and so justly concerned. Their concern, Mr. President, is largely due to the fact that the American Smelting & Refining Co., which is the principal, if not the only, customer for our silver-bearing ore which comprises our silver product outside of that which is purchased by the mints in the form of bullion, seem to have determined to advance but 25 cents per ounce upon the silver content of all ores which they purchase, instead of the market value in cash, less the customary discount, as has heretofore been the case, and to continue this policy for the present and until foreign conditions change for the better.

I am quite satisfied that the Government will for this industry, as for all others, at this crisis in our national affairs, use wisely, effectively, and legitimately every lawful authority which it can exercise, both for the individual good and for the national welfare, and that it will not hesitate, both by cooperation with the smelting company and independently of that concern, to see to it that this industry is not even temporarily suspended and suffer as little injury as possible.

Mr. President, I have been much gratified during the last few days with the significant fact that while all forms of credit currency have disappeared from immediate circulation in the great zone of European disturbance, silver has come to the front, as it always does in great emergencies, and taken its place side by side with gold for the transaction of the ordinary affairs of commerce and of industry, notwithstanding the fact that it has been degraded and demonetized by nearly all the nations of the earth. To my mind, that is a most significant circumstance; indeed, it demonstrates the contention of bimetallists that these two metals, found always together in nature, were designed by an All-Wise Providence as the common basis of the exchanges of the world; that while human legislation may dislocate, it can not permanently destroy the monetary efficiency of either; and that when times of great disturbance occur, when all sorts of movable and liquid property are seeking usual and extraordinary hiding places, when nothing will be accepted or given in exchange except that which is of indestructible value, these two metals do the common monetary work of the world. They are mutual aids. They never should be divided. Neither should be exalted and neither degraded. Not alone of men and women but of the monetary metals may it be truly said that what God hath joined together let no man put asunder.

I think, Mr. President, that the cause and the price of silver has at present reached its extreme ebb tide. Its demonetization was concocted and its doom determined amid the echoes of that great contest between France and Germany. It was overthrown in the dust and thunder of that terrible strife, and monetary degradation declared that the burden upon conquered France might be doubled and its defeat made the more disastrous.

I predict, Mr. President, that out of this kindred tragedy, more extended and more extensive, involving every civilized country except the United States, Japan, and the South American Republics, this metal will be again exalted. That it will be redeemed, rejuvenated, and remonetized by the exigencies of the hour, by the logic of this awful conflict, and by the supreme requirements of an exhausted and bleeding civilization.

Hence, although the day may now be dark, although the immediate prospect may be so gloomy as to justify prevailing apprehensions of disaster, it is but that darkest hour before the dawn of silver's restoration to the mints of the world—that in the near future the now despised metal will command not only the market price of the past few years but continue to rise as individual and national demands shall increase until it reaches and maintains its ancient ratio; that it will ultimate in giving back to industry, to commerce, and to manufacture that universal prosperity which it once enjoyed and breathe new life into the silver-mining industry everywhere; that by the common voice of mankind, enlightened by sacrifice and chastened by disaster, it will be restored to the high position and clothed again with its ancient prerogatives, of which it was cruelly deprived by unequal, unjust, and unfortunate legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the president of the Mine Operators' Association, of Nevada, which I desire to have read into the RECORD. In presenting it, I desire to say that it bears largely on the subject just discussed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

It seems that the closing of the exchanges of the country has destroyed any public market for silver, and that the opportunity is being taken advantage of by the smelting trust. I realize that any effort on behalf of the silver metal will not meet with any great response in Congress, but I do trust that Senators will investigate the subject, as it not only affects the silver production of the United States but affects directly the gold production of the United States. I believe there is no question that the gold production of the United States is very material to our prosperity, particularly at this juncture, when there is such a demand for gold all over the world.

The reason why it affects gold is this: Nearly every silver mine in the United States is also a gold mine. If the predominating metal is silver, it is known as a silver mine. There are a great many of the so-called silver mines in the United States where the combined production of gold and silver is just sufficient in value to pay for the operation of such mines. Half of the value may be gold and half of the value silver, but if the silver value is stricken out, then those mines must close.

That is the condition now existing throughout the mining section of the United States. Therefore the country is faced with the closing of these mines and with the contraction of both the gold and silver output, and to a great extent a panicky condition caused by the throwing out of work of a great number of laborers.

For this reason I want this telegram read, and I want Senators in this body who have the time to give it their consideration, because I am going to ask the cooperation of those who are interested in the matter in the framing of a bill that will, to some extent, remedy these conditions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

TONOPAH, NEV., August 6, 1914.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

On account of the silver exchange being closed, and no prospects of the same being opened in the immediate future, the silver producers of the State of Nevada are unable to find a market for their silver. Most of the silver mines throughout the State will have to close down unless money can be secured from the sale of their product with which to continue operations. The Nevada Mine Operators' Association has to-day requested me to wire you to use your influence to have Congress pass an act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase 25,000,000 ounces of silver at the last market quotation. By doing so the various mines throughout this State, as well as other States, will be able to market their silver and thereby get money with which to continue operations. The situation is certainly very critical for the silver mines throughout the country, and the relief suggested above would be of inestimable benefit to all the operators, as well as the miners working in the silver mines. Should no relief come very soon a great many thousands of men working in the silver mines of the country will be out of employment. Kindly furnish copies of this telegram to Senator NEWLANDS and Congressman ROBERTS; also others who may be interested.

JOHN G. KIRCHEN, President.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, apropos of the remarks made by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Nevada, I desire to apprise the Senate that the great copper smelter in Great Falls, in my State, has been obliged to shut down on account of the practical destruction of the European market for copper, and a large number of the producing mines in the vicinity of Butte, producing copper as the principal product and gold and silver as by-products, have been closed down. Others are likely to follow. I observe by the press dispatches that similar action is being taken in connection with the copper-producing mines of the State of Arizona. The consequence of this is that there will be a greater diminution in the production of both gold and silver, the production of gold in recent years falling off with such rapidity as to give just cause for alarm. This is one of the contingencies arising from the unfortunate hostilities in Europe that will demand, at a very early day, some legislation from Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it seems from what we have heard that the silver industry, the copper industry, and the cotton industry are all in trouble. I wish to say that the manufacturing industry of New England is also in trouble. Our export trade, of course, will be very seriously hurt by the withdrawal of ships from the ocean traffic. My impression is that we will have to work out the problem as best we can until the war comes to a conclusion.

CONVEYANCES IN NEVADA BY CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, at the night session of the Senate held on the 9th day of July Senate bill 5042 was passed. The bill had been reported by me from the Judiciary Committee. Unfortunately, I was not present at the session, neither was either of the Senators from the State of Nevada, who were especially interested in the bill; and as it was passed it does not conform to the desires of the friends of the measure. I gave notice on the 13th of July, asking that the bill be recalled from the House, and stating that I would move its reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nevada, returned from the House to the Senate in compliance with its request.

Mr. WALSH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator. I suppose it was simply for unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote for the purpose of having the bill referred to a committee.

Mr. WALSH. No; for the purpose of having the bill acted upon. It has been referred, reported back, and passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether the bill will lead to any discussion?

Mr. WALSH. I think not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana moves to reconsider the vote whereby Senate bill 5042 was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. What is the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nevada.

Mr. JONES. Let the bill be read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the bill passed the Senate at the night session held not long ago, and has been recalled simply for the purpose of making some changes.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment recommended by the committee appearing in lines 8 to 13, inclusive, on page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to?

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment appearing in lines 1 and 2, on page 3, to insert the words "but without consideration."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has been agreed to heretofore.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 31) submitted by Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey on the sixth instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce jointly be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered to purchase such craft, in this and foreign countries, as in their judgment may be suitable, adaptable, and necessary for the transportation of passengers and freight to and from the various ports of the world. All provision for manning, sailing, and maintaining such craft to be vested in the above-named Secretaries until otherwise provided.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I respectfully ask permission to withdraw the resolution for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution is withdrawn.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On August 7, 1914:

S. 6084. An act to grant the consent of Congress for the county of Pulaski, State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.;

S. 4023. An act for the relief of Waldo H. Coffman;

S. 4261. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4845. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5207. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5446. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5575. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

THE SPONGE INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5313) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same; and for other purposes, which were, on page 2, line 1, after "or," to insert "for any person or vessel"; on page 2, line 12, to strike out "vessel, or boat" and insert "partnership, or association"; on page 2, line 13, after "of," where it occurs the second time, to strike out the remainder of said line and all of lines 14 and 15 and insert "not more than $500, and in addition such"; and on page 3, line 5, to strike out "to."

Mr. THORNTON. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. CUMMINS conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that House bill 18202, the shipping bill, be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. When we adjourned last night we were, as I supposed, about to take a vote on the question. I do not know of any others who desire to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator first yield to me to ask unanimous consent that some brief editorials from New England papers be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield with pleasure for that purpose.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Nashua (N. H.) Telegraph, August 3, 1914.]

WHAT WE FACE.

We are absolutely dependent for our over-seas carrying trade upon ships flying foreign flags. Already there have been cancellations of sailings of these ships in anticipation of war in Europe. If hostilities begin, the larger part of these ships will be withdrawn from mercantile pursuits to become transports of the naval service of their respective countries. Ninety-two per cent of the steamships of foreign trade and 98 per cent of the steamships plying between the United States and Europe belong to other nations than our own. Two hundred million dollars a year or more we pay to foreigners for the transportation of freight and passengers to and from other countries, and at this time we face a partial paralization of our industries because we are without ships under the American flag to do business with the world about us.

We are not in this predicament for lack of warnings, for with blind obstinacy our Government has refused to take the steps necessary for the revival of its merchant marine. Every other country has aided its over-seas shipping by subsidies and subventions of some kind, while the United States has stubbornly refused to give encouragement to capital to embark in an industry that would give additional employment to American labor, enlarge our commercial activities, and place us in a position independent of other nations. Because of a traditional hostility of the Democratic Party to subsidies all efforts to put the United States in competition with the world as the seafaring nation have failed.

For years Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, and the late Senator Frye, of Maine, led the fight in Congress to reestablish our merchant marine. In vivid colors they portrayed what was likely to happen not only in the event of foreign war, but in case we were involved ourselves in war with a first-class power. Our little war with Spain was a partial verification of their prediction, when we had to scurry about to buy or hire ships to transport troops and supplies to Cuba. The Boer war gave another object lesson, when English merchant ships were withdrawn from the merchant service of the Atlantic and ordered into the naval reserve of that country. The friends of the American merchant marine continually encountered Democratic hostility to Government aid in the revival of an industry that had once been the pride of the American people and that had been destroyed by the unequal competition afforded by the subsidy of their merchant fleet by other nations. It was the indifference of Republican constituencies in some sections of the Middle West that enabled the Democratic minority in Congress to block all legislative relief.

Even President Roosevelt, who championed causes in which his heart was enlisted with great and compelling vigor, gave to the revival of the American merchant marine but mild support. One-half the zeal on his part in behalf of American shipping that he gave to other things would have carried to success the efforts of the Republican Party in Congress to give to the United States its share of the overseas carrying trade. Yet Col. Roosevelt is very free to-day to call men like Senator GALLINGER, who labored to ward off our present embarrassment, reactionaries. Our dangers are now before us in acute form, and the same patriotism that enables us to cast aside party lines when war is upon us should move Congress and the President to take immediate steps to correct a condition that so seriously threatens our industrial prosperity.

"There is only one way," says the Boston Herald, "in which the United States can save itself from the effacement of its overseas commerce in a widespread European war, and that is by having its own ships, its own shipyards, its own officers and crew beforehand. The people of Massachusetts know this; the people of New England know it. So do the people of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, California, Oregon, and Washington. The United States has almost no merchant marine to-day because every effort for 60 years for sound, proved legislation that would create a great commercial fleet has been blindly opposed and defeated by the petty sectional narrowness and ignorance of the solid South combined with a part of the Middle West in Congress."

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Morning Union, August 4, 1914.]

WHAT IT MEANS TO BE WITHOUT A MERCHANT MARINE.

The immediate difficulties respecting our foreign trade in a crisis like this should find a large measure of relief through the plan to hoist the American flag on many merchant vessels now flying foreign flags. This could be accomplished by a simple process under existing law in the case of many American-owned ships now sailing under the flags of other countries, while in other cases it could be brought about through the purchase of foreign vessels under the terms of a special act of Congress to meet the emergency. As America is the only great nation of Europe or America that can fairly count on remaining neutral, this is an obvious and desirable means of meeting a grave international crisis. However, considerable doubt is felt as to whether this plan is feasible. International law and trade rules are opposed to any such plan to evade the ordinary consequences of war, holding as invalid transfers of vessels made with such intent following an outbreak of hostilities. This objection is rooted in a well-known principle of law, which debars an individual from gaining advantage by putting property out of his hands to evade his lawful obligations in an emergency.

We can buy foreign vessels and in a short time we can establish a great merchant fleet, but will the flying of the American flag over ships given the new registry afford any real protection against their seizure by the belligerents? That is the question. It is a question that concerns Europe's population even more vitally than our own. Americans will not starve if denied the opportunity of finding a prompt market abroad for their excess food products, while with Europe's vast numbers the obtaining of supplies from this source is a prime necessity. Are the European nations going to insist upon a strict enforcement of existing regulations when such a course will mean self-starvation? The present situation is extraordinary, entirely unlike the ordinary war that involves not more than two or three combatants. In the circumstances it seems reasonable to expect that those nations will not refuse the offices of a neutral power attempting to meet a dire necessity of the world's trade. Somehow international regulations should be sufficiently elastic to admit of this remedy being applied.

Even so, there will be a certain amount of hazard involved in such a departure. Vessels flying the American flag will be subject to a considerable degree of suspicion, and the safety of a ship depends somewhat on the nature of its cargo. Clashes and entanglements are liable to arise, and at best our trade situation will be one of difficulties, plus a pronounced element of danger. And respecting the permanent advantage of the departure there should be no delusions. The change in our system of registries is not going to secure to us a permanent merchant marine. The view that we lost our merchant marine because of the Civil War and can recover it through a European war is essentially unsound. The real reason why we have no merchant marine is that we have failed to adapt our national policy to the economic conditions that govern the control of shipping. Those conditions are likely to continue after the present war is ended. The proposed remedy is a war measure, pure and simple, designed merely to meet temporary requirements, and the real problem of our merchant marine will remain as vital as before.

Our trade has been carried on under foreign flags because shipowners find that the cheapest plan. That is why such concerns as the International Mercantile Marine and the United Fruit Co. are doing business under foreign flags. The factors at the bottom of the situation are the American wage standard, as applied to the cost of building and operating ships, and the question of subsidizing our shipping. These factors have been persistently ignored by the Democratic Party, which has opposed every practical plan to rehabilitate our merchant marine, even to the point of repealing the provision to aid our coastwise commerce making use of the Panama Canal. The administration is now facing the dire consequences of such a policy. Its emergency plan may meet a temporary necessity, but the real cure must be sought in other and deeper remedies, otherwise we shall be exposed to the same old disadvantage of having no merchant fleet to depend upon in time of war.

THREE COSTLY LESSONS.

Already that nightmare of the nations has come true, a general European war has proved the wisdom of three policies championed by the Republican Party in the face of Democratic opposition. They are (1) the restoration by subsidy of our merchant marine; (2) the modernizing of our banking and currency system; (3) the recruiting of a permanent foreign service. Although in its initial stage the mighty conflict overseas has dragged the United States within the shadow of its hardships; neither the 3,000 miles intervening nor our traditional policy of "splendid isolation" has availed to save our ocean trade from paralysis. Ninety per cent of the Nation's foreign commerce was carried in foreign bottoms when the war broke out. To-day 80 per cent of that fleet is put out of business. Yet the Democrats in Congress during the administrations of McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft defeated the ship-subsidy bills championed by those Presidents. It is true that a small minority of Republicans, representing inland States, rallied to their support, but the Democratic Party, while voting for mail subsidies on land, has always opposed the application of the same principle on the sea. It was the farmer of the Middle West, whose Republican Representative in Congress opposed his party creed and joined with the Democrats to defeat ship subsidy. By the fortunes of war it is the western farmer who will suffer most from the paralysis of American overseas commerce as a result of the withdrawal of foreign ships and the absence of any American vessels to take their place in carrying to market the produce of the western farms.

It is due to the financial mobilization made possible by the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency law that the Nation's whole financial structure is being safe-guarded from the shock of the collapse of the money markets of the Old World. That reserve measure of relief was forced through Congress by a Republican majority in the face of bitter Democratic opposition. It was intended to serve just such an emergency as the present crisis precipitated. It was the forerunner of the complete modernizing of the country's financial system for which the way was paved by the Monetary Commission and which is soon to go into effect. Were it not, however, for the existing Republican emergency law, which the Democratic minority opposed and the Democratic Party denounced, the present Democratic administration would be hard put to cope with the resultant financial crisis precipitated by Europe's war panic.

President Roosevelt began and President Taft continued the recruiting of a permanent foreign service. Gradually the Government was enlisting in the lower diplomatic grades young men desiring to make diplomacy their life work. Some of these had, under the merit system, been advanced to ministerial posts. President Wilson and Secretary Bryan began their official régime by a raid upon the Diplomatic Service to reward contributors to their campaign fund, with the result that every minister promoted under the merit system was dismissed, the European embassies stripped of experienced diplomatists, and what is our predicament to-day? No ambassador at St. Petersburg and the chargé d'affaires compelled, due to the lack of funds at the embassy's disposal and the absence of any adequate clerical force, to decline the request of Germany to represent the Berlin Government in Russia. Instead of leaving Ambassador Guild at his post at least until his successor had qualified, the administration recalled him, and for a year and a half we have been without ambassadorial representation at the Russian capital.

Although war was declared on July 25, a relief ship is just starting for Europe with funds for our nationals caught there by the conflict. It may be weeks before ships are secured to bring them home. Secretary Bryan appears to have been the most surprised man in Washington when the war cloud broke. Last week he cabled instructions to our ambassador in London that a party of American schoolgirls be given passports to the Continent, although the ambassador had protested against it. The Department of State appears to have been taken completely by surprise at the outbreak of the war. Were it represented abroad by a corps of experienced diplomatists the Washington Government might have received an inkling of what was coming. With green diplomats at every capital, their channels of communication undeveloped, it is not surprising that the administration at Washington should just be waking up to what has happened.

AMERICAN SHIPPING AND WAR.

What will be the effect of a general European war on the United States is a question which many are asking, and there seems to be good reason for it. One of the main points that call for comment is brought about by the fact that an enormous preponderance of our foreign carrying trade is transported by foreign bottoms, and of this, again, a great part is carried in the ships of three nations certain to be principals in any general conflict—England, Germany, and France.

Of the great passenger steamships plying into New York almost by the score from northern European ports, only six would be exempt from capture, four of them controlled by the International Mercantile Marine and two of the Red Star Line, which come under the neutral registry of Belgium. It must be remembered that the larger ships of the British merchant navy are impressible for transport and scout duty in the event of national conflict, and that numbers of their officers are members of the Royal Naval Reserves, subject likewise to call with their ships. Every year in the fall the returning steamers from Europe have been taxed to bring home the swarms of tourists and students who have ended their vacations, and these swarms would naturally be greatly increased by a natural desire of all Americans to get away from scenes of conflict, and that there should be a general reduction of means of transportation just at this time is a situation that is by no means to be treated lightly. For outgoing and incoming freights the embarrassment would be hardly less acute, since cargo steamers are slower and hence easier captures, and, in general, more desirable prizes.

There is but one ray of comfort in the very complex condition of things, and if this condition results in teaching this country the precariousness of relying on a foreign merchant navy for our import and export carrying trade, the lesson, even if costly, would be a valuable one.

BOSTON FOR REAL AMERICAN SHIPS.

Boston does not approve the form or method of the bill in Congress for the emergency whitewashing of foreign vessels, most of them now under belligerent flags. The action of Great Britain in declaring war destroys most of the small value which that bill possesses, for most of the foreign ships in which American capital is interested are on the British registry and can not now be naturalized without an affront to the law of nations.

The course of the chamber of commerce in protesting against this bill and urging Senator WEEKS to oppose it will be approved and applauded by informed public sentiment throughout the New England States. We want American ships, but we do not want and must not have American ships with a cloud upon their title and a stain upon their flag. Nothing can be more certain than that a wholesale borrowing of the merchant vessels of belligerents in order that they might evade belligerent responsibilities and be available for the export of our wheat and cotton would arouse the world against us as guilty of an act of national dishonor. We have some ships of our own. Let us use them as far as they will serve, and if they are not sufficient let us be men and face in manly American fashion the logical and inescapable consequences of the neglect of our Government to provide a real American merchant marine available alike in peace and in war.

The protest of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, echoed by a similar remonstrance from the Portland Board of Trade, against the ineffective subterfuge proposed in Washington comes with entire good grace from an organization which has a consistent record of loyal support of the cause of American ocean shipping. Time and time again the Boston chamber has urged legislation for the merchant marine that would be both honest and effective. Its directors memorialized Congress for the enactment of the ocean mail bills of the Roosevelt and Taft administrations—bills conspicuously championed by Senators GALLINGER, LODGE, and WEEKS—which would have given to the country a splendid fleet of first-class merchant steamships and to Boston direct communication with the chief ports of South America, to which no ship under any flag now runs.

For all this terribly costly lack of our own ships, at which the country stands aghast, Boston business men and American business men are not responsible. To them the American merchant marine is a national and not a party question. But the will of the business men and the desire of a large majority of the people of the great intelligent, advanced, industrial States have been thwarted by politicians from the cotton fields and the prairies, who could then see nothing in it for them in American ships, but who, for the sake of securing whitewashed ships to deliver their cotton and wheat, are now willing to defy international comity and risk the wrath and hatred of the world.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce takes the strong course of wisdom and of patriotism in urging Congress to drop all futile subterfuges and enact legislation "which will result in an effective and permanent increase in the number of ocean carrying vessels flying the flag of the United States." This is the imperative lesson of the present crisis.

NO SHIPS FOR AMERICANS.

The fact that America has no merchant marine worthy of the name was never more forcibly brought to the attention of all America than at the present time. With all Europe engaged in war this country is unable to transport her own citizens to their home country, or to move her crops, and it brings our senior Senator, Hon. J. H. GALLINGER, into the limelight and bears out his contention that this country should have a merchant marine worthy of the name. He has fought for years to secure it and now all America is seeing the great necessity of it.

[From the Boston Traveler and Evening Herald, August 5, 1914.]

HONESTY THE ONLY POLICY.

The necessity of an ocean-going American merchant marine was never so apparent as to-day, when the withdrawal from commerce of many foreign transatlantic lines of steamers threatens to cripple the business of this Nation and to leave the products of fields and factories without a means of reaching the markets of the world for many months to come.

For years the Eastern States have been calling the attention of Congress to the vital need of a merchant marine as a means of making this country independent of Europe, and that the vast tribute paid to aliens for transportation over seas might be turned into American coffers; but they have called in vain.

The South and the West saw in this patriotic and far-seeing demand of the maritime States only a scheme for looting the Treasury. Europe gave them all the transportation facilities they needed to carry their crops of cotton and wheat to market, and they saw no reason why Uncle Sam should spend money for what they regarded as the sole benefit of the already overfavored East.

And thus, in refusing the demands of the maritime States, for sectional and selfish reasons, these southern and western cotton and wheat growers, as now appears with startling clearness, have sacrificed the interests of the Nation.

The shot fired in the streets of Sarajevo has stopped the wheels of commerce and arrested all the arts of peace, and to-day, with Europe engaged in an awful struggle and nearly every liner removed from the sea, the West and South find themselves without a market for their surplus crops and a cry of alarm has gone up.

And hearkening to this cry, foolishly, though with the best intentions, the administration seeks to remedy the complained-of evil by substituting one that may turn out to be even greater.

Where it excluded all shipping practically from American register and refused to encourage American lines to build, or to make it possible for them to compete with Europe's subsidized lines, Congress now swings in the opposite direction and wants to open wide the doors to all manner of marine derelicts and to methods fraught with possible national and international disaster.

The safeguards and conditions which surround the transfer of ships from foreign to American registry under international law and the usage of nations should be observed to the letter, not only in the interest of safety at sea but to prevent our being dragged into war with one or another of the European combatants, a possibility not so remote as one might think if the emergency legislation just rushed through the National House is allowed to become law without amendment.

No ship should be accepted for registry which does not comply with all legal standards and requirements as to ownership and officers. We have now a flourishing and well-guarded coast marine which must not be subjected to ruinous future competition from foreign-owned vessels loosely admitted to registry in our hour of necessity, vessels which would not meet the requirements so rigidly applied to our domestic ships; and once admitted to registry these marine waifs and strays could elect to engage in either coast or ocean trade.

The honesty and legality of transfer to our flag must be above question, for European nations now engaged in war will not hesitate to sweep such vessels from the seas if there is any suspicion of deception. The American flag would not save them in such a case, and the United States would have no redress unless she chose to seek it by force of arms.

Our advice to the Senate of the United States is to make haste as slowly as is consistent with honesty and safety in this matter. Laws, like marriages, made in haste are repented at leisure; and it is much easier to make a bad law than it is to mend it.

The 1914 harvests are not yet garnered, and the marketing will not be necessary until the cool days of the fall. Let us prepare for that event and the difficulties now in sight; but let us do so sanely and with a full realization of the consequences of what we are about.

Above all, let us not in the hour of agitation and perplexity sacrifice the things we have for those we have not. Let the West and the South understand that the continuous existence of our merchant marine must not be jeopardized because of their temporary embarrassment. They have played the dog in the manger so long, they have refused so constantly to listen to the voice of reason and patriotism in this matter, that their new ardor for more liberal shipping laws must not be permitted to destroy the existing American marine or to hamper the Nation in its effort to build one that will be a credit to it and a benefit to the world.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to suggest an amendment at page 3 of the reprint of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs leave to suggest that when the sad intelligence of the death of Mrs. Wilson was conveyed to the Senate last night the Secretary had just concluded the reading of the bill as reported by the committee, and as the Chair now remembers the state of the record, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has an amendment pending to the proposed substitute offered by the committee. The Chair is of the opinion that that amendment should first be disposed of, and then the Senator from Oregon may offer his amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to yield, that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware may be acted upon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that is correct, though I of course would be willing to yield to my senior in service in the Senate, as I am always glad to do. I will send to the desk the amendment proposed by me and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section to the bill the following:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of American citizens, whether of individuals or of corporations, the majority of whose stock is owned by citizens of the United States, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships purchased to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I occupied the time of the Senate yesterday in explanation of this amendment and stated the reasons why I offer it. I do not think I am justified in occupying further time on it. I believe the amendment speaks plainly for itself. I have only changed it to make it entirely plain that persons who are citizens of the United States or corporations of the United States the majority of whose stock is owned by citizens shall be included within the 90 per cent of the capital invested. I have been spoken to by a number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber suggesting that to require 90 per cent to be held by American citizens may be too high. It was only out of an abundance of caution, so that the Government might not be accused of attempting to give the benefit of its flag to vessels which in fact were owned by foreigners that I made it so high. I think myself that the percentage might possibly be reduced. I should not object to some amendment lowering the percentage provided that at least a substantial majority of the capital was owned by citizens of the United States. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I feel impelled, rather reluctantly, to occupy the time of the Senate in the further discussion of this measure. The situation of my section of the country, and, I think, of the whole country, with reference to this matter of emergency transportation is far more serious, in my judgment, than some Senators in this Chamber seem to think.

A few days ago the brilliant senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] took the position that in order to relieve the present situation as an emergency matter the Government should acquire and operate sufficient ships to accommodate the necessities of our commerce. On yesterday the genial and whole-souled Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] went a step further and advocated as a permanent Government policy the ownership and operation of our deep-sea merchant marine.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], in commenting upon the position of these two Senators, called the attention of the Senate to our experience in dealing with a similar emergency during the Spanish-American War. He told the Senate that in order to supply the Navy with sufficient colliers and transports it became necessary for the Government to invest about $17,000,000 in the purchase of that character of vessels, and that when the war closed and the emergency had passed it was necessary to sell those vessels at about 25 cents on the dollar, so that the Government lost probably eleven or twelve million dollars.

Mr. President, I want to say that while not at all committing myself to the suggestions of the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from New Jersey, if means can not be provided in any other way by which the farmers of this country can be saved from the imminent danger which confronts them unless they can send their surplus products to the European markets I would, as an emergency measure, favor the interposition of the Government for the purpose of preventing such a national calamity. In that situation I believe it would be the duty of the Government to come to the relief of the people, even if it had to go to the extent of buying and operating the necessary ships for the purpose of accommodating our foreign trade. I hope, however, it will not be necessary to resort to such extreme measures.

I repeat, Mr. President, I am afraid the gravity of the situation which now confronts us in this regard is not fully understood by Senators. We have probably the greatest crops of our history. After supplying our own demand, the surplus will be enormous. This is especially true with reference to wheat, tobacco, and cotton. If we can find a market for this surplus abroad at the high prices that will obtain abroad on account of war conditions, it would mean widespread prosperity to the American people. But if we can not find a market for this surplus, instead of being an asset of prosperity it may become an asset of adversity.

The one condition necessary for reaching these markets is ocean transportation. If we can not get this transportation and have to rely upon the domestic demand for these surplus products, the price will be so adversely affected that in place of profit there will be loss.

We have over 300,000,000 bushels of wheat for export. We have between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 worth of tobacco for export. We have 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 bales of cotton for export. There will be a demand for all of this tobacco and wheat at war prices. While there will not be as great a demand for raw cotton as in normal conditions, still there will be a reasonable demand. With ships to take these products abroad there will be a stream of foreign gold coming into this country which would quicken every industry and bring forth conditions of great industrial activity and business prosperity.

Without ships, as I said before, this surplus will glut the domestic market and pull down the level of prices to a point where stagnation and disaster will be inevitable.

This is not only true with reference to agricultural products, but the situation in Europe offers to our manufacturers an opportunity in the neutral markets of the world they have never heretofore enjoyed, and which if they can now take advantage of will not only enable them enormously to expand their output but to secure a firm foothold where heretofore they have been compelled to struggle even to secure the most limited recognition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I think this is a very opportune time to recall an incident which occurred just about the time of the outbreak of the Civil War, either just before or some little time after.

The business interests of the country then, and particularly the commercial interests of the great cities—New York then, as now, being the conspicuous one—were terribly agitated about the apprehended and freely predicted results of open hostilities upon their trades and industries. I think the New York Chamber of Commerce appointed a committee, or in some manner designated a body of men, which came to Washington and interviewed the administration, pleading against the declaration or the continuance of hostilities if they could be avoided, because of the tremendous loss and paralysis of business of all kinds which would inevitably follow. Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, was among those who received them. In response he gave utterance to a maxim, because I think it rises to the dignity of a maxim, which was verified by the logic of events. He gave them the comforting assurance that "there is no customer like a great nation engaged in offensive warfare."

We have now several great nations engaged in offensive warfare. They must have the things which this the greatest of all neutral powers now possesses in overabundance, and these greatest of all customers will soon be knocking at our doors for our cotton, our corn, our wheat, our metallic products, and the products and output of our many manufactories, and prepared to pay prices which will gladden our hearts and quicken our currents of trade everywhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator might have added to the very excellent statement which he has made, and for which I thank him, that however good the customers who are now engaged in a gigantic war might be under ordinary circumstances, if we have not the ships to carry to them our products, they as customers will be worth but little, if anything, to us.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no, Mr. President; the demand will bring the carriage; the vessels of the old country will soon be flocking to our shores to obtain cargoes which the nations whose flags they fly must have, if they can hope to prevail in the existing conflict.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator is right in his prediction. I myself believe—for I want to be entirely frank about this matter—that the necessities of Europe will compel Europeans to provide the transportation facilities necessary to get our food products.

Mr. THOMAS. I should say, perhaps, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that in giving expression to this view I am by no means insensible of the necessity of doing everything upon our part to furnish transportation. We should proceed upon the theory that unless we can supply it it will not be available.

I think, too, that this is a propitious moment to initiate a system of merchant marine that will eventuate in giving us the proud position which we occupied something less than a century ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope that in a short time there will be a restoration of the transportation facilities in our foreign trade that we have heretofore enjoyed. Of course, it would be vain to hope, so long as the war continues, that they will be as adequate as heretofore; but I hope that Europe, on account of its necessities, will find some way to supplement any efforts that we may make, and that the result of our joint efforts will provide adequate facilities to meet the transportation situation which now so greatly embarrasses us.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish the sentence, please.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, by all means.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I think it would be exceedingly unwise for us to rely absolutely upon that possibility or upon that hope. I think we would be failing to discharge our duty to the people of this country in an emergency such as has never in my days confronted the country if we did not ourselves attempt to provide for the situation so far as in us lies. Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was interested in the suggestion of the learned Senator from North Carolina that he hoped in the near future we would have an adequate merchant marine.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has misunderstood me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know the Senator qualified that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I hope we shall, and if this bill passes that would add very much to my expectations; but it is a mere hope. Without the passage of some such legislation as this, and probably some broader legislation than this, I should have very little hope of an adequate merchant marine for many years to come.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark, Mr. President—and I will take the time of the Senator from North Carolina for but a moment—that in view of the fact that for 60 years we have been striving to agree upon some system that would give us a merchant marine, I fear the Senator's hope will not be realized. As the Senator knows, "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick"; and this hope has been deferred so long that I think we will have to get beyond hope, if we expect realization.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, Mr. President, I do not wish to give a partisan cast to this discussion; I do not wish to get into any controversy at all about it; but if we have not a merchant marine to-day, the responsibility would seem to me to rest at the doors of the Republican Party, for that party has been in power ever since the close of the Civil War, with the exception of a very short period, and during their period of ascendancy in this country our merchant marine, instead of growing, has dwindled, until we have less than a dozen and a half seagoing vessels upon the oceans of the world to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina surely did not interpret my observation as being in any sense partisan or political. I certainly did not so intend it; I wanted it to apply to all of us.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to be diverted from the line of argument that I was pursuing, because I wanted to get some facts before the Senate.

Assuming that the present conditions shall continue, that the merchant marine of the belligerent countries of Europe is withdrawn from traffic with us, that we are compelled to rely upon our own transportation facilities, and that we are not able to devise means and methods to secure adequate transportation facilities, either separately, through the individual efforts of our citizens, or in conjunction with such help as we can get from Europe in the conditions which exist there, I insist that not only the agricultural but the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country will be confronted with a situation which calls for the exercise of every power and resource of the Government to safeguard the public welfare against the disastrous consequences which will inevitably follow.

Mr. President, reverting to the cotton situation, I said that was somewhat differentiated from the situation with reference to tobacco, wheat, and other food products. The demand in Europe for these latter products will be as great in time of war as in time of peace, while the price will be higher, so that if we had transportation there would be no trouble about finding a market for our enormous surplus of these products. That is not true with reference to raw cotton. As a result of the war the demand in Europe for our raw cotton will be, I think, unquestionably diminished. I do not mean all European factories will be closed. In many countries in Europe, like Italy and perhaps England, the demand will not be interfered with to any serious extent. In Germany and France the interference will be greater. The net result will be a considerable decrease in the European demand. That may beget an increased demand for raw cotton in our own country. It may, and I think undoubtedly will, result in opening to us new markets and lead to increase in the output of our cotton mills. But I think it is safe to say that with the great crop we have raised this year there will not be the usual demand for the whole output of our cotton fields, and we may be compelled to protect this staple, to provide for carrying over a part of this crop to the next year. This will call for money. I think this part of the situation will be amply met. I think the banks of the South, with the money which can be secured under our new currency legislation, will be able to take care of this part of the emergency.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. When does the Senator think the new currency system will be put into operation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I think the amendment which we have recently made to the Vreeland-Aldrich law will very largely relieve the situation. It will not, however, relieve it altogether. It would be very much better if we could have the help of the new Federal reserve system; and if we could secure the confirmation of the members of the Federal Reserve Board I think it would be but a very short time before that system could be put into operation, and that system, together with the amendment of the Vreeland-Aldrich law, would enable the banks of the South to take care of the financial end of the cotton situation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senator that in certain portions of my State cotton is being marketed and sold now, and the loss because of reduced prices is already being felt by the farmers in that section of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, Mr. President, the mere apprehension that there will not be an adequate market abroad for our surplus cotton—the fact that that market is now measurably closed on account of the embargo upon transportation—will inevitably affect the price. If this embargo shall continue and the usual European demand is not speedily restored by an early termination of hostilities and a resumption of normal conditions in the cotton industry, the price will necessarily be affected to a greater extent than we now anticipate, unless, as I said before, adequate financial arrangements can be made to hold this undisposed-of surplus until the demand for it shall exist.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether there is any surplus cotton from last year's crop?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, there always is a surplus from the preceding year's crop.

Mr. THOMAS. In the older countries?

Mr. SIMMONS. There always is.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, if he will permit me, that the surplus cotton from the last crop is exceedingly small.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is much less than usual.

Mr. THOMAS. I had reference to the surplus left over from last year's crop.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is very little. The price of cotton when the war was announced was up to 13½ cents, a price that promised a good profit to the producer.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, if that is the case, I am optimistic enough to believe that the demand of the world for clothing will offer an early solution of this very menacing problem.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not suppose that the cotton crop of this year will be in excess of the world's demand in normal conditions, but the condition which exists throughout Europe will necessarily affect this demand. First, because it will place a limitation upon the activities of European spindles, and, secondly, the consumption of those countries, which, of course, constitutes a considerable part of the world's consumption of cotton goods, will be materially lessened. If the war is of short duration, I should say that there will be no great difference between the supply and the demand. If it is of long duration, I think the supply will greatly exceed the demand. In any event the present disturbance suspends the present demand for raw cotton in this country to such an extent that unless relief can be secured through withholding from the market, temporarily at least, a part of the present crop, the effect upon the price of this commodity will be a matter of very serious consequence not only to the cotton producers but to the country at large.

Of course it is out of the question to think of withholding from the market for any considerable length of time that portion of the crop which Europe usually takes, and if we can not secure transportation so as to deliver to the spindles of Europe such part of the present crop as can in present conditions be utilized, the effect upon the price of raw cotton will be far-reaching, not to say disastrous.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that there is this rift in the clouds, which I think ought to be emphasized at this moment. I do not think there is any doubt that the American and Canadian mills can consume half of the American cotton crop.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should hope so, but they have not been able to do so heretofore.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That was because they have not had the——

Mr. SIMMONS. The demand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The market or the demand for their goods; but while the German mills are closed down the German customers must have clothing; they must go elsewhere for these goods, and there is no place quite so convenient for them to obtain them as in the United States and in Canada. The mills of England are not going to shut down——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he has not understood me, I hope, as discussing cotton goods at all; the effect upon cotton goods is going to be good, but transportation is an important element of consideration in marketing these goods also.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that; but the point about that is that you can not have cotton goods without cotton with which to make the goods.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And I want to say to the Senator that at this moment I think his pessimistic view may possibly affect the farmer. He needs all in the world that can be said and done for him now to stimulate him to sit steady in the boat and look ahead and withhold his cotton from the market and wait for developments. I for one believe that this war cloud will drift away much earlier than some gentlemen seem to believe, and then, if it does, the price of cotton will soar heavenward. In the meantime I would have Congress and the administration do all within their power to meet any emergency that may arise.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to remark that the logic of the Senator from North Carolina is conclusive, assuming his premises to be correct; and as I want to do all I can to help the situation—and I intend to do so to the extent of my vote and influence, whatever it may be here—I shall assume that he is correct; but I verily believe that, with the demand for clothing the world over, the Senator will perceive as time passes that very few of the cotton manufactories of the world are going to close, and those which do close will prompt an increased production by those which do not close, for the demand for raiment is one of the insistent demands of all humanity, in the temperate zones at least. It is so imperious in its necessities and requirements that it can not be obviated, and, of course, cotton is the one element which clothes the world and which is always dependable.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator——

Mr. WEST. I should like to say that I am fearful that the Senator from Colorado takes a too roseate view of the situation as it affects the cotton crop. Europe ordinarily uses about 60 per cent of the American cotton crop, leaving the other 40 per cent for America and Canada. England uses, under normal conditions, about one-third of the amount which goes abroad, which would leave unused and on our hands 40 per cent of the amount which normally goes abroad, outside of the 40 per cent we use and the one-third imported that England uses, assuming that her mills will run in a normal way. Then what does that leave on our hands of the American cotton crop? It leaves 40 per cent, and 40 per cent of the American cotton held back from a 14,000,000-bale crop would amount to 5,600,000 bales; and that amount of cotton held back in this country, in my judgment, would put the price of cotton down to 5 or 6 cents, and if the war continues our only salvation in the South would be to go to planting grain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, so far as the manufacture of cotton is concerned, this situation, if we can get transportation facilities, offers the cotton manufacturers of the United States the greatest opportunity that they have ever had. Given the factories and the money to operate them and the ships to carry their product to the neutral markets of the world—to Central America, South America, the West Indies, and the Orient—instead of manufacturing in this country one-third of the raw cotton that we produce in the South we might find a ready demand for a much greater percentage of our raw cotton to supply our own mills, and we might enormously increase the output of cotton goods in the South and New England.

Mr. President, I hope the time may come, and I believe the time will come, when the United States will manufacture the bulk of the raw cotton we produce in this country, and the coming of that time will be greatly hastened if we shall take advantage of the opportunities this situation affords.

I do not take, as the junior Senator from Mississippi suggests, a pessimistic view of the present situation. I take an optimistic view of it. I believe with the Senator from Mississippi that the war cloud will roll over even sooner than we expect. I believe if the war cloud does not roll over, if this is a long and protracted war, that many of the mills of England, Italy, and France will continue to operate and to consume our raw cotton.

But we all know that war operates to curtail their activities under most favorable conditions, and to my mind we would be criminally neglectful and unmindful of our duty to the farmers and the manufacturers of this country if we did not do everything possible to safeguard their interests. The first condition to this end is to provide adequate ocean transportation. If, confronted by this condition, we sit idly by and hug the hope and the expectation, though there may be just and reasonable grounds for hope, that Europe, because of her necessities, will come to our relief and take care of this situation, we shall be criminally neglectful in our duty to our constituents.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the able Senator from North Carolina allow me to recall his mind to a matter of history of our Government with which I am sure he is familiar?

I am impressed with the thought, and I ask the Senator from North Carolina if it is in his mind, that even if these countries had the ships which the able Senators upon this side of the Chamber fancy they have and may use, they will be otherwise needed? I happened to be upon a committee in the House during the Spanish-American War, through which I had an opportunity to derive information upon this subject. My distinguished colleague Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, at the same time was upon a similar committee. Spain, though she had ships, cut off all of her South American trade because of the fact that she was compelled to use her ships to transport her men. She repressed her commerce and impressed nearly all of the vessels she had, which otherwise might have brought produce to the shores of Spain, for use in transport service. It became necessary to do so.

I therefore ask the able Senator from North Carolina whether it is not likely that even though these foreign countries might have the ships, and even though they might desire to come to our shores to take our cotton and our wheat to their people, the exigencies of war might require these countries to impress those ships into their service, so that it would be impossible for them to come to our shores for commercial shipping?

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, of course the Senator is right about it. The papers this morning tell us that at least one of the great trans-Atlantic liners under the German flag has been converted into an armored cruiser.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, right there, if the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me; while that is true of German ships in German ports and of shipping generally upon the high seas, it does not follow with regard to such ships as have been marooned in American ports, and might very well be bought by American citizens or by the American Government. We have already lying in New Orleans and New York and other places shipping enough to do all we want to do if this Government will merely purchase them temporarily, and dispose of them at the end of the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator probably was not in the Chamber when I began my remarks. I referred to his proposition at that time. I have been diverted from what I intended to say. What I intended to say and all I intended to say with reference to that matter is that, so far as our wheat crop is concerned, so far as our cotton crop is concerned, so far as our tobacco crop is concerned—and I will say, by way of passing, that we now sell abroad about 50,000,000 pounds of our leaf tobacco annually—an enormous loss will result unless this necessity for transportation is provided for in some way, either by the countries of Europe coming to our aid or otherwise. They have withdrawn practically all aid at present, and we do not know when they will return to the seas with their merchant vessels; and if they do return we have no assurance that they will for a long time to come be able to supply a sufficient number of ships to answer our requirements. It takes an enormous number of ships to supply the needs of our export trade. Last year there were cleared from this country for Europe about 19,000,000 tons of merchandise; and Europe's releasing a part of her merchant ships and returning them to the channels of trade while others are impressed into service or tied up will not supply the demand. If the war continues more than two or three months I am afraid she will not be able to help us to anything like the extent that the exigency of the situation requires.

Mr. President, the point I am making is that it is our duty to do something ourselves and not to rely altogether upon the possibility of a situation in Europe different from that which now exists. What will be our loss if we should not get these ships in time to move our crops and merchandise to relieve the home congestion and to take advantage of the opportunities of enlarging our export trade in neutral markets I do not know. But that it will be enormous goes without saying.

I want to repeat, Mr. President, if, in the face of this situation, we can not get ships in any other way I would be in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi that the Government come to the relief of the people, and itself buy and operate the necessary number of ships to supply the demand.

Suppose that should happen which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said did happen in connection with our emergency purchases to supply the needs of our Government in the Spanish-American War, when we lost $12,000,000 by the transaction. Suppose the same situation discloses itself with reference to the Government purchase of ships for this emergency. Suppose she has to invest a hundred million dollars to do it, and suppose, when the emergency passes and she disposes of these ships, there is saddled upon us a net loss of $75,000,000. Mr. President, what is $75,000,000 spent by the Government—which means spent by the people, for the Government is nothing but the people—to protect the farmers and the merchants and the manufacturers of this country from a state of bankruptcy? This sum, great as it would be, would be a mere bagatelle compared with the alternative loss.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I thought the Senator would be interested in a bit of information which has just come to me from one of the most reputable attorneys of the Washington bar. He has called me out to say that he was advised by clients of his, who are the American owners of ships flying foreign flags, that they were satisfied with the amendment which I have offered to this bill, and that if that amendment is adopted they will immediately apply for the registration of a very substantial number of ships under the American flag to answer this emergency. This information I believe to be accurate, and I think it will be a substantial addition to the American merchant marine.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I believe as firmly as I have ever believed anything in my life that if this bill shall pass it will be the entering wedge to a revival of the merchant marine of this country, and that, with such help as we will be able to get from other directions, it will largely supply the demand for transportation in the present emergency.

Senators say there will be no ships brought under the American flag if this bill passes, because they say that since the passage of the Panama Canal act, allowing American registry to ships under five years old, not a single ship has been bought and registered under that act. Mr. President, why have no ships been bought and registered under that act? Because in the conditions which existed in ocean transportation since the passage of that act there was practically no chance for a vessel not in the combine. There was never a more merciless or far-reaching or comprehensive trust or combination upon the face of the earth than the Shipping Trust, which has for years controlled or dominated ocean transportation—a trust that maintains a fighting fleet to destroy by undercutting in prices every independent vessel that may essay to engage in foreign trade.

In those conditions, of course, no ships were bought under that act; but those conditions do not exist now. The ships owned by the trust are tied up, and as long as this emergency exists probably a large part of them will continue tied up—enough to break the hold of the monopoly. If some of them are released and enter into the trade again, they will be so inadequate to the demands of transportation that there will be an opportunity for an independent ship to live until it can get a firm foothold. I believe we will find, as soon as this bill is passed, that ships will be bought, and they will be brought under American registry.

It is said that we shall get into trouble with foreign countries if we do this; that some of these ships may be seized upon the high seas; that the American Government will have to come to their rescue, and that that will involve us in war. Why, Mr. President, what is the condition to-day? Under the law that obtains, and which for years has obtained in this country, an American citizen can purchase a ship anywhere in the world that he finds one for sale; he can put that ship under the American flag; he can send that ship, flying the American flag, to any port in the world except an American port. What are we to say of such a system as that? Yet that is the system under which we are operating. Such a ship is entitled to come under the American flag. As American property it is put under the protection of the American Government. It is entitled to all the immunities of American-owned property throughout the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not mean to say that the ship can not touch at American ports?

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean to say that it can not clear from an American port with a cargo, because if it enters an American port both cargo and ship are under our law subject to forfeiture.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, it can, to a foreign port.

Mr. SIMMONS. A ship flying the American flag, not registered in this country?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, not registered?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I said. I said an unregistered ship flying the American flag, owned by an American citizen.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would it be flying the American flag if it was not registered?

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, surely, Mr. President. There can be no question that under the present law an American can buy a ship anywhere in the world, if it is a bona fide transaction, can put the American flag over it, and the American Government assumes the obligation of protecting his property in that ship while it flies that flag. It can trade with any port in the world under the protection of the American flag, except the ports of this country. That is the kind of system they have given us.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator mean to say that if a foreign ship bought under the terms of the Panama Canal act——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the Panama Canal act. I am talking about a ship bought outside of that act.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the Senator talking about? That is the only act that permits us to buy foreign ships.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not mean to say that a man can not buy a foreign ship without registering it in this country?

Mr. GALLINGER. I mean to say that under the Panama Canal act——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the Panama Canal act now. I am talking about a ship purchased in a foreign country by an American citizen, put under the American flag, and entering into trade, but which does not register under the American laws, because it can not register except under the Panama Canal act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not; and if it does not register under the American laws it is not entitled to the protection of our laws.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly it is entitled to such protection if it is flying the American flag, and it is as the property of an American citizen entitled under the law to sail under that flag. Although under our laws it is not entitled to registration here, it is entitled to the protection of the American Government. There is no doubt about this being the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a new theory.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me for a moment, because a good deal of misapprehension exists about this matter, I should like to read to the Senator a brief paragraph from Taylor on International Law, page 309.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator whether he doubts the proposition that an American can buy a ship and put it under the American flag without registration?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. I desire to assert that the Senator from North Carolina has correctly declared the law in reference to that matter, and it has been recognized for years. I read accordingly:

A vessel owned by a citizen of the United States may carry its flag and enjoy the protection of its Government on the high seas, although from the fact that she is foreign built or for some other cause she can not become a registered vessel of this country. Protection thus given to nonregistered vessels is analogous to that given to persons of foreign birth not naturalized but domiciled in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly; and that same doctrine is repeated in Moore's work on international law. It is undoubtedly the law.

Mr. President, the Government is under the obligation of protecting these ships, whether they come under American registration or not. We are just as liable to be involved in war with a foreign country because of our obligation with reference to that class of ships that fly our flag as with reference to those admitted to registration.

But, Mr. President, is it not absolutely puerile to say that this legislation, in the face of this condition of things, should not be passed because, forsooth, we may get in some trouble with foreign countries if we extend the age limit provided in the Panama Canal act? Is it not illogical to contend that while we are not particularly in danger with reference to our liability for the protection of a ship bought under the present Panama Canal act, which limits the registration to ships under 5 years of age—while we are not in danger of inviting complications of an international character on account of these ships under 5 years old—just as soon as a ship is bought that is over 5 years old we are in great jeopardy?

Mr. President, if Senators who have made that argument really believe it, then if the Senators want to avoid that possible danger to this Government—and, of course, we all want to avoid any danger of war—the logical position for them to assume would be to demand the repeal of the provision of the Panama Canal act which allows foreign ships under 5 years of age to be admitted to American registry. They ought not only to demand the repeal of that provision of the canal act, but they should demand the repeal of the laws that allow an American citizen to purchase a foreign-built vessel and place the flag of the United States over it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the only logical position for them to take. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator speaks of Senators on this side who are opposed to this legislation. I notice that the morning newspapers suggested that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the senior Senator from New Hampshire were the two Senators who are opposed to this legislation. If the Senator will turn to the RECORD he will observe that both the senior Senator from Utah and the senior Senator from New Hampshire suggested in the debate yesterday that they are not opposed to the legislation, and stated they would not vote against it, but they contended that the bill ought to be amended in certain particulars, and we questioned that the result would be as satisfactory as Senators on the other side have stated; that is all. Neither of us has said that we are opposed to the legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I ought to have stated it quite as broadly as that. I would not want to say that the Senators are opposed to it unless they had made an open declaration of opposition; but they have suggested and argued various reasons why it should not be adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President. I want to say to the Senator that I never made such a suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator pointed out as one of the reasons why it should not be adopted the great danger of war between this Government and some of the belligerents of Europe, resulting from a removal of the age limit in the Panama Canal act.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the inference, at least.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that I never mentioned the limit of the age of the boats in all I said yesterday. The only remarks that I made were directed in favor of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], and I have pointed out that unless that amendment is adopted there is likely to be trouble ahead for the Government, and it may embroil this country in a disagreement with foreign nations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not specify the Senator from Utah, but some newspapers specified him. I have regarded many of the arguments made on the other side as hostile to this measure and as suggestions that it ought to be defeated.

Mr. President, I say, if this bill passes, we would be in no greater danger of getting into these complications with foreign Governments than under the laws which now obtain.

Mr. President, the books are absolutely full of cases where vessels flying the flag of a neutral have been seized upon the open seas by a belligerent without provoking any trouble between the two Governments. During the Spanish-American War a vessel flying the British flag was seized by an American ship and brought into port as a prize. An effort was made to show that it really was a Spanish ship, and that the transfer of that ship to a British subject was merely colorable, and therefore it was liable to seizure. The case went to the prize court, and finally got up to the highest court of the land, and a judgment was rendered that the sale was colorable and that the ship, although flying a British flag, was liable to seizure. But it did not provoke war or any unpleasantness between this Government and Great Britain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was interested in the authority that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] quoted from just now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator allow me to finish my remarks, and then take up that question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not going to discuss it, but I was going to ask the Senator, if the authority quoted by the Senator from Montana is correct, and I assume it is, what is the need of this legislation? If an American can now buy a vessel of a belligerent, hoist the American flag upon it, not give it any American registration, but give it the protection of the United States as the property of an American citizen, of what avail is this legislation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said in my statement that the ship flying the American flag, owned by an American citizen but not registered, could not trade in any of the ports of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It could not engage in the coastwise trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; nor could it engage in the foreign trade of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Can not any foreign vessel now bring a cargo to an American port and take one back?

Mr. SIMMONS. A foreign vessel can, but a vessel flying the American flag can not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But a vessel which is simply an American's property and is not registered in an American port, if it is entitled to the protection of the American Government——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think if the Senator will examine, he will see that that is true. If that was not the case, then there would be no necessity of our passing any registration law at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it seems to me that there would be no necessity of passing this law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nor any other registration law, and your registration laws would be of no avail. If we had no registration laws the proposition of the Senator would be absolutely impregnable, but under our laws a ship, though entitled to fly the American flag and have the protection of the Government in its trade with other countries, unless it is registered, is liable to seizure and forfeiture if it enter an American port.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So that to fly the American flag now on a vessel owned by an American is a disadvantage. The foreign vessel flying a foreign flag has free access to our ports, but the vessel owned by an American can not come into an American port unless she is registered.

Mr. SIMMONS. In ordinary circumstances, undoubtedly so, and that is the reason why I said a system of that sort is a pitiable one; but right now, in the present condition, it is quite an advantage to a ship to be able to fly the American flag, whether it can trade between American ports or not, because she is entitled to enter any of the unblockaded ports of Europe.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I want to say. The suggestion has been made that no one will buy these ships, even if we remove the age limit, even if we permit them to be officered by others than Americans when there are no Americans qualified to perform those duties. Ordinarily that is true, but there are two things that differentiate the present situation from an ordinary situation. The first is the vast advantage any ship of a neutral country would have and has in world trade under the conditions that exist in the world to-day. The opportunities of an American ship, with other ships practically excluded from our commerce, to carry our products to Europe and to South America and to Asia and to Africa and bring back their products, with but relatively little competition, would be such an inducement to capital that even under the ordinary conditions we might expect our people to invest in ships. The situation makes the investment profitable.

But, Mr. President, there is another fact that, to my mind, gives assurance that the ships will be bought and will be supplied in sufficient numbers to reasonably carry our products to the markets of the world with such aid as we will have from the merchant marine of other countries, and that is the necessities of the business of this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In what respect, outside of what the Senator calls the removal of the age limit, does the law now proposed amend the Panama Canal act?

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not amend it in any other very important respects than that except to allow these vessels to be manned, if necessary, by other than American officers and——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Watch officers?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; watch officers. It removes all these hampering restrictions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the only hampering restriction that is removed the restriction about watch officers?

Mr. SIMMONS. And the age limit; and that is a very serious one, because under the five-year age limit the Senator can see that the number of ships that could possibly be purchased abroad for American registry is greatly limited. If we could buy only a ship under 5 years of age, it would be practically impossible to get ships to supply the demand; but the removal of the age limit will, of course, greatly enlarge the purchasable supply.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator. If my memory serves me correctly, and I think it does in the main, though perhaps not in detail, when I offered the very part of the Panama Canal act which gives the right which the Senate is now amending to American ships, I think the 5-year age limit was put in by an amendment from the other side. That is my recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it was put in in conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was put in in conference. I know it was not in my original amendment. Of course I perfectly agree in the removal of that restriction, and so far as the modification of the restriction as to watch officers; and now, as well as I can study the act, those two are the only respects in which the original act really is amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are; but the Senator must remember that that covers the hampering provision. If you take those away, if you allow an American to buy a ship of any age and allow it to be placed under American registration and then remove the restriction as to watch officers, so as to allow employment of aliens, you have removed the troublesome restrictions of the present law and make possible the enlargement of our merchant marine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I do not want to impose too much on the Senator's time. I will come to that matter later in my own time probably; but I merely wanted that information.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator can suggest anything else that we might do in this bill in order to make it easier for American citizens to register a foreign-built vessel and engage it in foreign commerce I wish he would suggest it, because I think it ought to be incorporated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point to which I shall direct the attention of the Senator is this: I do not believe, or I am not yet fully convinced, at any rate, that if no modification be made but those proposed there will be temptation sufficient for private capital to go into this business. The hope of immense low-priced freights will not help the American wheat farmer or aid the cotton producer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the immense profits that they may expect to realize as long as the war situation continues would be a great inducement, but, as I have said, the chief inducement is that which comes from the business men of this country, whether manufacturers or farmers, in order to protect themselves against absolute ruin.

I have already spoken about the farmers, and I will not repeat that. Now take the situation of the manufacturer. If the war continues, I think the probabilities are that the cotton manufactures of this country will enormously expand, because we will have such an advantage in the neutral markets of the world over Europe, from which they have heretofore gotten their supply. I think that the demand for many other manufactured products of this country will be enormously enhanced, because the doors of the neutral markets of the world will be thrown open to us in a way that they never have been thrown open to us before.

When we went to South America with our manufactured products, and when we went to the Orient with our manufactured products, we had to meet there the competition of the manufactured products of Germany and England and France and Belgium, and in addition we were handicapped by the fact that these competitors of ours controlled our ocean transportation. We had to go to them for our transportation, and having to go to them for our transportation, we not only had to meet their sharp competition but we had to meet it under the disadvantages which a competitor controlling your transportation will always, by some device or other, be able to put you under.

The manufacturers of this country will, if we can get these ships, be relieved in a measure from this competition in the first instance, for a time at least, and until they can get a foothold in those markets, and they will be relieved from the handicapping conditions of having to go to their competitors to get their transportation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not understand that the Senator is opposing the amendment of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not. I have not said a word about it. I am discussing the bill in its general aspects. Really I do not understand the nature of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Now, Mr. President, I have taken much more time than I intended to take and I want to apologize to the Senate. I have wandered and digressed much more than I might have desired, but it has been the result of the interruptions I have had.

During the delivery of Mr. SIMMONS'S speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. SIMMONS'S speech,

Mr. WILLIAMS. I doubt whether this bill in its present shape will do very much good. In as far as it makes freer the operation of the American merchant marine, of course, it falls within the line of my thought in connection with freer trade everywhere. But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] himself has admitted that there will be nothing except the hope of "immense" war "profits" upon freightage to tempt private capital to go into the merchant-marine business under the bill.

Now, Mr. President, the American people have their choice between two horns of a dilemma. I have long since taken my choice between them. One is an inhuman—"unhumane" perhaps would be a better word—operation of the merchant-marine system in accordance with the course pursued in most of Europe, thereby decreasing the cost of the operation of ships, and the other is to maintain our present humane system and in ordinary peace times as a consequence to do without a merchant marine.

I long since made up my mind that, as far as I was concerned, in time of peace I would rather do without a merchant marine than to inaugurate a system which in very many countries is a curse to civilization itself, a condition of peonage or a condition of quasi slavery for sailormen.

The trouble with the purchase under the provision which I offered amending the Panama Canal act when the tariff bill was up and which passed here in a shape in which I offered it and was afterwards amended in conference, has been not in the purchase of ships, but in the operation of ships. The trouble is that after you have bought them you can not operate them at a competitive profit.

It may be that during war times you can operate them at a profit by having shipowners throw the burden of increased freightage upon the American farmer, the American producer, the American shipper or manufacturer, whoever he may be. If that is all the good it is going to do, it does not seem to me that it will last quite long enough to encourage men to come and give up their hard-earned dollars and risk them for the sake of high profits that possibly may not endure over four months.

If some Senators whose voices I have heard lately are to be listened to with much gravity the war will not last more than about 120 days. They seem to think so, owing to the improved war machinery organized for the purpose of rendering women husbandless and children fatherless and going into the singing of Te Deums in churches in the different countries and asking God to kill more of the other women's husbands and the other children's fathers than of theirs. But if it shall last a long time perhaps there might be some improvement in the bill over the present system at any rate, because I never approved of the restriction put in conference upon the original amendment which I offered in the Senate and which passed this body.

Mr. President, the question discussed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] it seems to me was somewhat irrelevant, because if the ship flying the American flag, but not entitled to American registry, can not secure egress from an American port and be cleared I do not see how that is going to help your cotton or your wheat, particularly, because the wheat and cotton have got to start from an American port, and in that respect only can it help me and other farm producers, as far as I see.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will remember that I was discussing that question only in connection with the suggestion that we would be in danger of getting into trouble with other nations if we removed this age limit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember that; and for that very reason I have just said that, in my opinion, that whole discussion is irrelevant; in other words, it does not touch the present exigency; it does not touch the present need; it is going to do no good to my people and it is going to do no good to the western people.

The point, Mr. President, right now is this: I am not willing to build up a merchant marine in time of peace by a tax upon the American people; I am not willing to build up by laxity of humanitarian laws a merchant marine in times of peace. I would rather do without it than to have it at the price of either one of those two things. So I am not seeking a permanent remedy right now; I am seeking a temporary remedy in the emergency; I am seeking, as far as I can, to meet a crisis, and to meet the crisis as long as the crisis lasts; and after the crisis ceases to exist, I am willing to quit meeting it.

Mr. President, I have offered a bill which I read upon day before yesterday, and which I need not again read, because, so far as I remember, every Senator now present was then present. I see no new faces. That bill provides for the purchase by the United States Government, to meet this emergency, of ships lying marooned in our ports, and for loading those ships with our produce from the farm, the factory, and the mine. I add the mine, for I learned this morning from conversation with my friend the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that even the price of minerals has gone to pot until people can find out whither they are to be shipped. Cotton to-day has no fixed price in the market; the price is purely speculative. This is almost the first time in the history of the world that that was ever the case. What I want to meet is the existing emergency.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I will suggest, for the benefit of the Senator from Mississippi, that cotton has gone to the market in my city and had to be carried back to the homes of the farmers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the reason I made the remark. I understand that in various southern submarkets, if I may call them so, the farmers have hauled their cotton in to market, and then have had to haul it back. Hitherto the great advantage of cotton was that while you might carry a mule to market and could not sell him unless you found a ready purchaser; while you might carry a bale of hay to market and might find that nobody particularly wanted it that day, yet cotton had a gold price always at some figure. Even during the beginning of the McKinley administration, when cotton was lower than it ever was at any other time in the history of this country except for a little period in the early forties, cotton was worth what it was quoted at, at any rate, and you could get gold for it, and that was the end of it. You can not do that with a mule; you can not do it with a colt; you can not do it with a bale of hay; and you can not do it with a bushel of corn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume that the Senator from Mississippi would think if the ships purchased under this bill—if it were passed—could be operated in competition permanently with foreign ships that there would be some profit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; and, if the Senator will pardon me, I assume another thing, and that is, so long as the transports are in the hands of the United States Government they will not be operated for the purpose of robbing the American people at extremely high freight rates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume that they would not be operated for profit at all if the Senator's bill were passed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. If I had my way about it, we should have them operated for profit, at least for enough to cover the chance of loss, insurance, and various things, and to make a slight margin upon the investment. I do not want the American people, out of their Treasury, to lose money by the operation at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not suppose the Senator did; but when I say that the cost would be recovered by the Government in the shape of freight charges, of course I intend to include insurance and such things, but I mean the Government would not go into it now as a money-making operation, but would go into it to meet a national emergency.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To meet a national emergency; to meet a great crisis; and when the crisis is over, to quit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, what I want to ask the Senator is, if we now buy these foreign-built ships, so that the capital account of the investment would be the same as the foreigner's, the same as the one with whom we were competing, the sole difference, then, would be the cost of operation, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the Senator, then, prepared to say that it would not be possible to operate these vessels permanently in competition with foreign vessels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not prepared to say that, because I remember a piece of history that is highly instructive upon that question. After a certain amount of property changes hands, especially ships, and people enter a new business and begin to learn how to carry it on, it may happen that that situation will remain comparatively permanent.

The Alabama and the Florida sent most of the United States merchant marine to the bottom or else drove it into foreign ownership. For the most part, of course, it was driven into foreign ownership. After the war it stayed in foreign ownership, because it happened at the same time that people began to build ships out of iron instead of out of wood; so that even our wooden ships remained in foreign ownership after the war, because nobody was building any more wooden ships. Steel ships were taking their places. They were much cheaper in the long run to operate, though not, of course, in the short run cheaper to build.

I am not prepared to say that it would not be possible permanently to operate the vessels for the purchase of which I propose to provide in competition with foreign vessels after they had passed into private ownership, but what I am prepared to say is, if our people have not bought foreign ships within the age limit under the provision of the Panama Canal act, of which I am very proud to have been the father in its original and unamended form, their failure to buy them has not been because the ships cost too much to buy, but because they cost too much to operate; and unless they can be assured of a long period of operation, or a considerable and respectable period of operation, at any rate, they will hardly go in and risk their good dollars to do it now.

Of course there might be a situation where the farmers and manufacturers of the West and the farmers and manufacturers of the South would all come together and contribute to a public fund to meet a great immediate crisis, without regard to the long-run profits, but I hardly think you can appeal to private capital in that way. You can appeal to public capital in that way always; but while I would be willing, or the Senator from Iowa would be willing, to stand our share of the taxes and to run the risk of selling these ships later at less than we paid for them, if necessary to get rid of them, to private capital—either abroad or here, it would make no difference to us—while I might be willing to do that, at the same time I might not be willing to go in and risk a great many more dollars of my own that might jeopardize my position in the commercial world in order to provide for a contingency of the duration of which I was ignorant.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, one point troubles me that I have no doubt the Senator from Mississippi can clear up. If we purchase foreign ships under this proposed act, and we waive the matter of American officers and other requirements that are expensive to the American ships, after the emergency is over and these ships remain in our service, unless they come again under the laws of the United States requiring them to have certain officers and to have the American food scale and all that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the atmosphere scale, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. They will then be run in competition with the ships we now own which are engaged in the foreign trade. They will, therefore, have a preference, and that will not be fair. If we undertake to reduce the cost of operating American ships in the foreign trade which we now have, I think we will run up against a very serious proposition, so far as the labor unions of this country are concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know; I have not thought that out, to be frank with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are men very actively promoting their interests.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it does seem to me, at first blush, as if we might create two different sorts of shipping, one competing on one footing and another upon another, within our own merchant marine. If that be true, why, of course, then we would have one of two things to do—either to permit the ships not operated under this bill to be run on the scale that these are permitted under this proposed act to run upon, or we would have to make the ships provided for run on the present scale and leave ourselves in competition with foreign ships, just where we are. Frankly, however, I have not thought that out, and am not sure about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it must be kept in mind that, while we have only six American ships crossing the North Atlantic in the foreign trade, and about as many more on the Pacific, we have a great many ships, I think a couple of hundred perhaps, engaged in the foreign trade on shorter routes, and it would not be fair to compel those ships to maintain the American scale and allow these ships which are purchased under this proposed law to maintain a lower scale. That would have to be worked out in some way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I assume that the condition apprehended by the Senator could not be permanent. Very soon attention would be attracted to that, if it turned out to be that way, and it would be cured by one of the two processes that I have attempted to outline.

Mr. President, I do not see that the pending bill can do any harm, and I shall vote for it; but I am afraid that it will not meet the exigency, and I am afraid that nothing short of the Government of the United States putting its shoulder to the wheel right now will meet the exigency. When I say "the exigency" I mean the immediate exigency; I do not mean the exigency to arise in one week or one month or two months from now; I mean the exigency which has already arisen, and which ought to be met to-morrow morning, if necessary.

I think all of you will do me the credit of remembering that I very seldom indulge in what I might call sectional commerciality—if I may coin that phrase. I generally try to look as far as I can and as fairly as I can at the whole United States, and if I have dwelt a little bit too much upon the cotton situation more than upon the other situations this morning it is merely because I know more about it; but I know that the same kind of condition must exist in regard to other products as well.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. FALL. An idea suggests itself to me with reference to the question of competition which has just been referred to. Does the Senator think that the vessels which we are to purchase now would go through the Panama Canal toll free?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not.

Mr. FALL. Would the Government pay tolls to the Government on its own vessels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely; but when the Government pays its tolls to itself, I should like to know how the Government suffers?

Mr. FALL. Then how is the private shipping of the United States going to meet in the same trade these Govrenment-owned vessels, even at the same scale of wages?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the very reason, or one among others, why I put this section in the bill which I now propose as an amendment:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before or within four months after peace shall have been reestablished in Europe, to dispose of the ships purchased under this act at the best available price at public or private sale and to cover the proceeds thereof into the general fund of the Treasury.

I do not want to establish a situation of things where the Government becomes a permanent freight carrier in competition with its own citizens.

Mr. FALL. Then, if the Senator agrees to subsidize one class of American-owned vessels by a rebate of the tolls, why not in the same class of trade during the present emergency subsidize all other American vessels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not agree to anything of the sort. I say that the owner of the canal when it pays its tolls does not suffer. The Government of the United States might pay the tolls upon its war vessels passing through the Panama Canal; but if it did, I do not see how it would suffer. I do not care, however, to go back to the debate of the Panama tolls controversy.

Mr. FALL. The Government would immediately enter into competition by its own vessels with other vessels owned by its citizens, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that, for the present war time.

Mr. FALL. And the Government would subsidize itself?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To a very limited extent, because the ships which are going to transport to Europe, if my idea is carried out, our cotton, our corn, our meat, our copper, and other things, iron ore and structural steel, are going to carry nine-tenths of it not through the Panama Canal at all but across the Atlantic Ocean into the ports of other countries that are not blockaded.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator refers to structural steel. England has declared, as I understand, structural steel to be contraband.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some classes of structural steel are conditional contraband, yes; such as structural steel which may be used in the construction of ships; that is my recollection.

Mr. FALL. Private vessels owned by citizens of the United States can convey structural steel subject simply to seizure and confiscation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Now, suppose the vessels which the Senator wants the Government to hire or buy should undertake to carry structural steel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not going to suppose that.

Mr. FALL. That commodity having been declared contraband of war, then you have the Government committing an act of war against England.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not going to suppose for one moment that the United States Government will violate its own laws of neutrality or will indulge in unlawful carriage in violation of this very act. I can not suppose that, and I do not believe it will occur.

Mr. FALL. The Senator referred to structural steel, and that idea occurred to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just happened to mention it. I did not mean structural steel for use in building men-of-war. Of course that would be contraband of war.

Now, what I want to say, Mr. President, is that, while this bill can do no harm, it may do good; and, while one or two of the amendments offered to it ought to be adopted, I am afraid that even if passed with the amendments that have any chance of passing at all it will not meet the crisis, and I again want to call the attention of the country to that fact.

There is one objection in my mind to the bill which I have offered. It is possible that the United States Government may buy the ships and afterwards have to sell them at less than they paid for them. It is possible we may have to sell them at 75 per cent of what they cost us, or even a less percentage than that.

But to provide for the conveyance of 15,000,000 bales of cotton, worth from $50 to $60 a bale, and how many bushels of wheat I do not know—some of the Senators from the West can tell us—and the great meat products of the country, which are exportable and which can now be sold at war prices all over the world, and to provide for the transportation of such of our manufactured articles as are exportable under the laws of war—when you consider all that, and its gigantic importance to our country, then the principle de minimis non curat lex applies to the loss that the United States Government would suffer. Moreover, that loss would assume the shape of a tax—in a way an indirect tax—and would be about the lightest tax and the most remunerative tax and the most recompensatory tax that we have levied upon ourselves in many a long day.

I acknowledge the force of the objection made by the Senator from New Mexico as to Government competing with its own citizens in carrying freight; and if this were to be made a permanent matter I would fight it to the death, if it voiced a public policy.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I am in hearty accord with the Senator in desiring to afford relief to our own manufacturers and farmers. I do not know, however, that I would agree with him as to the method to be pursued; that is, that the suggestion contained in his bill that the Government should now go into the public ownership of methods of transportation would be the best solution of the problem. We may come to that a little later; within the next 10 years, I think, it is very likely that we may own practically all methods of transportation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope not.

Mr. FALL. But, Mr. President, if the desire of the Senator is to afford relief to our farmers and manufacturers, if that is the object, and the sole object, of this legislation, or legislation along this line, I believe that I am Populist enough to prefer a plan under which certificates might be issued, rather than to the banks in the shape of emergency currency, direct to the producers, the farmers, to enable them to hold their cotton and hold their wheat and hold the other products within the warehouses until the foreign ships can come over and take them away. We are now issuing $500,000,000 of currency to be loaned to these very people, and interest is to be charged upon it, and why not issue that directly upon certificates against their cotton or other crops at so much a bale?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will pardon me just one moment, to that question there are two replies. The first is that if we can get the products abroad we do not need to hold them at home; they can be sold and will be sold at good prices——

Mr. FALL. Yes; but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, so far as wheat and breadstuffs and meats are concerned, they may be sold at unusual and abnormal prices. The next objection to that is this: If you were to pile up, say, 50 per cent of the cotton crop of this country and carry it over until another crop were made, and then if, say, 50 per cent, seven and a half million bales, were carried over as a surplus to another new 15,000,000-bale crop, cotton would sink to 6 cents a pound. You could not harm the farmer worse than by enabling him to carry over half of his crop as a surplus to be added to all of the next crop, unless you decrease his acreage; and if the Senator knew as much about the cotton farmer as I do, he would know that the cotton farmer is not going to decrease his acreage.

Mr. FALL. I know that; I have been a cotton farmer on a small scale myself; but it appears to me that in the last few years the object of the unions of the cotton farmers has been to control the market by controlling the crop and not putting it on the market until they saw fit to do so. Now, if the Government relieves them of any necessity of putting it upon the market and advances them the necessary money, as the Senator says cotton is always gold——

Mr. WILLIAMS. At some price.

Mr. FALL. Sooner or later we would get the world's gold for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At some price, but if you piled up 21,000,000 bales of American cotton it would bring but little gold.

Mr. FALL. If we owned that 21,000,000 bales, we could sell it for what we chose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no. We have found that out long ago.

Mr. FALL. Where will the world get cotton?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The world will get what it needs, that what the world wants to spin and weave; but if you give the world 21,000,000 bales of American cotton in a year—and generally we make about 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 bales—you increase the world's supply of cotton up to thirty-odd million instead of 23,000,000 bales, as it is now. Then the world would not buy it, because the world would not want that amount, under the law of supply and demand, except at a 6-cent price. It might bring 6 cents in gold even then.

Mr. FALL. If we have the supply and the world creates the demand for cotton does the Senator not think we can certainly fill that demand at our own price?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish I thought so; we planters would have been rich by now if that had been the case. We have never seen the time yet when we could sell cotton at our own prices. The price depends altogether upon how much cotton there is going to market to be spun and woven among the people who are spinning and weaving. We raise only about two-thirds of a year's crop of cotton.

Mr. FALL. If there is none to go to market, you can get your prices for what you do let go to market.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true; but if you increase the supply during the time you are making a new crop by adding the old crop carried over or even half of it, then there would be such an amount on hand when that crop is gathered that you would be likely to get very low prices. You would have in the market at one and the same time two crops, or all of one and say half of another. There is no doubt about that. But that does not touch this matter. Section 3 of this bill, if the Senator will pardon me, answers the objection he made a moment ago. It provides:

SEC. 3. That the ships so manned and registered be loaded with breadstuffs, meats, and cotton and other articles not contraband of war, ready now or hereafter ready for export, and shall convey the same to whomsoever at whatever port of the world may have purchased the same, subject only to blockades that are or may be declared.

Note the language, "not contraband of war."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I understand the Senator is anxious, of course, to specify what shall be contraband of war; but the United States does not specify or does not fix for other nations what shall and what shall not be contraband of war. Now, England this morning——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have provided for even that in section 4, which reads:

SEC. 4. That the United States view as an unfriendly act any attempt on the part of any Government, dominion, or power in the world to interfere with, hinder, or delay their commerce on the high seas in anything save absolute contraband of war as declared by The Hague conference or in obedience to blockade regulations, and especially any attempt to interfere with, delay, or hinder their commerce as carried on in the ships hereby provided for.

Note the language, "absolute contraband of war."

Mr. FALL. Then, what are we going to do if other nations say, "We regret that the United States regards this as an unfriendly act, but nevertheless self-preservation is the first law of nations, as it is of nature"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We would have behind us the authority of The Hague conference.

Mr. FALL. How much authority, I will ask the Senator, has The Hague conference?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, if any nation attempted to oppress us upon the high seas by bidding defiance to what all had agreed to at The Hague, we would defend ourselves; but I do not think any will. I think they would all be mighty glad not to.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to cease in a moment, because I understand there is a desire to have an executive session pretty soon, in order to get under way the new system of banking and currency; but there seems to be some misapprehension as to what is provided for in this bill. There seems to be an idea among some Senators—and I especially ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to this—that the ships provided for in this bill, after they are bought, are to be operated entirely by the Navy. I have made no such provision. I provide that they shall be manned and equipped either by detail from the Navy or by the employment of men now engaged in the merchant marine or otherwise. So that the United States Government would not necessarily use its Navy in this matter, and, of course, would not do so in any event unless they had free men to detail without destroying naval efficiency. That would not interfere with the Navy or with the bill already passed upon, the profert of the Senator from Massachusetts. I thank the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 7, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, whose ways are past finding out, yet whose presence manifests itself in a thousand displays of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness, we turn to Thee for consolation in this hour of inexpressible sorrow in the death of our President's wife. The charm of her presence, the purity of her soul, the sympathy of her heart for the poor and distressed will be the Nation's loss. May her example live in the hearts of the people.

Comfort, we pray Thee, the stricken and bereaved husband and children. Who can understand better than Thee the mystic ties of love and affection which bind us together into families; who can heal the broken heart when death enters the home but Thee. Be with our President and his children to uphold and sustain them in their loss. May time with its softening hand assuage their grief and fill their hearts with hope and comfort in a reunion where the love ties will be stronger, the affections warmer, never to be severed by time nor space. And æons of praise shall be Thine. In the name of Him, who taught us the resurrection and the life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, define its power and duties, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, and so forth, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, Mr. COVINGTON, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, and Mr. ESCH.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4966) proposing an amendment as to section 19 of the Federal reserve act, relating to reserves, and for other purposes, and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4966 relating to the Federal reserve act, and consider it at the present time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 19, subsections (b) and (c) of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"(b) A bank in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, shall hold and maintain reserves equal to 15 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 5 per cent of its time deposits, as follows:

"In its vaults for a period of 36 months after said date, six-fifteenths thereof, and permanently thereafter five-fifteenths.

"In the Federal reserve bank of its district for a period of 12 months after the date aforesaid, at least three-fifteenths, and for each succeeding six months an additional one-fifteenth, until six-fifteenths have been so deposited, which shall be the amount permanently required.

"For a period of 36 months after said date the balance of the reserves may be held in its own vaults, or in the Federal reserve bank, or in national banks in central reserve cities, as now defined by law.

"After said 36 months' period all of said reserves, except those hereinbefore required to be held permanently in the vaults of the member bank and in the Federal reserve bank, shall be held in its vaults or in the Federal reserve bank, or in both, at the option of the member bank.

"(c) A bank in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, shall hold and maintain a reserve equal to 18 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 5 per cent of its time deposits, as follows:

"In its vaults, six-eighteenths thereof.

"In the Federal reserve bank, seven-eighteenths.

"The balance of said reserves shall be held in its own vaults or in the Federal reserve bank, at its option.

"Any Federal reserve bank may receive from the member banks as reserves not exceeding one-half of each installment, eligible paper as described in section 13 properly indorsed and acceptable to the said reserve bank

"If a State bank or trust company is required or permitted by the law of its State to keep its reserves either in its own vaults or with another State bank or trust company or with a national bank, such reserve deposits so kept in such State bank, trust company, or national bank shall be construed within the meaning of this section as if they were reserve deposits in a national bank in a reserve or central reserve city for a period of three years after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in the district in which such State bank or trust company is situate. Except as thus provided, no member bank shall keep on deposit with any nonmember bank a sum in excess of 10 per cent of its own paid-up capital and surplus. No member bank shall act as the medium or agent of a nonmember bank in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this act except by permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The reserve carried by a member bank with a Federal reserve bank may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, be checked against and withdrawn by such member bank for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities: Provided, however, That no bank shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserve required by law is fully restored.

"In estimating the reserves required by this act, the net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the bank deposits against which reserves shall be determined. Balances in reserve banks due to member banks shall, to the extent herein provided, be counted as reserves.

"National banks located in Alaska or outside the continental United States may remain nonmember banks, and shall in that event maintain reserves and comply with all the conditions now provided by law regulating them; or said banks, except in the Philippine Islands, may, with the consent of the Reserve Board, become member banks of any one of the reserve districts, and shall, in that event, take stock, maintain reserves, and be subject to all the other provisions of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to make some inquiries with reference to the bill. As I understand the bill, it affects the reserves of State banks only, and that during the 36 months' period covered by the Federal reserve act?

Mr. GLASS. That is a fact.

Mr. WINGO. After the 36 months' period has expired, the reserves will still be retained, part in the regional reserve bank and part in their own vaults and the remainder at whichever place the bank exercises its option to place it?

Mr. GLASS. That is true.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GLASS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I present herewith a privileged report upon House concurrent resolution 42, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,100 copies of the journal of the forty-eighth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, for the year 1914, not to exceed $1,600 in cost; 100 to be bound in cloth, balance in paper covers.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "cloth," insert "for the use of the national commander."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "covers," insert "for the use of the House folding room."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARNHART, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report to accompany House concurrent resolution 42:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred House concurrent resolution 42, having had the same under consideration, reports the resolution back with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

Line 7, after the word "cloth," insert the following words: "for the use of the national commander."

Line 7, after the word "covers," insert the following words: "for the use of the House folding room."

The Public Printer has submitted an estimate that the printing and binding provided for in this resolution will cost $1,600. The following statement by the Public Printer shows the cost of the printing previously ordered by Congress during the present fiscal year and the amount available therefor:

CONGRESSIONAL ALLOTMENT.

Work computed and forwarded to the allotment books	$93,735.44
Approximate of work ordered, but not completed	116,264.56
Total for work ordered	210,000.00
Congressional allotment	1,696,760.00
Work ordered (estimated)	210,000.00
Unencumbered balance	1,486,760.00

The committee considered the bill, with hearings from Hon. J. A. GOULDEN, author of the bill, and Hon. Washington Gardner, national commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic and formerly a Member of the House fo Representatives. Both presented the argument that the Grand Army of the Republic is a national patriotic organization; that the membership thereof is old in years; that their earning capacity is gone; that their numbers are rapidly waning; that the order has only limited means; that the records of the order should be made public and permanent for future authentic references; that there is specific precedent for this in the act of Congress which authorizes the printing of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the American Revolution as a public document.

It was also brought out in the hearings that several States in the Union print reports of the proceedings of the State encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for historical-record purposes, and for the foregoing and other reasons your committee recommends that the bill do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the resolution, that it is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provides for printing other than for the two Houses of Congress, and the Committee on Printing has no jurisdiction over such matters.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have said all that I desire to say. The Committee on Printing has jurisdiction of the printing for the two Houses of Congress. Resolutions providing such printing alone are privileged. This resolution provides for the printing of public documents other than for the two Houses of Congress, and therefore is not privileged.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The concurrent resolution itself reads:

That there shall be printed as a House document 1,100 copies of the journal of the forty-eighth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1914, not to exceed $1,600 in cost; 100 to be bound in cloth, balance in paper covers.

That is as far as the resolution is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But an amendment has been reported by the committee. It has always been held that a proposed committee amendment must be considered in determining whether a resolution is privileged. As proposed to be amended it goes much further than the resolution read by the gentleman from Illinois. The amendments that are reported as committee amendments destroy the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Well, it might be possible that one amendment is subject to a point of order as to its being nonprivileged matter——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is.

Mr. MANN. Contained in a privileged resolution.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, if it is permissible, in order to simplify matters I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object. I do not believe Congress should print such documents at all. It will be impossible ever to reduce the expense of public printing if we are to print the proceedings of everybody as part of the proceedings of Congress or as public documents upon the theory that they are for the information of Congress. It is merely—and we might as well be frank in discussing such matters—to relieve an association or an organization of the expense of printing the proceedings of its annual meeting. If we do that for one society, no matter what it may be, there is no excuse for not doing it for every organization which has an annual meeting. I am opposed to its being done.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is this: All matters referred to the Joint Committee on Printing for printing for the use of the House or the two Houses, of course, are in the list of privileged matter. The resolution is privileged, but the amendment is not, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman withdrawing it. It is a committee amendment, and the gentleman has no right to withdraw something that the committee has determined.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was trying to state the matter—that the gentleman from Indiana asked to withdraw the amendment, and the gentleman from New York objected to it. The resolution is not privileged, because it has this amendment in it, and the House has to consider the committee amendment along with the resolution.

EXTENDING PERIOD OF PAYMENT ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 4628, an act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1076).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, and 16, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 13 and 14.

EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
JOHN E. RAKER,
MOSES P. KINKAID,
Managers on the part of the House.

MARK A. SMITH,
HARRY LANE,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the House amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it is believed that this amendment will tend to prevent speculation, and is in the interest of good faith and will protect the Government, and is a reasonable requirement upon the entryman.

On amendments Nos. 2 and 3: The Senate concurs in the House amendments, as they are merely clerical and grammatical amendments to make the language more specific.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it is deemed advisable to fix some definite time when an entry may be made, and it is deemed appropriate that the Secretary of the Interior shall designate that time and publicly announce it.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as that provision was shown to be necessary in the orderly apportionment of the installments of payments to be paid under the projects.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it is merely the correction of the spelling of a word.

On amendments Nos. 7 and 8: The Senate concurs in the House amendments, as they were deemed advisable to make the language conform with the remainder of the bill.

On amendment No. 9: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it was deemed that the word "arrears" is more appropriate and applicable than the word "default."

On amendment No. 10: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as that language is used on page 3, lines 18 and 19, section 3, under the heading "Penalties," and this amendment is to make the language and provisions of the two sections uniform.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it was deemed advisable that the rules made by the Interior Department on each project should be general and capable of being understood by everyone and applicable to all alike rather than special, indefinite, or uncertain.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, and it was deemed appropriate that these regulations should pertain only to the use of the water in the irrigation of the land, as it is the water that the department has the control over and not the handling of the land. In other words, it was to carry out the intention of the act.

On amendment No. 13: The House recedes, as the evidence in support of the bill shows that a requirement of the reclamation and cultivation of one-fourth of the area of each entry under water right and within three irrigating seasons is sufficient, and that a larger requirement would work a hardship upon the entrymen with no corresponding benefit to the Government.

On amendment No. 14: The House recedes for the same reason that it recedes on amendment No. 13, believing that the cultivation of one-half of the irrigable area of an entry within five years after filing is ample to protect the Government and show good faith, and that any larger amount of cultivation would work an unnecessary hardship upon the entryman with no corresponding benefit to the Government.

On amendment No. 15: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as it is merely a grammatical correction.

On amendment No. 16: The Senate concurs in the House amendment to strike out all of section 16 as it came from the Senate, as the facts satisfy your committee that that provision in the law would be objectionable for the reasons that it will produce an increased amount of litigation and involve the Department of the Interior and Department of Justice in unwarranted expense, cause confusion and delay in the application of the necessary rules and regulations by the Interior Department, and cause the Secretary to either refuse to furnish water or furnish it without payment for an indefinite period, and generally that the provision would be inadvisable and would have a tendency to embarrass and hamper the administration of the service without any corresponding benefit. There were many other objections set forth in the hearings on this bill, some of which appear at pages 12963 and 12964 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 29, 1914.

The Senate concurs in the House amendment inserting the Underwood amendment as section 16, for the reason that the overwhelming majority of the House on a roll-call vote deemed it advisable to require the Reclamation Service to make estimates in advance for the money it needs for the various projects and make these public, and submit them to Congress, and annually give the reasons why they need the money for each particular project. This amendment is deemed in the interest of good administration, that the expenditures of these funds should be submitted to the scrutiny of Congress, and that it would thereby lead to a wiser and more economical expenditure of the reclamation fund. Moreover, there is a determined sentiment in Congress to abolish continuing annual appropriations and not to permit large sums of money to be subject to the unrestricted disposition by any one bureau or department. It is therefore believed that this amendment will bring about a more efficient administration and disposition of the reclamation fund. There are many reasons both for and against this amendment, but your conference committee felt in duty bound to respect the forcible argument and the practically 4 to 1 vote of the House after exhaustive debate upon this amendment.

EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
JOHN E. RAKER,
MOSES P. KINKAID,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Colorado yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand, the conference agreement accepts all the House amendments except the two relating to the amount of cultivation which the Secretary may require?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is correct. The House accepts the provisions of the Senate bill as to cultivation. That is one-fourth the first three years and one-half in five years. The Senate receded on 14 of the 16 amendments and the House receded on those 2.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill as agreed to includes the so-called Underwood amendment, does it not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I may say, generally speaking, that the only real difference between the two bodies was the amendment of the House striking out what was known as the Sterling amendment with respect to the jurisdiction of the courts and the Underwood amendment taking away from the Reclamation Service the apportionment and appropriation of the reclamation fund and putting it in Congress. The Senate conferees ultimately yielded on both of those amendments, and the Senate has already adopted the conference report and so notified the House.

The gentleman from Wyoming and the House will recall that after exhaustive debate upon the Underwood amendment, the House went on record by a roll-call vote of nearly 4 to 1 in favor of that amendment. There is no question but what the overwhelming majority of this House is very emphatic in its belief of the advisability of requiring the Reclamation Service to make estimates in advance for the money it needs for the various projects and make these public and annually submit them to Congress and give the reasons why they need the money for each particular project.

Regardless of what some of the Members from the West thought about it, the House firmly believes that this amendment is in the interest of good administration, and that the expenditure of the money coming into the reclamation fund should be submitted to the scrutiny of Congress. The Members generally believe that a supervisory control of these funds by Congress will lead to a wiser and more economical expenditure of the money. Moreover, there is apparently a determined sentiment in Congress, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has said, to abolish continuing annual appropriations and not permit large sums of money to be subject to unrestricted disposition by any one department or bureau. The advocates of this amendment, including the leading Members of this House, are so confident that this provision will bring about a more efficient administration and disposition of the reclamation fund that your conference committee felt in duty bound to respect that instruction of this House.

We have set forth this matter rather fully in our conference report. The very great beneficial features of this measure so outweigh this one feature, the propriety of which is questioned, that on behalf of the West I earnestly hope that this conference report will be agreed to. All the House has to consider now is these two minor amendments that your committee yielded upon.

Mr. MONDELL. I regret that the conferees on the part of the Senate felt compelled to accept the Underwood amendment, because I feel that this is questionable, but I suppose the House conferees were bound by the action of the House and assured the Senate that the House would not change its opinion with regard to those matters.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is true; and I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he does not feel the House conferees were in good faith bound to insist upon and respect the overwhelming vote of this House on that amendment as the Senate has done?

Mr. MONDELL. I do; and I think the conference report under the circumstances is a most excellent one. I think the legislation as a whole is good. I hope the conference report will be accepted that the bill may speedily become a law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The only question now before the House is merely as to the amount of cultivation required. The conferees consider that the bill as originally passed by the Senate was nearer fair and right to the settlers and would fully protect the Government, and therefore we yielded on those two minor amendments. I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] three minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not use the three minutes, because I know that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, is anxious to get on with his bill, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, what has been said by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is correct as regards the situation of the bill, and, desiring not to take up the time of the House, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield for a question——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request was that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentlemen want to insert in the RECORD at this place long speeches on this subject to tell why the conference report should be agreed to, when it is going to be agreed to without debate at all?

[Mr. RAKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I notice in the statement filed by the managers on the part of the House that they attempt to explain why the Senate conferees receded from the disagreement of the Senate to House amendment No. 16, known as the Underwood amendment, and I am wondering if the managers on the part of the House are attempting to defend the action of the Senate conferees, or whether they are apologizing for what they, the House conferees, accomplished by insisting upon the amendment of the House. It is rather unusual in a statement, I will say to the gentleman, for the managers on the part of the House to explain why the Senate conferees consented to recede and agree to a House amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that we had several long and very earnest conferences on that one amendment, and if you will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday you will see that the Senate had a lengthy debate on it also. My understanding of the function of a statement by a conference committee is to give the House some idea of the action of the conference committee in arriving at its determination and the effect of these amendments. I may say that I will assume the individual responsibility for the language that is used in this report.

I feel that I ought to say one thing more before I call for a vote upon this bill. There have been some statements going out over the country to the effect that some of the western Members of the House did not give the attention that they should to this measure during the many months that we have had this bill under consideration, and that if it had not been for the very important services of some of the individuals issuing those statements the bill would never have passed. I want to say on behalf of the Irrigation Committee that those kind of statements are absolute nonsense. No lobby or any agent sent on here by any water users' association or any other association has had anything whatever to do with the preparation or consideration of this bill. And anybody outside of Congress who claims to have exercised any control or influence over this legislation is gratuitously assuming an importance which he does not possess and ought not to be paid for. All of the Irrigation Committee and the western Members generally have worked long and faithfully and well upon this bill.

Now I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the House on the final action that is about to be taken on the reclamation extension bill. Its enactment into law will confer a double benefit—to the Government by insuring the continuation of our national irrigation policy and to the water users by making it certain that they will be able to meet their payments promptly without undue hardship. Under the operation of this act we will create an irrigated empire in the West providing homes for thousands of our citizens. The new settlers upon the projects will help to feed and clothe the Nation, and they will consume an increasing share of its manufactured products at a place where no European war can interfere with the exchange of such commodities.

While I do not approve of the amendment which provides for annual appropriations by Congress from the reclamation fund, yet whatever of evil that may come from this change is overbalanced by the other excellent features of this measure. I therefore vouch for the good effect of this bill with my whole heart, and I am qualified to testify in its behalf. I am of the first generation of Americans grown to manhood in the arid West. I was born in an irrigated valley. I have watered my father's fields by night. I have led the liquid of life on to the parched earth, and I know the goodly smell that rises when the water touches the dusty clods.

When the dry years came I saw fair fields and fruitful orchards go back to the desert. I saw the horses pawing at the roots of the alfalfa, for there was no green thing for them to eat. Even the trees on the ditch banks died. The people prayed for rain, but there was no cloud in the sky, and the streams went dry.

And then I have seen it all return. This same land has blossomed again under the beneficence of the reclamation act. The trees along the fences and the section lines have grown thick, until they cut off the view like a forest. The pastures are green and the cattle fat. There is hope in the land. Men know that when they plant the seed a bountiful harvest will surely follow. By this act the Government does its part to guarantee them an opportunity to enjoy continued prosperity.

I assure you that they are a grateful people. They do not always forgive their enemies, but they never forget their friends, and I know that I speak for every water user in the West when I thank the Members of this House who have assisted in the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a couple of minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the relief that is extended to the settlers on these irrigated lands, this bill is to be commended because of another great reform which it institutes. It provides practically for the repeal of another of the permanent appropriations, and puts in the control of Congress the determination of how much money is to be expended in each fiscal year for reclamation purposes and the projects upon which it is to be expended.

If this power had been retained by Congress when the irrigation law was first enacted, I am quite convinced that there would not have arisen the situation which now plagues the people of the arid and semiarid States. If it has been necessary for the Department of the Interior to submit to the Congress the estimates for the various projects to be initiated, and to have had them carefully investigated in advance and passed upon, and specific appropriations made therefor, not only would considerable waste and indefensible extravagance have been avoided, but many of the settlers who, in good faith, have taken up these lands would have been relieved of the embarrassment in which they now find themselves.

I think I can say that it is the intention of the House, when the estimates will be submitted, as they will be hereafter, and when these appropriations will probably be included, as such appropriations are, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, to make an impartial and thorough and fair investigation, not for the purpose in any way of crippling the department in the conduct of these enterprises, but in order to safeguard the interests both of the Treasury and of the settlers, and to provide adequate funds to carry on these projects in a proper, efficient, and economical manner; to avoid waste and extravagance, and to conserve alike the interests of the settlers and those interested in the development of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I hope the prophecy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may prove to be true in this matter. I will merely call attention in this connection to the fact that I think one reason why the West is somewhat incredulous about this Underwood amendment and as to how it will affect us is because we have no representation on the Committee on Appropriations from anywhere in that entire western half of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon; the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is a member of that committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I mean the majority membership of the House has no representative from the West on that committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Those States do not represent the majority of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Democratic Party represents a majority of this House, and there is no Democrat at this time on that committee from anywhere west of the Missouri River.

Mr. MANN. It will not have in the next Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman from Colorado that I was one of those who voted for the irrigation bill when it first passed the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I know that, and we appreciate your support.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I am as much interested, and the people of the East and the South and the Northeast are as much interested in the development of these lands as are the people who are to get the direct benefit. All that we desire is to have those lands developed in a manner that shall be free from criticism and to prevent unfair and undue burdens being placed alike upon the settlers and the taxpayers of the United States generally.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not mean to impute to the gentleman or to his committee or to anyone any unfairness or unfriendliness. I have implicit confidence in this House acting wisely and fairly in the distribution of the reclamation fund. I was merely endeavoring to suggest to the gentleman that we Members from the States in which these reclamation projects are situated, and our constituents naturally feel that we know the needs of the West better than anyone can who does not live there, and we therefore feel that we are entitled to representation on that committee when it comes to dealing with irrigation affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I had my way in choosing the personnel on the committees I would not appoint anyone from an interested State on one of these committees dealing with these affairs, and I would not have any man on the committee interested in a project for which an appropriation was to be made.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would you put any man coming from a river and harbor district on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I would not. I would have men on that committee coming from the interior of the country, where no rivers and harbors would be legislated for; and then I think we would secure legislation for the benefit of the people of the United States, instead of for the benefit of the particular districts represented by the men on that committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When does the gentleman think that Utopian condition will come in this House? Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Some minutes ago the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] asked leave to extend their remarks, and the question was never put. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. MOON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 7967, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know just what the Senate amendments really are to the first section of the bill, although as printed they do not make sense. But section 2 of the bill, I should think, ought to go to the committee, and I therefore object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. MOON. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I think that section 2, which the Senate has added by way of an amendment, is a matter that ought to be considered by the committee.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman object to its going to conference?

Mr. MANN. I do at present.

Mr. MOON. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I move to take the bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MOON. I move, Mr. Speaker, to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

Mr. MOON. What is the reason?

Mr. MANN. The Senate amendment by way of section 2 involves the whole question of savings banks.

Mr. MOON. It does not involve any charge on the Treasury or appointment to any office.

Mr. MANN. Certainly it does. It provides how the money is to be invested and authorizes the payment of interest, and a lot of other things.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may the amendment be reported to the House for information?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 4: After line 11 insert:

"SEC. 2. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under national or State laws, and whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, being subject to National or State supervision and examination, and the sums deposited shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories thereof; but 5 per cent of such funds shall be withdrawn by the board of trustees and kept with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be treasurer of the board of trustees, in lawful money as a reserve. The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities, supported by the taxing power, as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt payment of such deposits on demand. The funds received at the postal savings depository offices in each city, town, village, and other locality shall be deposited in banks located therein (substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank) willing to receive such deposits under the terms of this act and the regulations made by authority thereof, but the amount deposited in any one bank shall at no time exceed the amount of the paid-in capital and one-half the surplus of such bank. If no such bank exist in any city, town, village, or locality, or if none where such deposits are made will receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then such funds shall be deposited under the terms of this act in the bank most convenient to such locality. If no such bank in any State or Territory is willing to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then the same shall be deposited with the treasurer of the board of trustees and shall be counted in making up the reserve of 5 per cent. Such funds may be withdrawn from the treasurer of said board of trustees, and all other postal savings funds, or any part of such funds, may be at any time withdrawn from banks and savings depository offices for the repayment of postal savings depositors when required for that purpose. When, in the judgment of the President, war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States. The board of trustees may, in its discretion, purchase from the holders thereof bonds which have been or may be issued under the provisions of section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910. Interest and profit accruing from the deposits or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue: Provided, That postal savings funds in the treasury of said board shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act, and not otherwise: Provided further, That the board of trustees may at any time dispose of bonds held as postal savings investments and use the proceeds to meet withdrawals of deposits by depositors. For the purposes of this act the word 'Territory,' as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the District of Alaska, and Porto Rico, and the word 'bank' shall be held to include savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think under the rule a House bill with Senate amendments can be taken from the Speaker's table and considered, if it is not subject to consideration in Committee of the Whole, or would not have gone to the Union Calendar if reported. I think the whole question involved here is whether this amendment makes a charge on the Treasury of the United States. I understand that the interest rate is not changed. If the interest rate is not changed, it seems to me that the remainder of the bill is subject to consideration in the House.

Mr. MANN. This is an original proposition. It is not even amendatory of a law. On its face it not only involves a charge on the Treasury, but it provides for the payment of interest. It provides for turning receipts into the General Treasury. It is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is not the interest rate fixed in the House bill?

Mr. MANN. It is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it not fixed in the present law to which this is amendatory?

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. This is an original proposition. Just what changes are made in this section from the existing law I do not know, but it does not purport to be amendatory of the existing law, and it does not repeal the existing law. Probably that would not be necessary. It only applies to this act. The amount involved is small, but clearly it involves a charge upon the Treasury. I do not know that I shall object to its going to conference after it comes from the committee, but this is an entirely new proposition, which has not been considered in the House, and I think it ought first to go to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not familiar enough with the law to say——

Mr. MOON. The interest rate is not changed at all. Does the gentleman from Illinois understand that the rate of interest is changed by this amendment?

Mr. MANN. I do not say. The Senate amendment is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. MOON. I know it is; but it makes no charge on the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, it does.

Mr. MOON. What is it?

Mr. MANN. It specifically provides for the payment of interest upon deposits.

Mr. MOON. The original law does that.

Mr. MANN. But this is not the original law. This is a new bill.

Mr. MOON. This is an amendment to the original law.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOON. The original law fixes the rate.

Mr. MANN. It is not even an amendment to the existing law, so far as section 2 is concerned; but if it were, it would not make any difference.

The SPEAKER. The whole question turns on this point: Does it show on its face that it is a charge on the Treasury, or not?

Mr. MANN. Either a charge on the Treasury or the raising of revenue. It shows on its face that it raises revenue, to begin with.

The SPEAKER. Suppose this was introduced as a new bill, to what calendar would it go?

Mr. MANN. It would go to the Union Calendar, undoubtedly, where the original postal savings bank bill went.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee what he has to say about this provision:

The board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States. The board of trustees may in its discretion purchase from the holders thereof bonds which have been or may be issued under the provisions of section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910.

And then the next sentence:

Interest and profit accruing from the deposits or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue.

What does the gentleman say about that? Suppose that had been introduced here as an original bill, where would it have gone?

Mr. MOON. To begin with, it is not introduced as an original bill. It is an amendment to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. I know, but the same rule applies.

Mr. MOON. As I understand, bills that appropriate money, or dispose of the public lands, or create an obligation against the Government of the United States must go to the Union Calendar. This does nothing of the sort. This does not enforce a charge upon the Treasury in any way. It is but an amendment to the existing law that fixes the rate of interest, and the purpose of this is really to add to the revenues of the Treasury instead of taking from them.

Mr. MANN. That would send it to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] say about the words that the Speaker has read?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently familiar with the bill to advise the Speaker as to the effect of it If it is a reenactment of the present statute, so far as the charge upon the Treasury is concerned, and is amendatory of those portions of the statute that are not a charge on the Treasury, it seems to me that it is in order. Of course if it is a revenue-producing bill, it goes to the Union Calendar and is not in order at this time, because undoubtedly a bill of that kind goes to the Union Calendar and can not be taken up on this motion. But if it is not a revenue-producing bill, and does not make a charge upon the Treasury, the gentleman's motion is in order. It seems to me that, so far as the interest rate is concerned, if it is a reenactment of the old law in that respect, that does not make a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, when I called up this matter I did not suppose there would be any possible objection to my motion; but there seems to be, and inasmuch as I am very anxious to get to the consideration of a measure in which the House is very much more interested than it is in this, I ask permission to withdraw that motion and to let this bill remain where it is.

The SPEAKER. It will remain on the Speaker's table, so that the Chair may have time to investigate it.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF MRS. WILSON.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee to attend the funeral of Mrs. Wilson, under the resolution agreed to yesterday (H. Res. 586), Messrs. UNDERWOOD, HAYDEN, FLOYD of Arkansas, KAHN, TAYLOR of Colorado, REILLY of Connecticut, BROCKSON, SPARKMAN, ADAMSON, FRENCH, MANN, DIXON, HAUGEN, MURDOCK, STANLEY, BROUSSARD, GUERNSEY, TALBOTT of Maryland, GILLETT, SAMUEL W. SMITH, STEVENS of Minnesota, CANDLER of Mississippi, LLOYD, EVANS, ROBERTS of Nevada, KINKAID of Nebraska, REED, BAKER, FERGUSSON, PAYNE, SMALL, HELGESEN, SHERWOOD, MCGUIRE of Oklahoma, HAWLEY, BUTLER, O'SHAUNESSY, FINLEY, BURKE of South Dakota, SIMS, STEPHENS of Texas, HOWELL, PLUMLEY, JONES, HUMPHREY of Washington, HUGHES of West Virginia, COOPER, MONDELL, and LEE of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. In making up this committee the Chair appointed the Member senior in service from each State. Where there were more than one man of the same length of service—and in the case of Texas there were three—the Chair selected the oldest man. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL], who is the senior in service from that State, asked the Chair to appoint Mr. BAKER in his place. Judge BARTLETT, of Georgia, has had to leave the city, on account of the condition of his health, and the Chair appoints Mr. ADAMSON in his place. Dr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri, has not returned from Europe, and the Chair appoints Mr. LLOYD in his place; and the Chair asks unanimous consent to be permitted to appoint Mr. GORDON LEE, of Georgia, a member of the committee, because Mrs. Wilson is to be buried in his district. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has information that the White House will give out a statement about the President's desire in respect to these committees.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SINNOTT, for five days, on account of illness in his family.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

On motion of Mr. MOON, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES]. [Applause.]

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, years ago, when under the last Cleveland administration, I was postmaster at Ann Arbor, Mich., I used to wonder at the extravagant price the Government paid the railroads for carrying the mail. Under the McKinley administration I passed through one experience of weighing the mails and heard much about it from the postal employees which left an indelible impression upon my mind as to the wrong methods used. At that time, besides hiring the railway mail cars, the Government was paying more to the railroads for transporting the mail in these cars which they had already rented than the combined salaries of all the postmasters in the United States, all the railway mail clerks, and all the clerks in the post offices of the country. In other words, it was costing the Government more for merely transporting mail in trains, which were going over the road anyway, than it was costing to pay the men who assembled this mail piece by piece, who tied it up, put it in pouches or sacks, redistributed it, often many times, and also the men who sold the stamps and who handed it out piece by piece to the people.

Now, years later, as a Congressman and a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, charged with the duty of investigating the subject of railway mail pay, I find the railroads claiming that they are underpaid, because the railway mail pay does not now use up as large a percentage of the mail revenue as it did 20 years ago. Now, the railroads ask for a continuance of the present method of payment at an increased rate, and fight the method of payment advocated in this bill because they claim that they do not know that they will get an increased revenue under it. And each Member of this House has been deluged with literature, much of which attacks your Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for daring to present for your consideration a bill based upon what we conceive to be more scientific lines than the present system. And their chief indictment against us is that we did not call them before our committee for hearings upon the subject. But a joint committee on postage on second-class matter and compensation for the transportation of the mails was appointed by the Senate and the House in August, 1912, and that committee had extensive hearings of the railroads, which came down as late as April of this year, and these hearings in 12 volumes were before us. After reading what the railroad representatives had to say in these 12 volumes of hearings, I for one am pretty firmly of the opinion that unless the railroads employed a far different set of experts the sum of our knowledge would be but little increased were we to go into such extensive hearings that this present Congress could not consider any bill upon this subject. The sum total of the railroad demands can be comprehended in the general statement that they want more pay. The mails have increased, therefore pay must increase. That proposition is true only if predicated on the proposition that the railway mail pay system in use since 1873 is a proper system founded on scientific lines and paying a just amount of revenue to each railroad. But the railroads themselves will not claim this. Nobody can deny that under the present system some railroads are grossly underpaid. Some railroads lose money carrying the mails, other roads make money. It is a complicated system. It is on the face of it unjust. For instance, the Government pays $5,000 or more a year rental for a 60-foot railroad postal car, and then it pays by weight for the mail carried in this car. But it pays not a penny rental for a 30-foot apartment car used in the same way. So the mail routes not requiring full postal cars are greatly discriminated against.

The rental paid for the postal car is not for compensating the road for constructing the car. Two years' rental would build the car. It is paid for transporting the car over the road. The Government having paid once for this, why should it pay again by weighing the 2½ or 3 tons of mail going in the car and paying for that? The railroads complain that the mail is weighed only once in four years, so that they do not get increased pay for increased weight until the next weighing period comes around. That is a defect ought to be remedied in this bill, under which the railroads get pay for all space used. If the mails increase and more space is required, that instant the railway mail pay for the increased space begins. But, going back to my own personal observations as to weighing the mails when I was postmaster, during the period when the mails were weighed the mails enormously increased. During that period all the heavy catalogues were received; there was a tremendous influx of heavy Government documents. I am speaking solely of what I saw in my own office. But I was informed by old railroad mail clerks with whom I talked at that time that that had always been the case at such periods. When the weighing ceased there was a tremendous letting up on the weight of mail received. I never knew how this extra weight came about, but I used to wonder if a railroad could not very well afford to pay a part of the postage of heavy catalogue houses if they would send their catalogues during the weighing period, as they would get railway mail pay on the weight of these catalogues over and over again during the succeeding four years. But be this as it may, before the four years' weighing period came around again the natural increase in the mail usually caught up and left the railroads underpaid, if the amount they received right after the weighing period was a just compensation.

It has been known for years that the present system of paying for mail transportation was unsatisfactory. It is so complex that in half an hour I could not give you a clear enough conception of it so that you could understand it. We can not tell our constituents whether any given railroad is receiving a just compensation or not without spending days on the problem. The railroads themselves, in the hearings, demonstrated to my satisfaction that they could not tell. Naturally they claim that they are underpaid, but when it comes to fixing the amount they are underpaid they are at sea. Take the different estimates of the total amount of underpayment made by the railroads after they had had committee figuring on it for months, as testified to before the commission. Throughout their testimony runs a general claim of $15,000,000 underpayment; yet when they come to produce their figures by different methods they arrive at the following results: On page 106 of the hearings they claim they are annually underpaid $38,000,000, yet on page 1074 they get down to the exact dollar and put the figures at $6,852,841. On page 1074, by different methods, they claim the amount of their underpayment is $20,044,859 and $17,229,305 and repeat these claims on page 1114. On page 1087 they have two other estimates of total losses, one of $20,815,154 and another of $13,591,154, while on page 183 they figure that it would cost the Government between $10,500,000 and $11,500,000 to give them the increase which would prove satisfactory.

The fact is that the railroads have never figured out the cost to their own satisfaction or to that of anybody else. There never was but one bona fide attempt to figure out the cost, and that was made by the Post Office Department, which gathered figures from the railroads on the operation of the mails for November of the year 1909, and deduced from these figures that the railroads were overpaid at that time $9,000,000 a year. This was published in a document well known as Document No. 105, and a great share of the hearings before the joint commission of the Senate and House was taken up by fierce attacks on this document. Yet the railroads, while claiming that they were greatly underpaid, have never offered any figures except figures based on their receiving an arbitrary per cent of the revenue of the post office, or figures based on changes they wanted made in the figures in Document No. 105. Apparently the railroads do not know what it costs them to carry freight, to carry passengers, to carry express, to carry mail. So many items of expense common to all branches of the service they divide arbitrarily. Mr. Safford, mail and express agent of the Seaboard Air Line, well expressed it on page 137 of the hearings when he said:

For instance, if you start out to accomplish a given result you can adopt a method of apportionment that will most nearly bring about the result you started for.

Again he said:

There is no generally accepted method of apportionment at the present time.

And his testimony as to the cost to his own road of carrying the mails amply bears out these assertions, for he used eight different methods of figuring profit or loss on the $467,522.26 paid the Seaboard Air Line for carrying the mails in 1912, and they varied in results from a profit of $48,117.78 to a loss of $289,147.84. What is such figuring worth?

Mr. Peters, chairman of the railroad committee, on page 186 of the hearings, admitted that prior to 1909 the railroads had no definite knowledge as to whether they were making a profit or losing on their mail contracts; that is, they did not know anything about it until the post-office officials had prepared Document No. 105, which they now hate so intensely. They say they want more money, and we believe that, but their committee, which has worked, they say, for four years on this subject, only relies upon the figures in Document No. 105 for their proofs, and these figures they alter by adding what has been called dead space. Mr. Mack, traffic manager of the Missouri Pacific, argues on page 615 of the hearings:

Costs are not definite and reliable. The costs are based upon an arbitrary division.

And yet if the costs are not reliable, how can they so confidently figure out that they are underpaid? Mr. Worthington, of the Southern Pacific, on page 348, says:

In my opinion it is absolutely impossible to anywhere nearly ascertain a cost. You can obtain an estimate of cost, but that will vary with the person who makes the estimate.

And again on the same page he says:

Fixed charges can not be allocated at all, whilst only about one-half of the operating expenses can be allocated between passenger and freight service. The remainder must be approximated, and this approximation varies widely, according to the judgment of the individual making it. No two experts would agree on this apportionment.

Mr. Snead, of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, on page 395, says:

The cost question never would be anything better than an approximation.

Mr. Wishart, statistician of the New York Central lines, on pages 607 and 608, bears testimony to his belief that it is an absolute impossibility to evolve a plan of cost accounting for railroads that would be universal in its application. Mr. Peters, the chairman of the railroad committee, on page 839, says:

I do not see how you can reach any reasonable or fair basis of pay fixed on cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why can not the gentleman have more time?

Mr. MOON. Because I have not more time to yield him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from Michigan yield him some more time?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would the gentleman like 10 minutes?

Mr. BEAKES. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, again, on page 1322, in speaking of the lack of separation of costs by the railroads, he lays it to "the large expense involved in getting at the information, and what was the value of them after we got them?" He says rates have been made that would simply move and build up the traffic. Mr. Scott, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, illustrated the cost difficulty by remarking on page 1323 of the hearings:

I dislike to talk about such a complicated proposition as the fuel on a fast passenger train, for I think if you were to ask 25 experts to come here and give you an opinion you would probably get 25 different opinions in regard to it.

There is a practical unanimity of opinion in the railroad testimony as to the inability to accurately estimate cost. And yet the railroads have seen fit in communications sent to the Members of this House and circulated through the press to attack your committee because we do not agree with them that they are underpaid $15,000,000. Or is it $6,000,000 or $39,000,000? How do they know that they are underpaid when they admit they can not figure the cost?

And yet the railroads will not claim that if the carrying the mails on their roads were discontinued that they would make as much as they do now. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who was a member of the joint committee, and whose illuminating questions, to my mind, brought out most clearly the information he sought, and to whom, I believe, the country owes a big debt of gratitude for his able services on the joint committee, cornered Mr. Mack, of the Missouri Pacific, who had been claiming big losses for his road, with the question:

What do you think would be the effect if your railroad carried no mail? Would its surplus fund be as great at the end of the year, or its earnings as great each year?

To this Mr. Mack answered:

Why, no. We would save, of course, the cost of the special trains and save the terminal costs that are incident to the performance of the mail service, but aside from that, probably, the passenger service and other train service would be the same.

No wonder Mr. LLOYD broke out on page 589 of the hearings:

I want to state right here that my candid judgment is that you can cut out the mail service and every important road in the United States would lose by reason of cutting it out at the present rate of pay.

And Mr. Lorenz, the associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, added:

There is no question but that Mr. LLOYD is correct. That is to say, there is hardly any contention on the part of the railroads that the mail revenue is not as great as the additional expense caused by the mail service; they are running the passenger trains, anyhow, and the extra cost of carrying the mail cars is certainly not as great as the mail revenue.

While the railroads' net earnings are increased by their mail contracts, they have no valid ground for claiming that they are underpaid until they can produce some statistics to prove that the just share the Government should pay toward the interest on their debts, the dividends on their stock, the salaries of their officers, the expenses of their stations, and so forth, is not now paid by the Government. They own they can not figure the cost. They own that it would be a moneyed loss to them to lose their mail contracts, and yet they are using the public press and the mails in an effort to convince the public that they are grossly underpaid, and that the Post Office Department is not dealing fairly with them. And of these assertions they have no proofs, simply assumptions based on figures in Document No. 105, which they at the same time claim are incorrect.

As Second Assistant Postmaster General Stewart points out, under the present law there are 3,409 different adjusted rates of pay per mile per annum. These rates vary for a ton mile from $1.49 on a daily average weight of 211 pounds or less to 5.76 cents on 48,000 pounds or more average daily weight. The present law also provides two rates of pay for the same service. It ignores the frequency of the service; that is, the pay to the railroads is the same for an average weight of mail, whether they load it on 1 train or on 10 trains. The greater part of the space used in transporting the mail is for distribution purposes. A railroad post-office car 60 feet in length will carry on the average two and a half tons of mail. About one-tenth of the railroad pay is for space, and yet it is evident that very much more than one-tenth of the car space used is used for distribution purposes. The railroads maintain that if the weight of the mail increases 50 per cent their compensation should increase 50 per cent. Let's see about that. Mr. Scott, of the Pennsylvania lines, testified on page 223:

It costs just as much to haul a ton of car as it does a ton of freight.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEAKES. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In this new philosophy of paying by space, which has been adopted by the committee and which is now proposed to the House, what is the explanation why you are paying for a storage car a different rate from what you are paying for a full railway post-office car? For a storage car you pay 20 cents and for a full railway post-office car 21 cents. How are you going to explain that to the man who asks? Why should there be a difference of rates in those two cars?

Mr. BEAKES. The railroad has to take a good deal more care of a railway post-office car than a storage car.

Mr. MURDOCK. We give them terminal and additional charges for that.

Mr. BEAKES. Yes; and also the car has to be a better car. It has to be a car capable of preserving the life of the postal employees in the car, while no postal employees are carried in the storage cars. Often a storage car is not anything more than an ordinary freight car used for that purpos..

Mr. TUTTLE. But that difference would not amount to anything like a cent a mile. The difference in the interest on the investment would be a very slight expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the commission recommended the same rate for both storage and railway post-office cars.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the bill does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The department does not.

Mr. MURDOCK. And that is the explanation the gentleman has to offer on that score?

Mr. BEAKES. Yes.

The testimony regarding the weight of the empty mail cars shows that they vary from 45 tons to 58 tons. Take the lowest figure and we then have 2½ tons of mail carried in a 45-ton car, or a total weight of 47½ tons. If the mail carried increases 50 per cent, we then have 3¾ tons of mail—a total weight of 48¾ tons. Taking weight as a basis of the cost of hauling, an increase of 50 per cent in the weight of mail would then only increase the weight to be hauled 5 per cent. The unfairness of paying the railroads a half more for what only costs them one-twentieth more is apparent, and the illogical system of railway mail pay as at present determined is clearly shown. Even the railroad witnesses have recognized this. Mr. Anderson, general manager of the Charleston & West Carolina Railroad, on page 205 of the hearings, said:

We are called upon by the Government to furnish facilities that involve the handling to-day of 205 pounds of mail in each direction. We could just as easily handle a thousand and never know the difference; and that is the only way to measure it, by pounds. At the same time, we also know that when we compare 250 pounds of mail with 1,000 pounds of mail, both handled in a car that weighs 40,000 pounds, as the saying is, it does not cut much ice.

Mr. Anderson illustrated clearly the inconsistency of standing for the present weighing system. He says it does not cut any ice whether the mail be 250 pounds or 1,000 pounds—that is, it would not cost his road any more—and in the same breath he says the only way to measure the pay is by pounds. Mr. Wade, of the Erie Railroad, in the illustrations he used to show underpayment at present, proved even more clearly the absolute inequality and injustice of the present system of railway mail pay. He dug out some short routes on his railroad system where mail was carried in apartment cars, and showed that on these sample routes the revenue for carrying the mail varied from 1.25 cents per car mile to 10.81 cents per car mile. All of these routes were clearly unremunerative, but the difference even more clearly demonstrates the folly of taking the weight as a basis for paying for the mails.

The railroads part of the time claim that mail should be treated as freight, as that is what the weight basis leads to, but as the mail is carried on passenger trains they nowhere use the freight figures in attempting to measure the cost. As Mr. Scott, of the Pennsylvania lines, testified:

In the case of the mails, we haul 20.6 tons of dead weight for each ton of mail, while for freight we only haul 1.06 tons of dead weight for each ton of freight.

The difference in the two services is demonstrated. The service is really the same as the passenger service, where space is considered in the making of rates. In Document No. 105 the Post Office Department attempted to figure out the cost by space. That this was the correct method is indicated by the fact that the railroads, while claiming they should be paid by weight, have based all their figuring of cost on a comparison of space used. Even in freight different rates are charged for different articles. Light, bulky freight pays more than heavy freight, because it occupies more space. A buggy set up pays more freight than a buggy crated, because you get fewer of them in a car. But let us leave this question to the testimony of the railroads themselves. Mr. Scott, of the Pennsylvania lines, on page 232 of the hearings, said in reply to a pertinent question:

I do not think that there are any railroads who show in their accounts a direct charge for the mail business or the express business or the passenger business. All we have are the average figures as to the average earnings and cost per passenger or the average earnings and cost per passenger train. In 1898, when Mr. McCrea made his statement, and at every other time that we have attempted to secure the information, we have tried to do so by finding out what proportion of the space occupied on passenger trains was occupied by mail, passengers, and express, and that is all we have in regard to the cost.

This bill which your committee has reported favorably pays the railroads for the space occupied. The reason that the railroads are opposing the bill was brought out by the following dialogue between Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Scott, on page 233 of the hearings:

Mr. LLOYD. * * * Take a passenger coach, a mail coach, and an express coach; in order to determine how much the mail should pay, you ascertain the space that is used for mail, the space that is used for passengers, and the space that is used for express.

Mr. SCOTT. Almost invariably; but some roads divide it on the basis of earnings.

Mr. LLOYD. Then, why would you say that the same basis is not the proper method of determining what your compensation should be?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Lloyd, I do not know anything about the space basis; that is, I do not know anything about where it is going to lead us. If we could agree with the Postmaster General upon the percentages and upon a division of the expenses between passenger and freight service, I do not know but that this might work out very satisfactorily to the railroads.

Mr. LLOYD. Is not this true: The thing that has alarmed the railroads is the statement made by the Postmaster General that the space basis would result in a saving of $9,000,000?

Mr. SCOTT. Why, undoubtedly.

Mr. LLOYD. If that is true, you people would naturally be opposed to it, because it would cut down your pay?
Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly.
Mr. LLOYD. Forgetting all about that, for the sake of argument, is it not true that, after all, every one of us must necessarily come back to the space basis to determine what should be the compensation?
Mr. SCOTT. I do not know any other way to do it.

Mr. Mack, of the Missouri Pacific, on page 1397, answered the question—

What is the method by which you arrive at a determination that you are $15,000,000 underpaid?

By saying:

On the comparison of space occupied.

And in reply to the further question—

Your contention is that the mail payment should be based upon and commensurate with the passenger returns—a revenue basis entirely?

He said:

Yes, sir; on the ground that the passenger rates are either approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to interstate rates, and are approved or fixed as intrastate rates by the State railroad commissions or State laws.

Mr. Bowman, a public accountant of high standing, employed by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad to find out for them what it was costing them to carry the mails, in his testimony most strongly indorsed the position of the Post Office Department. He would eliminate weight entirely from the consideration of mail compensation to the railroads, because it introduces factors that are impossible of determination. He would have the pay based on the space used. That is the opinion of the joint committee of the Senate and House who investigated the subject. That is the opinion of the Post Office Department, both of this and the last administrations. That is the opinion of your Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. And that must be the opinion of nearly every man who really studies the question.

Having arrived at the opinion that the railroads should be paid for the space used, the question then arises as to what the rate of compensation for space should be. If the railroads can not figure the cost accurately, how can we be expected to do so? Second Assistant Postmaster General Stewart thinks the railroads at present are overpaid. Mr. Lorenz, associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, thinks they are slightly underpaid. The joint committee seems to have relied upon Mr. Lorenz's judgment in his, but in spite of this fact they did not follow his recommendations, but your committee in finally fixing the figures in this bill did seek to follow his recommendations. The figures given are slightly higher than originally recommended by the Post Office Department, but I believe are the figures finally agreed upon by them as giving the roads ample compensation. If the railroads do not know the cost of their passenger trains, they do know their receipts per mile for each car, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has determined the revenue derived for passenger trains for each car per mile of travel. At the time the bill was framed this determination was 25.4 cents per car mile. Since then the latest year has been figured up and shows a revenue of 24.9 cents per car mile.

The main expense to the roads of transporting the mail is the hauling of the cars. But there are certain additional expenses, such as loading the mails, switching the cars and standing room for the cars at the terminals, cleaning the cars, and so forth. These are all expenses at the terminals. So that merely to make a flat rate per mile would inure to the benefit of the very long hauls and against the roads with the short hauls. Therefore to be fair to all the roads these terminal charges in the Moon bill have been separated from the line charges. For instance, under this bill a railroad carrying a 60-foot railway postal car will receive 21 cents for each mile the car travels and $4 terminal charges for each trip. Instead of a large number of different sizes of space which may be authorized, the bill cuts down the sizes which may be called for to three—the 60-foot railway postal car, the 30-foot apartment car, and the 15-foot apartment car. The closed-pouch mail where no mail clerk is used will be carried as at present. When figured out the rate of compensation allowed by this bill is 22.96 cents, or practically 23 cents per car mile.

The following table will show clearly the gradual evolution of the rates of pay which finally culminated in the rates fixed in the Moon bill, together with the cost of each of the proposed rates to the Government. It shows the rates as fixed in the Post Office Department recommendations, the rates as recommended to the Post Office and Post Roads Committee by the joint committee of the House and Senate, and the rates as fixed in the Moon bill as recommended by the committee, and how each of these rates figure out:

The appropriations for the year 1915 as passed by the House under the old system was $56,188,000 for railroad transportation and $5,421,000 for rental of cars, a total of $61,600,000. The department's recommendation was about $550,000 less under the space system. The joint committee's recommendations would give the railroads $8,840,000 additional and the Moon bill would give them $618,000 additional. It would save, however, the expenditure of $400,000 for weighing one-quarter of the mail of the country and thus really would cost the Government only about $200,000 more, while correcting the inequalities in the pay to the various railroads.

There are several reasons why it seems to me that the rates named in the Moon bill should be adopted. They yield the railroads approximately what they get now, while altering the system of payment to a more equitable basis. As I think I have shown, there are no figures available to figure out the cost. While the Post Office Department thinks the railroads are paid too much, Mr. Lorenz, the associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, thinks they are paid too little. Neither can be sure of their position, and Mr. Lorenz says, on page 620 of the hearings:

> The existing mail revenue for the roads as a whole is, on the one hand, profitable traffic for the railroads in the sense that it more than pays the actual out-of-pocket expenses occasioned by the mail service directly or indirectly, but, on the other hand, the mail service does not pay its full proportionate share of taxes and interest charges. In other words, no crying injustice would be done to the railroads or to the Post Office Department if no radical change is made in the existing level of pay for the next three or four years, by which time it is to be hoped that the accounting practices of the railroads generally will be sufficiently developed to permit of a reasonably definite determination of the relative cost of various branches of the railroad service.

To give the railroads an increase in pay which they can not show they are entitled to would seem unjust, just as it would be unjust to reduce their pay until we are sure that they are overpaid. While costs can not be figured it has been shown that the car-mile revenue of all the cars on the passenger trains is 24.9 cents. The railroads who are loudly claiming that their freight rates are too low must make a reasonable profit at least on their passenger traffic. So we know that 24.9 cents is high enough for a passenger-car mile. I think it will be granted that the mail does not cost the railroads quite as much as the passenger traffic. The roads do not have to advertise for it; they do not have to build expensive stations and platforms for it; they do not have to have ticket agents and employ an expensive accounting system; they do not have to have so many trainmen for the mails; and there are many things they have to do for the comfort of the passengers which they do not have to do for the mails. Mr. Lorenz says that the expense is not exceeding 10 per cent less. The rates in the Moon bill figure out 7½ per cent less than the passenger-car-mile revenue, so that the committee has met the suggestion of the statistician on whom the joint committee placed so much reliance. Their rates are too high as they figure out even higher than the passenger revenue.

The rate fixed in the Moon bill is at least as high as the railroads receive from the express companies, with whom they have made voluntary contracts. Some of the companies have acknowledged that they got more out of mail than express. My time will not permit my going into an extensive argument on express rates, but the conclusion I arrived at from my study was that the express rate is lower than what the railroads now receive from the mails, but the railroads clearly do not know what the express is costing them.

The Canadian Government last winter raised the pay of the railroads for carrying the mails in Canada, and at the same time adopted the space basis for paying for the mails. But their rates are clearly below cost, if the mails are expected to pay their just share of overhead expenses and fixed charges as do the passenger, freight, and express traffic. When the railroads complain of the rates in the Moon bill, they should know that while they will get 21 cents per car mile for a railway postal car, the Canadian railroads will get only 16 cents; and for a 30-foot apartment car, the American roads will get 10½ cents a car mile, while the Canadian roads get only 9 cents. And in addition, the American roads will get terminal charges, while the Canadian roads do not get this at all. It will be noticed that the Post Office Department and the joint committee recommended relieving the railroads entirely of what they call the side and terminal service, but it was estimated that it would cost the Government over $2,000,000 to do this work, while the railroad testimony indicated that it did not cost them but $500,000. So in the Moon bill this service is left with the railroads, thus enabling the Moon bill to provide for the payment of $2,000,000 more than recommended by the Post Office Department to the railroads for services which they estimate will cost them $500,000, without extra cost to the Government. But there are individual cases where this side and terminal services cost the railroads more than they get, so that the Moon bill provides that in his discretion the Postmaster General may relieve the railroads of this service.

You may ask why the railroads should oppose this bill. Some of them are getting an undue advantage over others in the distribution of pay now—are getting more than their share of it. But the main reason is that an increase in the weight of the mails is anticipated in the future, and the railroads figure that an increase of one-half would give them 50 per cent more pay on the weight basis, while, as I have illustrated, if no more space was used, they would only haul a car and load weighing 48¾ tons instead of a car and load weighing 47½ tons. This bill, while going to a basis on which costs can be figured, will mean a big saving to the Government in the future in the cost of carrying the mails, while assuring the railroads of a reasonable, fair, and just compensation.

For over 20 years efforts have been made to go to a space basis for transportation of the mails. Commission after commission has worked on the problem. Committee after committee has discussed it. It remains for the Sixty-third Congress, the greatest constructive Congress of the century, to complete the work. This bill will equalize the distribution of the mail pay among the transportation companies. It will enable future committees and future Congresses to know whether or not the compensation is reasonable and just. It will put a stop to much of the friction between the department and the railroads. It will greatly simplify the keeping of the railroad accounts. It will put a stop to claims of underpayment between weighing periods, and if the mails double in weight, it will not compel the Government to double the compensation to the railroads to haul one-tenth more weight. As fast as the mails increase to require more space the railroads will get their compensation. I feel confident that this bill will appeal to your better judgment and that for the first time the Government is about to put its compensation for mail transportation upon a scientific basis. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, a Senate amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, afterwards approved by conference and adopted by the House, was as follows:

> Provided, That on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

There was no extended debate on this amendment either in the Senate or the House, but there had been extended debate on a similar proposition when the bill was before the House originally, and the purpose of that amendment was to give a flat increase to the rural free delivery carriers.

However, the purpose of both House and Senate seemed to be clear from the fact that the amount appropriated for rural carriers by the House, without any increase, was $48,650,000, whereas when the Senate adopted the amendment it increased the appropriation for rural carriers $4,350,000, making a total of $53,000,000.

As the number of rural carriers in the United States for the fiscal year of 1914 was 43,535, it will be readily seen that the appropriation called for a round number equal to the increase of each carrier's salary, $100. This appropriation for the year was not made for the purpose of having a large unexpended balance, but was made to be expended for the purpose stated in the amendment.

Further, so far as inquiry could develop, it was understood by the membership of this House and the Senate that a flat increase of $100 should be given to the carriers on all standard routes and a corresponding increase to those of shorter routes.

The Postmaster General has placed an entirely different construction upon the law, and, following that construction, has made a graduated scale of salaries based upon mileage, number of packages, and weight. This is not only a violation of the spirit and purpose of the act, but I believe it is a violation of a well-settled policy of the Government. It has long been the policy of the Government that where the Post Office Department is used to compete with private enterprise there should not be given extraordinary inducements to the Government employees to go out of their way to obtain business in competition with private enterprise.

The schedule which follows certainly is designed to make a Government business drummer out of every rural carrier:

[Order No. 8246.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 14, 1914.

On and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of rural carriers shall be based upon the length of routes and the number of pieces and the weight of mail carried as shown by the records of the department, and their rates of pay shall be computed on and fixed according to the following schedule:

Schedule.

Length of route.	Salary base.	Pieces of mail per month.	Pounds of mail per month.
4 miles and less than 6 miles	$480	3,000	400
6 miles and less than 8 miles	528	3,700	490
8 miles and less than 10 miles	576	4,400	580
10 miles and less than 12 miles	624	5,100	670
12 miles and less than 14 miles	672	5,800	760
14 miles and less than 16 miles	720	6,500	850
16 miles and less than 18 miles	840	7,200	940
18 miles and less than 20 miles	960	7,900	1,030
20 miles and less than 22 miles	1,080	8,600	1,120
22 miles and less than 24 miles	1,152	9,300	1,210
24 miles and over	1,200	10,000	1,300

An increase or decrease of $12 per annum shall be made for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds, respectively, greater or less than the schedule, and an allowance of $12 per annum shall be made for each closed pouch or closed sack of mail carried per day and also for each full mile of route served in excess of 25 miles in length: Provided, That no carrier shall be reduced in present compensation because of this order and that $1,200 per annum shall be the maximum salary.

A carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the combined length of the two routes.

The compensation of carriers on newly established routes shall be at the rates in effect June 30, 1914.

A. S. BURLESON.

The inducement presented is to increase the number of packages and increase the amount of weight which he carries. The method of doing so, of course, readily suggests itself to the carrier who desires to swell his salary. The means presented is to swell the number and weight of his mail carrying. I made some calculations concerning the effect of the Postmaster General's order upon the carriers of my district, and I submit them:

There are 239 carriers.
Five are not yet rated.
Of the 234 rated, 9 have routes of less than 24 miles.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 40 receive no increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 15 receive $4 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 18 receive $6 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 29 receive $28 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 29 receive $40 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 16 receive $50 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 18 receive $64 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 11 receive $76 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 1 receives $80 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 16 receive $88 increase.
Of the 225 standard routes rated, 32 receive $100 increase.

The average salary of these 225 carriers, $1,145; average increase, $45. The average length of these 225 routes, 26.17 miles.

If the schedule for my district presents an average throughout the country, then more than one-half of the appropriation for increase of salary would not be used.

The appropriation was fairly made by the Congress. Its purpose was clear to grant the flat $100 increase to the rural carriers of the United States. The schedule adopted by the Postmaster General is clearly improper, in that it deprives the carriers of that which the Congress voted them to have, and it is an attempt to make the rural carriers business drummers for the United States to interfere with and change the usual and ordinary course of competition in private business. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman please state to the committee the amount of money the Government is losing per annum on its rural-letter service?

Mr. SLOAN. I could not state that the Government is losing in the end, in the aggregate, anything by this Rural Free Delivery Service, anymore than it is in any other department of the service.

Mr. MOON. I will put my question in another way. The answer involves so many elements and suggestions that I will put it in this way: How much money is the Government receiving now as the revenue from the rural-carrier service, and how much is it paying out for that service?

Mr. SLOAN. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I can not state the exact figures, but if the rural free delivery carriers were bringing nothing to the Government, it would not interfere with the legal force of the proposition which I am presenting.

Mr. MOON. I am not arguing against the gentleman's views along that line. I just wanted to impress the gentleman with the fact of the figures, that when you come down to the cold-blooded cash, we are getting about $13,000,000 in round figures from that service, and we are paying for it $53,000,000, or a dead loss of $40,000,000 per annum.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman, and I knew that on a question of figures he was ready to answer his own question, and undoubtedly his statement is true, but I am satisfied that out of the efforts and work of the 43,000 who in sunshine and storm go every week day to the farmers of this country, they start in operation postal business which is a basis for a large portion of the department's revenue.

Mr. MOON. I do not want the gentleman to understand that I am arguing against his proposition at all.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, no; the gentleman, the chairman, undoubtedly was assisting me. I think we think about my proposition almost the same, but the other gentlemen who are before me, the large crowd of gentlemen on the minority side, and the multitude on the majority side, save and except the chairman, are the ones I want to convince. I know the chairman is with me.

Mr. MOON. Oh yes. The chairman is with you, except on the revenue theory.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, that is a mighty important concession for the chairman to make, if he would be for the striking out of those words, "not exceeding."

Mr. MOON. We will talk about that later.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not also true that those words "not exceeding" have been carried by law from the very beginning, but they have never before been used in this item as they are being used to-day?

Mr. SLOAN. The construction of the Postmaster General is an innovation.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to section 13 of this bill, which says:

SEC. 13. That postmasters, assistant postmasters, clerks, or other employees at post offices of the presidential grade, and postmasters at post offices of the fourth class, shall not be allowed or paid any additional compensation for the transaction of postal savings depository business.

In other words, an employee of the Post Office Department is not expected to become a drummer of business on behalf of the Government against the other activities of private enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss section 4 of this act, which provides that assistant postmasters shall be subject to examination. It is sometimes, I think, wise and enlightening in considering legislation and its effect to look upon the motives and the purposes of the men who introduce it and who are pushing it, and it seems to me that is peculiarly pertinent to this paragraph, because we all know that this does not represent the real wishes of the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, who has presented it. This is only an emasculated edition. He showed his real desires last winter when the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration, when he introduced the proposition that assistant postmasters should be entirely exempt from the civil service and become part of the spoils of office. That is what he wanted, and in urging that he made these comments:

That is what I call a Democratic section of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the power were mine I would put none but Democrats on guard. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say that, so far as the postmasters and their assistants are concerned, I would have the party in power to name them and to take the responsibility. You can not administer this Government in accordance with the principles and policies of the Democratic Party as decreed by the people at the polls a year and a half ago unless you have Democrats to aid in this administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is what the gentleman really desired, and that is what that side of the House really purposed; but they were unsuccessful in carrying through that legislation because, it is reported, the Postmaster General, who openly declared himself opposed to it, went to the President, and the influence of the President, which we have so often seen effectual in this House, was put to work, and the Committee on Rules would not make that proposition in order. It makes us regret all the more that the same influence was not exerted against other raids upon the civil service which this Congress has carried through, but I am happy to say that particular legislation was prevented.

And now comes in this section which attempts to accomplish what they can in that same direction. And they are following a precedent. This section follows exactly the line which was followed in the case of fourth-class postmasters. You remember that last year, when this Congress first came into active being, on that side of the House there was a tremendous agitation and enthusiasm to exempt the fourth-class postmasters from the civil service and make them patronage appointments once more, and such an amendment was introduced. And its sponsor, Mr. BARTLETT, remarked, in advocating it:

I know that there is no office, in my judgment, under a Democratic administration that could not be better filled by a Democrat than by a Republican. If you can call that the spoils system, you are welcome to so denominate it.

Then it was suggested, by the administration I suppose, that there should be done to fourth-class postmasters exactly what is now proposed for assistant postmasters—that all those in office should be subjected to a competitive examination. That device, apparently so harmless and fair, at once satisfied the seekers for patronage. They obviously expected to obtain under it the spoils they hungered for. The proposition to exempt them from the civil service was dropped, and they have been content under the new regulations. So, not now being able against the Postmaster General's influence to accomplish directly what they desire, and exempt the assistant postmasters from the civil service, they are following the precedent of the fourth-class postmasters and are using this subterfuge to remove from office those whose places they want.

This section, either intentionally or accidentally, if it becomes law, would place assistant postmasters in a class all by themselves as regards the civil-service act. The section provides that the Postmaster General "shall, under such law, rules, and regulations, appoint all assistant postmasters." The "such law, rules, and regulations" must mean the present existing laws, rules, and regulations, so that in the future all assistant postmasters must be appointed according to the present existing rules. Those rules are likely to be changed at any time. Each President has the power to change them, and many successive Presidents have exercised that power and probably will in the future, so that the status of all other civil-service employees will depend upon the rules and regulations existing at the time. But if this section should take effect, assistant postmasters would always be subject to the rules and regulations now existing, no matter how desirable it might be that they should be affected by any changes to those rules which Presidents hereafter may make. Moreover, this legislation is entirely superfluous if the Democratic majority have confidence in their own President and Postmaster General. The President can order the changes which they incorporate into this section at any time he desires. He has absolute power to require examinations or to exempt from examinations, so that in passing this legislation they are diminishing or abolishing one of the rights of their own President.

There are peculiar reasons why the assistant postmasters should be under civil service, why they should be a permanent force, and, if efficient, secure in their positions. One reason is that when they were covered into the civil service it was under a different regulation from what was applied to any other body of men. When the assistant postmasters were covered in, recognizing how important it was to the administration of the greatest business which the United States carries on that the assistant postmasters should be efficient, there was put in the order covering them the condition that only those should be classified who would prove to the Postmaster General that they had shown capacity for efficiently conducting their office. So that everybody was not covered in, as in all the other cases, but only efficient ones were covered in. But, regardless of that, the attempt is now being made to put them entirely on the level of all the others, although only those who were efficient were covered into the service. And there is another reason why assistant postmasters should be permanent, and not be subject to the political changes of every four years. It is a wonder to me that the Post Office Department, an enormous business, can be conducted as well as it is under our present system, with a change, perhaps, every four years of the head of the department and thousands of his lieutenants. Of course there is nothing to compare it with, so we do not know how much money is wasted and how much cheaper its business might be done. Certainly no business in the United States in competition with other business could be carried on in such a way, by having a new man put in as its head every four years. I have great admiration for our present Postmaster General. I think he is a man of great ability, wisdom, and patriotism. He devotes himself most assiduously to the work of his vast department. But, although I have great admiration and confidence in him, yet I can but think that it is a very faulty practice and unscientific system which should commit an enormous business institution like our Post Office Department into the charge of a southern planter with no business experience. Not only does our extravagant system do that, but in addition his lieutenants all over the country—the postmasters who have charge of the different offices—are all changed and new men are going in who have no training in that line; so that every four years we have new men put in at the head and new men put in as lieutenants, and now comes this proposition to try to remove and make political footballs of the assistant postmasters, who are men of experience and training, and who, I think, ought permanently to stay there.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Inasmuch as the gentleman is a very ardent civil-service reformer——

Mr. GILLETT. I have not much time. Please hasten.

Mr CLINE (continuing). I would like to ask if he would be in favor of covering the first and second class postmasters, say, about the close of this administration?

Mr. GILLETT. I would. I accept that challenge. I would be very glad to have the first and second class postmasters at the end of this administration, all Democrats, covered in, and then those who are inefficient could be weeded out. I do not care much whether the postmasters or assistant postmasters or clerks in our departments are Republican or Democrat. I believe what we need particularly in the Post Office Department is efficient men; and I would like to have the whole service covered in and made permanent and have them only discharged and changed when they are inefficient.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I can not yield now. If I have time before I close, I will yield.

Now, as to these assistants, it was somewhat illuminating in the debate before on the post-office bill to listen to a question that was asked Mr. RUCKER by Mr. COOPER:

Mr. COOPER. Is it not true that under the policy or practice suggested by the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] assistant postmasters were appointed in this way: The Member of Congress wanted it understood that if John Smith was appointed postmaster it was done upon the express condition that John Brown should be the assistant postmaster, and that in many cases the postmaster had to agree to that before he could get the appointment, and in that way the Congressman fixed up a part of his own machine.

Mr. RUCKER. That is exactly what I would do in every case, and I have no apology for it.

So that obviously was the purpose then, and the same men, motives, and purposes are behind this section to make not only the postmasters but the assistant postmasters part of the political machine of the Congressman. I object to that; and I object to doing it either directly, as was attempted at first, or indirectly, as now attempted. It is of course in line with the conduct of that side of the House throughout this Congress. We saw it in the tariff bill, we saw it in the urgent deficiency bill when they excepted the marshals and revenue collectors, we have seen it just lately, and strikingly, in the Reserve Board. If there was any body of men which ought to be exempted from partisanship, it was the body which was to have control of the financial system of the whole country. And yet when the Reserve Board was created, by the law all their subordinates were made exempt from the civil service in order to give Democrats offices. And when the names of the Reserve Board were sent into the Senate everyone was a member of the party in power. So that even there the partisanship which has characterized this Congress from the beginning until now was evident, and this is but another following step in the consistent purpose of this Congress from the beginning.

I appreciate that opposition from this side of the House can not be effective; and as I see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I am reminded of some kind remarks which he made last winter, showing how ineffective anything we could do is, and that all that is left us is to criticize. Mr. FITZGERALD remarked:

Mr. Chairman, nobody expects the appeals made by Republicans in this House to have any effect on legislation. * * * Their position in this House is not to regulate and control legislation. If they wish to understand what the country meant, it was that they should sit quietly by and learn how a great political party, when it comes into power, can carry out the pledges it makes to the people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did I not say something about the overwhelming defeat the Republicans got which disqualified them in the opinion of the country from control?

Mr. GILLETT. Possibly. I did not quote all you said. I quoted what was sufficient for present purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What the gentleman quoted was very good, but the other part improved it.

Mr. GILLETT. We might differ about that. But, as I say, all that we can do is to sit by and criticize. But when the gentleman talks in that boastful way about the Democratic Party keeping its pledges, it seems to me he must have been facetious there.

One of the pledges of their platform was that they would maintain the civil service, and from the beginning of the following Congress until now step after step have they taken in flagrant violation of that pledge. Of course, that is only one of the numerous pledges they have broken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Not just now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just for a question.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to advise the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. Well, I yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that a provision to the effect that men who have been covered into the classified service by Executive order should be required to take an examination to demonstrate their fitness is a violation of the civil-service law, or the principle of it?

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman had been here when I began to speak he would have known that I covered that. He will be able to read it in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wonder that the gentleman declines to answer that twice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. It has chiefly to do with the matter of railway mail pay. In that regard the proposed bill is a big improvement upon the present law, in that it substitutes a definite businesslike basis of payment for a haphazard and indefinite one.

Regarding the section of the bill that has to do with the appointment of assistant postmasters, it can not be fairly called a blow at the civil service. The civil service primarily implies an examination, and that is all this bill does. It makes assistant postmasters who were covered into the classified service by Executive order take an examination the same as others in the service. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote for a bill that will take all employees out of the civil service whose superior officer is bonded, because I believe the man who gives bond for the faithful performance of duty by a subordinate should have the appointment of that subordinate. As it is now the assistant postmaster in the majority of cases is a political opponent of the postmaster, and may be his personal enemy. No one thinks that is fair in any degree. The proposed law gives the present assistant postmasters a chance to retain their jobs. It is not prejudicial to the civil service, but if it were I would still favor it for the reasons I have stated.

In relation to the railway mail pay, there can be great improvement made; not only in regard to pay made to the railroads for carrying the mail, but in the entire matter of transportation there can be, and I predict there will be, great changes and improvement made. These changes will not only be made in the matter of railway transportation of mail, but the transportation by water. In this connection I desire to submit the views of Mr. James L. Cowles, president of the World Postal League, on the matter of ocean postal transports as most interesting and timely:

Shall the Panama Canal be used for the enrichment of a few private speculators or for the common benefit?

The railways, trolley lines, auto and air lines, steamboat and steamship lines, telegraph and telephone lines of our modern world are its circulating and nervous system.

Upon the construction, maintenance, and operation, and upon the taxes levied for the use of this life-determining mechanism, more than upon anything else, does the general economic, as well as the social and political development of modern humanity depend.

Left in the control of private speculators determining the rates for its use upon the value of the service rendered, it will become a public curse, as was the case with the Cursus Publicus, the transport service of Imperial Rome.

On the other hand, managed by our public servant, with rates for its use determined on the cost of the service rendered, or, it may be, run absolutely free and supported by the taxation of the districts which it serves and to which it gives practically all their commercial value, every step in its improvement will be in line of the common advancement with the result that in the course of time this old warring earth of ours may be reasonably expected to become a bit of heaven—a home in which every human being shall find delight in the service of the other.

Competition between the different parts of this great mechanism is as absurd, as wasteful, and as harmful as competition would be between the arteries, veins, and nerves of the human body.

In recent years Congress, State legislatures, cities, and towns have expended hundreds of millions of dollars of the hard earnings of our common people in railway, trolley, river, and harbor improvements, which, under the control of our great circulating and nervous system by private speculators, have actually resulted in increased rates of transportation, increased cost of living, and lessened opportunities for getting a living.

Notwithstanding the scores of millions of dollars spent for the improvement of navigation upon the Great Lakes, the rail, lake-and-rail rate on flour and mill stuffs—from Minneapolis to New York City—is 3 cents a hundred pounds higher than it was 15 years ago, 23 cents to-day as against 20 in 1899. And the same thing is true as to ocean transportation. The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the Sixty-third Congress inform us that since 1910 the speculators controlling trans-Atlantic trade have increased their rates—in some cases over 100 per cent—this in spite of the fact that during the intervening years the public on both sides of the Atlantic have expended immense sums for their harbor improvements.

Manifestly, the Government must take possession of the transportation and transmission machinery, for the use of which these other expenditures are made, and must extend, develop, and operate the entire business in the common interest.

OCEAN POSTAL TRANSPORTS.

In this connection it is interesting to note that on the 1st of April last—at the instance of Senators WEEK and LODGE, of Massachusetts—the United States Senate passed Senate resolution 317, suggesting the transformation of our warships into postal transports and requesting the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy as to the use of naval cruisers and transports in the inauguration of a line of ships for the carriage of mails, passengers, and merchandise between the United States and South America.

On the 11th of April Secretary Daniels replied that the Navy Department sees in the plan an opportunity at once for developing a large trade with South America, which is not practicable for private vessels under the United States flag, and for the development of an auxiliary fleet which would be necessary in times of war and would pay for itself in times of peace.

And on the 14th of April the department bill—S. 5259—providing for the proposed fleet—17 vessels—and asking for its inauguration and support, only $100,000 in addition to what might accrue from its service was presented to the Senate and referred to the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

We cordially sympathize with every movement looking toward the establishment of a system of American ocean postal transports, like the Panama Canal, our common pride, our common property, run in the common interest of all the world, and manned by officers and seamen well paid, well cared for, our common choice; but we submit that the inauguration of such a service requires something more than a fleet of 7 war cruisers of an average capacity of only 20 male passengers and 150 tons of postal matter, 4 inferior passenger and freight steamers carrying an average of 74 first-class and 32 steerage passengers of both sexes and 11,000 tons of freight, and 6 colliers carrying no passengers and on an average only 6,000 tons of freight.

We have spent $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal. Its devotion to the common use by the United States of America must surely be celebrated by the establishment of an American fleet of ocean postal transports that will make our flag the chief exponent of peace on earth, good will among the nations, a fleet made up of modern ships especially fitted for ocean postal traffic—the transport of persons and of produce; a fleet at once so commanding and run at cost of the service rates so low as to dominate the entire business.

The Sixty-third Congress has appropriated over $15,000,000 to the construction of two battleships. Verily, nothing less will suffice for the purchase or construction of an American ocean postal fleet that will meet the demands of the hour. These other facts are also to be noted:

First. The cost of construction, maintenance, and operation of all public transport agencies is always paid by the public, whether the business be managed by private speculators for the exploitation of the public or by Government for the public service.

Second. The only practical method for securing to the American public their share of the benefits accruing from the expenditure of the hundreds of millions of dollars of their labor invested in the Panama Canal and in the improvement of their ocean harbors, lighthouse services, etc., is through the ownership and operation of a large part, if not of all, the American ships engaged in the coastwise and foreign trade of the United States.

Third. Legislation has been enacted practically forcing the railroads to sell their ocean steamers and denying the use of the Panama Canal to all vessels in which the railroads have an interest; and this being the case, it seems only just that the Government should take over their ocean lines at a fair valuation.

One of the greatest obstacles to the extension of the foreign trade of the world to-day is the enormous and often discriminating taxation levied by private transport speculators upon the world's business.

The private speculators now controlling the world's ocean traffic tax our Government for the transport of our mails across the Atlantic by steamers not under contract—United States register—letters (sealed parcels), 80 cents a pound, $1,600 a ton; on other mail matter (unsealed parcels), 8 cents a pound, $160 a ton. Foreign register: Letters, 35 cents a pound, $700 a ton; other matter, 4½ cents a pound, or $90 a ton. The cost to the steamships is the same in either case.

Under its mail contract, New York to Southampton, $4 a mile, regardless of the mail handled, the International Mercantile Marine Co. levies a tax of over 15 cents a pound, over $300 a ton, on all the mail carried. Similar taxes are levied upon our Government in all our ocean mail traffic, and yet the express companies doing business between New York and London serve their large patrons at less than $20 a ton. With Government-owned ships the business might well be done for less than $10 a ton.

A weekly naval mail line of well-equipped fast steamers, the best of their kind upon the ocean, run by officers and men of the American Navy between New York and San Francisco, at rates determined not on what might be exacted from the public, but on the cost of the service rendered the public, would be an object lesson as to the possibilities of a Government-owned merchant marine that would astound the world. The establishment of similar lines owned and operated by this country and Great Britain or Germany, and other lines jointly owned and operated by this country and the States of South America, would be great steps toward the advancement of the world's peace and the world's prosperity.

The united states of the world, with all legal barriers to intercourse between the different States abolished, and all physical barriers overcome by a world postal service covering the entire business of public transportation and transmission—"the parliament of man, the federation of the world," the dream of the poet Tennyson in 1842, is to-day a near-by reality.

Inaugurated in 1874 by Dr. Stephan's establishment of an international 5-cent half-ounce (soon to be 2 cents an ounce) letter post, it remains for us in 1914 to so extend this great service that within a few brief years the weakest hand, the most timid voice, may reach to the ends of the earth and command its richest treasures.

The advantages to follow the abolition of the legal barriers to intercourse between the nations have been conclusively proved by our own history—the absolute freedom of intercourse between our different States guaranteed by our Federal Constitution having made our prosperity possible.

The benefits that would accrue from a world-wide system of door-to-door, low uniform postal tolls (the ideal condition of things would be a postal service absolutely free and supported by the taxation of the districts which the machinery serves and to which it gives their commercial value) have been clearly demonstrated in our 50-year-old flat-rate letter post, our 29-year-old flat-rate cent-a-pound magazine and newspaper post, and in the flat-rate commodity service of our continental railroad traffic, as also in our flat-rate passenger city trolley service.

In opening the Panama Canal to the outside world on the same terms as to ourselves, we have shown a generous spirit that is to win us friends everywhere.

The enactment into law of Senator WEEKS's bill—S. 5259—so amended as to provide us with an experimental naval mail service, made up of the very best steamers that float the seas, however small the fleet, would mark the end of the old war era and the beginning of the time when the postman is to supersede the warman (the soldier), the postal car the field cannon, the postal transport the man-of-war.

Verily, the opening of the Panama Canal must be accompanied by the establishment of an American naval mail service, worthy of the people that have given this canal to the world.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in the position just taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. The Democratic platform of 1912, speaking of the civil service, says:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party

We can all agree to that, because it is good doctrine. But, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] pointed out, the majority side of this House has been trying constantly to break down the civil service of this country, notwithstanding their professions on this subject. In doing that you on the Democratic side are only sowing dragon's teeth. Men will spring up to plague you. For every office you take out of the classified service you will have a dozen or more applicants. You will not be able to satisfy them all, and you will be hoist by your own petard.

But by legislation of this character you emphasize your insincerity. Take the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore and read the concluding paragraph. It says:

Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

It seems to me that almost every important plank in the Democratic national platform has been destroyed by the majority side of this House. There are a dozen planks at the least that have been violated. The last paragraph, which I have just quoted, means nothing to you on the Democratic side. It was put forth as "molasses—to catch flies."

Mr. COX. It caught them. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Yes; it caught them, but you will never catch them again. The people of the United States realize your insincerity, and you will meet the fate you deserve this coming November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] used only two minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. How much time have I left altogether?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] if he desires to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think not.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, as I understand, the gentleman from Michigan has closed?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the majority side?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-five minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Fifty-five minutes?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That is a mistake, Mr. Chairman. They have not 55 minutes left, have they?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the majority side has 55 minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Let me call the attention of the Chair to the fact that when we began with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES] each side had 55 minutes. Mr. BEAKES had 10 minutes yielded to him from that side, and I yielded him 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not advised as to that.

Mr. FINLEY. I think this side has 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of a great question like this it seems that it is quite impossible to steer clear of politics, notwithstanding the fact that it is a business proposition, pure and simple. The Postal Service of the United States is the greatest single business proposition in all the world, amounting in expenditures for the present year around $311,000,000, and in financial operations from first to last amounting to around $3,000,000,000 annually. So I was tempted to hope that in the discussion of the questions involved in considering the bill we might not have the Democratic Party or the Republican Party bring in the question of partisan politics.

For 12 years I have been a member of this committee and have given to its work the best service that I know how to render, not from a party standpoint alone, but from the standpoint of what is best for all the people of the United States; and the bill before the House can be discussed, and discussed intelligently and profitably, without any mention of partisan politics. But since that has been injected here—and it could not be prevented—I am willing to state that the Republican Party has nothing to charge against the Democratic Party on the question of administering the civil-service law; nothing at all. I repeat that the Republican Party itself is guilty, a hundred times over again, of more violations of the law than the Democratic Party.

I remember when I came here about 16 years ago. We had had a Democratic President in the White House who had gone out two years before that, in 1897, and I wondered how it was, in the administration of the civil-service law, that so few Democrats were found in the departments, and that those that were found there were occupying inferior positions, almost without exception. I was told this: That when the Republican Party came into power in 1897 the word was given, the order went out—not from the President of the United States, but from those great leaders of the Republican Party, the politicians, the bosses of the Republican Party—that no Republican holder of a position or office should take orders or directions in his department from a Democratic superior if it could possibly be avoided. The result was that Democrats who were chiefs of divisions and occupying important positions, in order to remain in the Government service, gave up those positions and took demotions to lower places in the Government service. This is true in hundreds of instances.

So, Mr. Chairman, this went on. The Republican Party, from 1897 to March 4, 1913——

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FINLEY. I will come to you in a minute. I will remember your speech, and then I will yield to you.

Mr. GILLETT. I just wanted to ask you about what you stated. How do you know this alleged fact that you stated?

Mr. FINLEY. Parties told me so; parties who took demotions.

Mr. GILLETT. I want to tell you——

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman can not tell me. He does not know. I do not yield for a statement. The gentleman does not know.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not believe you know.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, you are wrong about that, as you are wrong about this civil-service proposition.

So, Mr. Chairman, the Republican Party continued in power until March 4, 1913, and there have been very few removals since that time. In fact, I am of the opinion that there have not been nearly as many as there should have been. Time after time the Republican Party covered into the civil service, without examination, Government officials, Government employees, until finally, during the latter part of President Taft's administration, when the handwriting was on the wall, and it was understood that the days of the Republican Party were numbered in administration matters, that they were going out, all assistant postmasters were covered into the civil service by a blanket order. Then it was that the fourth-class postmasters were covered in. When the Republican Party had the opportunity for 16 years to give this country an honest and efficient civil-service administration, it absolutely failed to do so, and on the contrary filled practically every place, office, and position with Republicans in every instance where politics could be made a part of the proceedings. I am told, and I believe it to be a fact, that when President Wilson came into office about 17 months ago there were something like 90 per cent of Republican officials holding places throughout the United States in the classified service. Can anybody believe that on any fair division this is the percentage that should prevail as among all the great parties in this country? Nobody believes that statement. It is ridiculous on the face of it. After the Republican Party had the opportunity for years to correctly and properly administer the civil-service law, and after administering it in the interest of the Republican Party, they come now on every occasion, and even to-day, when there is no occasion, and raise the cry that the Democrats are breaking down the civil-service law. The provision that is in this bill here will not affect the civil-service law. The civil-service law, properly administered, should make for efficient service, and no man can stand here or elsewhere and defend that law unless he stands for efficiency. So this provision here simply provides that about 2,500 assistant postmasters who were covered into the civil service without any examination shall stand an examination to show their efficiency; and if they stand an examination, why not have competition?

All of these 2,500 assistant postmasters were covered into the civil service in a single order. It is said that they were competent, that they were trained. Does anyone believe that 2,500 assistant postmasters could be covered in under this blanket order of President Taft and not one of those men be inefficient? I dare say no one will dispute the proposition that a large percentage of them were inefficient. The purpose of the Republican Party, plainly speaking, is to hold the offices and the places, hoping that in this way they may some time in the by and by be aided to gain their old-time place and position in the control of the National Government. I say to them that this is an idle hope. If you will read what Burns wrote, you can truthfully repeat with with him when he says:

I sit and count my sins by chapters.

That is what he said, and that is what the Republican Party are entitled to say. Why, my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] stood here this morning and deliberately told this House that these assistant postmasters were trained men, versed in a great business proposition—the postal system. And while I know his friendship and admiration for the distinguished gentleman who is now Postmaster General, and while he asserted that friendship, yet in speaking of his qualifications he called him a farmer without any particular business training. He said "planter," but there is no difference except in terms between a planter and a farmer. No particular business training! Why, I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts would have this House believe that in order to be qualified to be a great and efficient Postmaster General a man must eat pie for breakfast and baked beans twice a day. [Laughter.] When he speaks of the Postmaster General being a farmer, I want to say to him that in many respects a farmer has more sense then anybody else. He is able to make a living for himself, and not only that, but a living for other people. He makes a living for people like—I will not say like the gentleman from Massachusetts without including myself.

If the gentleman will take the membership of this House and take the great positions in this country, he will find that most of the men who fill them to-day first saw the light of day on a farm. There they learned the practical side of life. There they learned the lessons that have been worth so much to them since, so necessary for them to learn and know in order to make good in the great battle of life. Yes; there is no doubt about A. S. Burleson being a farmer, but he has brains and capacity of a high order, so that he was well chosen by the President of the United States, great President that he is, to be Postmaster General of the United States, and he does not need words of commendation from me or from anyone else, nor to have it stated that he has been a farmer or a planter, because he makes that statement for himself. I have heard him make it dozens and scores of times, and he is proud of it, and I may say that I am proud of the fact also.

Mr. Chairman, this examination will do no more than test the efficiency of the present assistant postmasters who went in without examination and of the applicants who compete with them. It was stated here yesterday, and it is true, that since March 4, 1913, wherever there has been an examination held to fill places like this, and in the civil service generally, there has been real competition, and if a Republican won the examination he was appointed to the place, not only as assistant postmaster but in other departments of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. So, Mr. Chairman, this bill that is before the House is one of the greatest importance and of the greatest moment to the Postal Service of the United States and because of this fact important to the people of the whole United States.

The proper basis for railway mail pay is a question that has disturbed Congress and has disturbed the public mind for decades past.

Before I go into that I will say that many of the older Members here remember the contests that have taken place in the Post Office Committee room of the House and on this floor to regulate this question properly. Now, I take this occasion to say that in 1907 great reforms were instituted, and great economies were brought about by reason of a change of law making for economy in postal matters. At that time the present chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. MOON], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and myself were members of that committee, and I believe we are now the only Members of Congress on this side who were then on the committee. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] were also members of the committee. I want to say that these two gentlemen gave to the people of the United States a service that I do not believe the people of this country will ever adequately appreciate. They joined with the Democrats, and we brought in this reform legislation. We reduced the railway mail pay 5 per cent. We reduced railway post-office car rent largely. We provided for carrying railway mail equipment—that is, empty mail sacks, and so forth—by freight, and other economies were provided in the laws that we passed from time to time. I remember that it was in 1906 when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] delivered on that side of the Chamber a speech with reference to the proper divisor for the ascertainment of the weight of the mail. Subsequently he carried the fight to the Post Office Committee of the House, and a provision was voted into the bill. It went out finally. We could not obtain a rule from the Republicans carrying that proposition.

I suggested then, and I repeat now, that I did not believe legislation was necessary in order to carry out this reform, but the matter had been conducted in a way that was costing the Government the loss of large sums of money—millions of dollars. The mail would be weighed for 105 days, and then the total weights would be divided by 90, and this would give a larger total daily weight of mail than was actually true, so that the railroads were paid a much larger sum because paid on a larger basis than they would be paid on had the total weights been divided by 105, the number of days the mails were weighed, and as has been stated, this weighing occurs once in four years in each of the four weighing divisions. So that these economies all told amounted to more than six and a half million dollars a year, and but for these economies the people of the United States to-day would be paying these increased amounts, and they have not paid them, and they are not paying them, and it is because of that legislation, and because the President of the United States, I believe President Roosevelt, through his Postmaster General, issued an executive order requiring that the divisor for the weighing of mails should be the total number of days the mails were weighed for, and of course this divisor was made 105. The railroads did not accept this proposition. They carried the matter into the courts. Recently the case has been won by the Government, $31,000,000 being involved. The case was finally conducted by the now Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Joseph Stewart, and he won out, with $31,000,000 involved. The case, I believe, is on the way now to the Supreme Court of the United States, so that I repeat these economies have saved to the people of the United States more than $50,000,000 since 1907, when this legislation was enacted. In the bill under consideration we propose further reforms and additional economies. We do not propose to make these reforms and institute these economies at the expense of the railroads at all. In other words, we will obtain an efficient mail service, and the people will obtain in this way what they are entitled to obtain, and the railroads will be paid exactly for the work they do, and in my remarks in the RECORD I hope to make that plain.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. KINDEL. I would like to inquire if the gentleman thinks the present express rates paid to the railroads for hauling their merchandise is a reasonable rate?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not.

Mr. KINDEL. In what way, is it too high or too low?

Mr. FINLEY. I think generally the express rates are too high, and I further state that I think that every express company in this country ought to be abolished and go out of business.

Mr. KINDEL. Does the gentleman think the railroads ought to do the business of the Government at a similar rate?

Mr. FINLEY. No. I think the railroads ought to do the parcels business for the Government at the rates provided in this bill, and in addition to that, and outside of that, I think the railroads should haul the freight of the country and haul it under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the various railroad commissions in the various States, and under the regulations provided by them.

Mr. KINDEL. I would ask the gentleman how the people are expected to patronize the parcel post if, for instance, under the present law, on a hundred-pound parcel from New York to Denver, the price should be $10.01, while the express rate would be $5.70.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is speaking about the present law. Under the law the Postmaster General has the right to change the rates, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There has been no trouble along those lines. In other words, the rates now provided by law are not ironclad and are not so fixed as to make them inflexible. In other words, the Postmaster General, when he ascertains that rates can be lowered, has the authority to do that subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I have stated.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the gentleman intends to lower the rates so as to make the parcel post an efficient agency for the public.

Mr. FINLEY. My belief is that the passage of this bill will result in, and properly and necessarily result in, the Government being able to carry larger amounts of weights in railway mail cars, in apartment cars, and so on, and that this bill is an absolute necessity if the life of the parcel post is to continue.

Mr. KINDEL. The rate on that hundred pounds to the post office is $10.01, and the postmaster claims that he is paying $9.03 to the railroad for haulage. What, in the gentleman's opinion, approximately would be the rate under this new law?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman is speaking for the present law.

Mr. KINDEL. That is what I want to find out. I want to vote with the gentleman, but I want to know what advantage there will be, if there is to be any advantage.

Mr. FINLEY. The advantage is this: You take the average 40-foot car to-day—railway mail car or railway post-office car. It carries only a little over 2,000 pounds in weight. The 50-foot car, I think, will carry about 3,000 pounds, and the car over 50 feet in length carries on an average about 5,600 pounds, so that these weights will be increased, and necessarily so because of the parcel post and because only space will be paid for and weight will not.

Mr. KINDEL. The gentleman is agreed to this proposition, that the Post Office ought to have rates competitive with the express companies or go out of that business?

Mr. FINLEY. I agree to this, that the Post Office Department ought to carry parcels at a reasonable rate, a rate that is commensurate with the cost of the service, and that is fair to the public, and that the express companies should go out of business.

Mr. KINDEL. I am agreed to that. But the gentleman does not believe that the Government ought to do business, for which they charge from 100 to 200 per cent higher than the express companies, on the same train, on the same goods?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, the gentleman knows as well as I know that what will be a proper rate will be worked out after the passage of this bill, in the event it becomes the law; but this bill, in my opinion, will enable the Government to give vastly lower rates for carrying parcels than the Government can give at the present time. And for this reason: It costs the Government under the present law an average of 3 cents a pound to carry all the mails. In other words, the Government pays the railroads about 3 cents a pound under the present law, and we want to get away from that, which is the necessity for this bill, 17042, changing the basis of pay to the railroads for carrying the mails from weight to space.

Mr. KINDEL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have we remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes, the Chair understands.

Mr. MOON. I will yield nine minutes of that time to the gentleman.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the remainder of the time on this side, and the gentleman from Michigan yields me 10 minutes. Is that all the time the gentleman has?

Mr. MOON. It was the understanding with the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman's speech would close general debate, because we are entitled to close debate, so I take it at the end of that time this debate will close.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. We are through.

Mr. FINLEY. The point is this, which the chairman of the committee has made, and that is that we are entitled to close debate on this side.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Certainly; I understood the chairman to say the gentleman is entitled to proceed for 9 minutes, and I have yielded the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman yields me 10 minutes, and that will close the debate, with the 9 minutes yielded by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Under that arrangement, the gentleman will proceed for 19 minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. And that will end general debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. It will not end general debate if the gentleman from Michigan has more time and desires to yield it.

Mr. FINLEY. We should settle that matter.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. We do not desire any more time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the understanding is the gentleman from Michigan has exhausted his time?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I said to the chairman of the committee we do not desire to use any more time on this side.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the question of properly fixing railway mail pay is one that has agitated Congress periodically for more than 40 years. I believe the first act by Congress providing for carrying mail on railroads was passed in 1873. From 1873 down to the present time the question as to what should be the amount of pay received by the railroads from the Government for performing this service has been a matter of contention between the Government and the railroads. The railroads, or at least the majority of them, have always contended that the rate fixed by Congress was too low, and whenever Congress has undertaken to deal with the question it has met with the most strenuous opposition from the railroads, their agents, and in many cases their attorneys, as well as from the express companies. This branch of the Postal Service is one of growth and development. Prior to 1873 the law on the subject was meager; but it is true that the service performed at that time was far different in character and in quantity from the service performed to-day. In 1873 a large part of the Postal Service in the matter of transporting mails was done by star routes. Often these routes were hundreds of miles long, calculating from one railroad to another. The amount of mail carried six days in the week on railroad trains was far in excess of the amount carried on railroads performing like service seven days in the week. At this time the exact opposite of this is true. A comparatively small amount of the mail is carried on railroad trains six days in the week; the great bulk of the mail is carried seven days in the week. In 1907 quite a number of amendments were made to the law, and provision made for greatly reforming the service along economic lines. Provision was made for reducing the compensation on mails carried in full railway or railway post-office cars and 5 per cent on land-grant railroads, where the railroad's pay was only 80 per cent of full pay. A like reduction was made in the act of May 12, 1910. I will include the statutes governing railway mail pay and railway post-office car pay or rent in my remarks. Since 1873 the basis of railway mail pay has been on weight of the mails carried by the railroads. On account of the increased weight of mails, and particularly the second-class mail, including papers, periodicals, and journals, the establishment of the Parcel Post System, and the continued growth of this system it has been found that the present law regulating railway mail pay has outlived its usefulness, and there is no longer reason or necessity for continuing to pay the railroads on the basis of weight. From statistics gathered covering the operation of railroads in the matter of freight, passenger, and express service, as well as the mail service, it has been demonstrated that a change is necessary in fixing the basis of pay to railroads from a weight to a space basis, and the bill now under consideration will effect this change.

By way of digression I will add that some 14 or 15 years ago I heard the then chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee in the House state in a speech that the only scientific basis of railway mail pay, in his opinion, was one fixed on space occupied, rather than on weight of the mail. While I have not looked the matter up since, this is my recollection of the statement of the Hon. Eugene F. Loud. A number of postal commissions and joint committees have been appointed by Congress to investigate this question and report their conclusions to Congress. The Walcott commission, one of the first, which made its report many years ago, reported that the railroads were not overpaid. Since then other commissions and committees have been appointed, and the results of their labors have amounted to very little in the way of legislation. We have at the present time a joint committee constituted nearly two years ago to investigate and report on the question of railway mail pay. The life of this joint committee would have ended the 30th day of June, but was continued to December 1, 1914. Why this committee has not reported is well known.

Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to advocate a vote for the passage of any bill that will reduce railway mail pay below what I believe to be proper compensation for the services performed by the railroads. It has never been my view that demagogy should have a place in legislation by the Congress, so that what I shall say is an expression of my views based upon ascertained facts and proper consideration of the questions involved, requiring a discussion that may be tiresome to some because of the necessity for stating tedious details in connection with the present plan of pay for transporting mail by railroads.

The following table is an estimate by the Third Assistant Postmaster General made for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, and printed in his annual report for that year. This table is intended to bring down to that date by way of estimate of the total number of pieces and weight of domestic mail (not including foreign mail) made for the fiscal year of 1911 and 1912. These estimates have for their basis the weighing of the mail in 1907 and, of course, include the growth and extension of the Postal Service during the years 1908, 1909, and 1910 and the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1911, and ending June 30, 1912. The table is as follows:

Estimated total number of pieces of the various classes of domestic matter mailed, their weight, and the postage derived therefrom, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912.

Class of mail.	Number of pieces.	Average weight per piece in ounces.	Average number of pieces per pound.	Aggregate weight in pounds.	Per cent of entire domestic revenue-producing mail carried.	Postage received from domestic mail.	Per cent of entire postage derived from domestic mail.
Letters and other first-class matter including post and postal cards	9,159,648,117	0.35	45.10	203,115,365	13.14	$168,636,706.59	74.86
Newspapers, magazines, and other second-class matter	4,934,002,770	3.35	4.77	1,035,033,555	66.96	11,556,322.53	5.13
Catalogues, circulars, books, and other third-class matter	2,219,355,307	1.67	9.58	231,734,225	14.99	32,551,434.81	14.45
Merchandise and other fourth-class matter	239,982,313	5.06	3.16	75,943,770	4.91	12,524,981.15	5.56
Congressional franked and official penalty (free) matter	310,437,878	3.16	5.05	61,415,335	.....	.....	.....
Total	16,863,426,385	1.52	10.53	1,607,242,250	100.00	225,269,445.08	100.00

It is perhaps not out of place to follow this table with the following one relative to railway post-office cars, storage cars, and apartment cars. These are the latest statistics available. I may say, however, that it is probably true that the average weight per car at present is somewhat higher than this. The percentage of increase in weight, in my opinion, is small, and it should be borne in mind that for all car space exceeding 30-foot cars rent is paid in addition. The table is as follows:

Class of cars and average load.

	Pounds.
Railway post-office cars:
40-foot	2,028
50-foot	3,126
60-foot	5,668
Storage cars:
40-foot	14,910
50-foot	12,589
60-foot	14,516
Apartment cars:
15-foot	332
20-foot	522
25-foot	764
30-foot	1,474

It is interesting to note that on letters and other first-class mail matter the aggregate weight in pounds reduced to a per cent is only 13.14 per cent. The revenue produced is $160,636,706.19. The weight of newspapers, magazines, and other second-class matter is 1,035,033,555 pounds, and is a little more than two-thirds of the weight of all domestic mail, or 66.96 per cent. The postage or revenue received from second-class mail matter was only $11,556,322.53, or only a little more than 5 per cent of the entire revenue. On third-class mail matter, weight 231,734,255 pounds, or an average per cent of 14.99, the postage received by the Government was $32,551,434.81, or 14.45 per cent of the entire postage received by the Government from domestic mail. Merchandise and other fourth-class matter, weighing 75,943,770 pounds, o. a percentage of all domestic mail of 4.91 per cent, yielded revenue of $12,542,981.15, or 5.56 per cent of the entire revenue from all domestic mail. Congressional, franked and official mail, and penalty matter amounted to 61,415,335 pounds.

The cost to the Government for transporting or carrying this mail over the railroads is about 3 cents per pound. At the present time second-class mail, including newspapers, magazines, and so forth, and all congressional and official matter going through the mail free, costs the Government a little more than $70,000,000 annually—more than is received by the Government in the way of postage or revenue from these two items of mail. If second-class mail should be made to pay the cost and franked, or free mail, be held down to a reasonable basis, and the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government be required to use stamps or pay into the Post Office Department a sum of money equal to the cost of the service rendered by the Post Office Department to the various branches of the Government, I am of the opinion that inside of two years 1-cent postage could be given to the people of the United States on all first-class letter mail.

Recurring again to the question of the various commissions and joint committees being appointed by Congress, a great deal of the time has been taken up by some of the great railroads of the country and by the express companies in fighting all proposed changes in the law other than by amending the law, so as to give the railroads more pay for the same service and to keep the express companies secure in the monopoly which they for so long a time had and which they greatly abused by charging more for carrying parcels than the service was worth. I may add, however, that the express companies were not alone interested in this fight. They were aided to some extent by the influence of certain individuals who were greatly interested in the express business and at the same time were largely interested in railroad affairs. Time after time an effort has been made in the past by these people to bring Congress to see that the newspapers and magazines of the country were being subsidized by the Government by being given the privileges of mail at 1 cent per pound, when the cost of this service to the Government was nearly 7 cents per pound; the newspapers and magazines of the country were termed "grafters" from the Public Treasury and accused of being subsidized by the Government to the extent of the difference between 1 cent per pound, which they paid to the Post Office Department, and the cost of the service to the department, of nearly 7 cents per pound. This charge that the newspapers and magazines are subsidized, strictly speaking, is not true; but, on the contrary, it is a privilege granted by the Government to the newspapers and magazines to send their publications through the mails at about one-seventh of what it costs the Government to perform this service.

A subsidy is where money is paid out of the Treasury to some one who has not earned the sum paid out, or at least has not earned all of the money paid out. The privilege in this instance is where the Government performs a service for less than the cost or where the services of the Government are free. In addition to the newspapers and magazines, the express companies and many of the railroad advocates have time and again charged that each and every branch of the Government service is a subsidy, which does not pay its way, particularly the Rural Delivery Service, which has grown up in 16 years to more than 43,000 rural routes, and from a cost of about $150,000 annually to a cost to the Government of more than $53,000,000 annually, bringing in a direct revenue of only about $15,000,000. I deny that this service is a subsidy. It is a benefit of inestimable value, growing out of privileges granted by the Government to people living in rural communities. The same charge is made by some few people in reference to the Government improving its rivers and harbors and digging canals in hundreds of instances, as it has done, giving to all people in this country free use of the improved rivers, harbors, and canals. This improvement of rivers, harbors, and digging of canals has cost the Government nearly $700,000,000, and in addition to this about $400,000,000 for digging the Panama Canal. This is a privilege and not a subsidy, and I repeat my statement that the newspapers and magazines are given a privilege and not a subsidy, and the same is true of the Rural Delivery Service. In the case of newspapers and magazines the cost to the Government is about $70,000,000 per year. In the case of the Rural Delivery Service the amount paid out by the Government is about $73,000,000 annually. In the matter of rivers, harbors, and canals constructed by the Government the privilege of use free by the public, without taking into account the original cost of building and improving, probably exceeds $50,000,000 annually. No correct estimate can be made. All of these are privileges intended to be granted so far as to promote the general welfare of the whole country. The Hughes Commission, appointed to investigate second-class matter—that is, newspapers or magazines—reported a compromise to the effect that the postage should be doubled or raised to 2 cents per pound. Congress has not seen fit to do this, and in all probability never will. It has been correctly held that newspapers and magazines generally are the guardians of the liberties and rights of the people.

I believe firmly in this doctrine, notwithstanding the fact that many of the newspapers and magazines are both venal and corrupt and absolutely unreliable. I supported in committee and voted in the House of Representatives for the law requiring the publication by certain newspapers of their stock owners and bondholders and other regulations intended to keep the public informed with reference to these matters. [Applause.] The law is an admirable one, and should be enforced to the letter.

PRESENT PLAN FOR RAILROAD MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Coming now to the present law governing the carriage of railway mail, under the act of March 3, 1873, the payment for the transportation of mails on railroads is based on the average daily weight carried over each road on a designated mail route. The statute provides for the rates at which such daily weight are paid, and also provides that the mails on each route should be weighed not less than once in every four years in order to determine the average daily weight. The railroads are required to furnish what are known as full cars and apartment cars. If less than 40 feet in the car are necessary for distributing the mail on route, the railroad furnishes a car or a baggage car with a certain part set aside for the distribution of the mails. This is known as an apartment car, and if the needs of the service do not require more than 30 feet of space in the car for the distribution of the mail, such cars are furnished by the railroad without additional pay from the Government. If more space than this is required, the railroads are paid for full cars, 40 feet or more in length, which, under the act of March 3, 1873, are paid for by the Government in addition to the compensation paid for the weight of the mails carried in the car. In the statute of March 3, 1873, a reduction was made in the rates of payment for full cars. The following are the statutes controlling railway mail pay under the present system:

SEC. 1317. The Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation * * * to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned:

First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for * * * (railway postal clerks) to accompany and distribute the mails.

Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200, and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds, the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 30, at such times, after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct.

2. The Postmaster General * * * is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 10 per cent per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873 (R. S., sec. 4002), for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight.

3. The Postmaster General * * * is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1878, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876.

4. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mail on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds; and on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds up to 48,000 pounds, and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds at the rate of $19.24 upon all roads other than land-grant roads, and upon all land grant roads the rate shall be $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of said 48,000 pounds.

5. The provision of the act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., 1212), * * * fixing the compensation to be paid for transportation of mail on land-grant railroads at the rate of $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds is hereby amended to make such rate of compensation after June 30, 1910, $15.39 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation in accordance with this amendment.

* * * * * * *

8. That hereafter before making the readjustment of pay for transportation of mails on railroad routes, the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days not less than 90, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct.

SEC. 1318. All railway companies to which the United States have furnished aid, by grant of lands, right of way, or otherwise, shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and, until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 1319. Railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation authorized by this act. (See par. 5, sec 1317.)

The maximum compensation for general railroad mail service and for service over land-grant railroads is shown in the following table:

SEC. 1329. Additional pay may be allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars, at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length and $30 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars and $40 per mile per annum for 50-foot cars; and $50 per mile per annum for 55 to 60 foot cars.

2. After July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars and $32.50 per mile per annum for 50-foot cars and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length.

NOTE.—This statute does not authorize a pro rata compensation to be paid for cars which are less than 40 feet in length.

SEC. 1330. All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, and lighted by and at the expense of the railroad companies.

NOTE.—This statute supplements Revised Statutes, section 4005. Section 1333 prescribes different articles that shall be included in the equipment of a car.

SEC. 1331. After the 1st of July, 1911, no pay shall be allowed for the use of any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars or between the engine and a steel car adjoining, and that hereafter additional cars accepted for this service shall be of steel, or with steel underframe, if used in a train in which a majority of the cars are of like construction: Provided further, That after the 1st of July, 1916, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or with steel underframe, if such post-office car is used in a train in which a majority of the cars are of steel or of steel underframe construction.

SEC. 1332. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the railway post-office cars of a railroad company not conforming to the provisions of this act shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies after the passage of this act shall be constructed of steel.

2. No part of this amount shall be paid for the use of any car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned.

NOTE.—The word "amount" in paragraph 2 refers to the appropriation for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. Similar provisions were contained in the appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1912 and 1913.

SEC. 1333. * * * When any railroad company fail or refuse to provide railway post-office cars when required by the Post Office Department, or shall fail or refuse to provide suitable safety heaters and safety lamps therefor, with such number of saws and axes to each car for use in case of accident as may be required by the Post Office Department, said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent on the rates fixed (by law). * * * (See sec. 1317.)

NOTE.—Revised Statutes, section 4003, provides that "in case any railroad company now furnishing railway post-office cars shall refuse to provide such cars, such company shall not be entitled to any increase of compensation under the provisions of the next section" (sec. 1329). The section was only applicable to conditions at the time of its enactment, and the additional compensation referred to is only to be allowed for lines comprising railway post-office cars. The above statute imposes a direct penalty on a company for failure to provide railway post-office cars in the shape of a reduction of its pay. The omitted part merely recites Revised Statutes, section 4002, as amended by the acts of June 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878. (See sec. 1317.)

THE PROPOSED PLAN.

Under the bill before the House it is proposed to place all mail service, excepting closed-pouch service, upon a space basis instead of the weight basis on which all authorizations are made at present. The change from a weight to a space basis will not greatly affect the conduct of the service. Under the new plan space will be authorized in much the same manner as it is now. The chief difference will be that all authorization will then be for specific space at specific rates to be designated in the statute. As a matter of fact, at the present time over 46 per cent of the service is already on a space basis as regards specific authorization by the department. In apartment-car service the space needed is furnished in accordance with the authorization of the department; hence the mail carried in apartment cars is practically on a space basis. The mail carried on a full railway post-office car is also practically on a space basis, and, together with the mail carried in an apartment-car service, represents at least 85 per cent of the entire Railway Mail Service. This service, excepting the amount given for the furnishing of full cars by the railroad, is practically on a space basis and yet is paid for at present on the basis of weight. The only part of the service to be left on a weight basis under the proposed plan is the closed-pouch service. Space could not well be allotted for the carriage of closed pouches, since the amount and volume of that service vary greatly on different trains and on different roads. It is therefore more practicable to leave the closed-pouch service on the weight basis, but the rest of the service can and should be put on a space basis.

The proposed plan would do much to equalize conditions among various railroads. The big lines carrying large amounts of storage mail are the ones that are well or over paid. The pay they receive per carload lot for storage mails, when based upon a weight compensation, is very large. On other lines, where the service required is frequent, but where the weight of the mails is not great enough to necessitate the operation of full railway post-office cars, for which additional pay is given, the compensation is less per unit of service than is the case with the larger lines. As a matter of fact, practically all of the railroads that are overpaid are lines running between large cities in the East and large cities in the West. This bill will do away with such inequality of conditions.

Now, as to the proposed plan, the way in which it arose was as follows: In compliance with the statute of 1879 the department instituted an inquiry to ascertain the cost to the railroads of carrying the mails. Having ascertained the cost, the department recommended a plan for readjusting pay, and it was suggested that the railroads were to be paid the cost, which was to be ascertained annually, plus a percentage of increase. Upon an examination of this plan by the joint commission it was decided that not only would the annual ascertainment of cost be expensive, but it would be difficult, because of disagreements sure to arise between the department and the railroads. After the cost was ascertained to be less than the revenue per car mile for passenger service, and it being found also that such average revenue was subject to the regulation of the statutes, as well as more or less under the supervision of Federal and State authorities, it was determined that this might be taken as the basis in fixing the pay per car mile in the Railway Mail Service.

This average car-mile revenue for passenger-train service is found to be 24.92 cents for the year ended June 30, 1912. The department's estimate of the cost of mail service under House bill 17042 at the several unit rates as last amended aggregated $60,242,776 for the total line cost, including terminal pay and closed-pouch service. This amount, divided by the estimated car miles of mail service, gives 22.96 cents per car mile, or less than the passenger-car mile rate for the year 1912, a reduction of only 7.86 per cent from the passenger rate, instead of 10 per cent, as stated by the Interstate Commerce Commissioners' associate statistician to be allowable for the respective difference in the cost of mail and passenger traffic.

The proposed bill has been framed upon the basis of the average revenue per passenger-car mile, with a suitable reduction to express the difference between the passenger and the mail service.

The bill, in addition to certain line rates for car service, allows a terminal charge for the loading, switching, and cleaning of the cars at each end of the run. The rates under the proposed bill are liberal and in every way fair to the railroads. I would not advocate anything that was not entirely fair. The bill provides for the payment of practically the present rate for the closed-pouch service and for line rates on a basis of space furnished, for railway post-office apartment and storage cars, likewise for terminal charges for the same, based upon cost of loading the mails into the cars at terminal, and of switching, lighting, heating, and cleaning the cars. The line rates as amended are:

Twenty-one cents a car mile for a 60-foot railway post-office car.
Ten and one-half cents a car mile for a 30-foot apartment car.
Five and one-half cents a car mile for a 15-foot apartment car.
Twenty cents a car mile for a 60-foot storage car.

The terminal charges are $2 for an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car and a pro rata for apartment car. The same rate is provided for storage cars. This makes a rate of $8 for a 60-foot railway post-office or storage car for the round trip, $4 for a 30-foot apartment car for the round trip, and $2 for a 15-foot apartment car for the round trip.

The union of these two rates produces a rate of 22.63 cents for a car mile for a 60-foot car, or its equivalent in car space. This is for the car service alone and is the average for both the railway post-office working car, including apartment car and the storage car, but there should be added to this the amount received for closed-pouch service, which will be adjusted upon the basis of weights. When this is added and proper allowance made for the space which will be occupied in carrying the closed pouches, the total average rate is raised to 22.96 cents for each car mile for a 60-foot car or its equivalent. (Figures submitted in the hearings before the joint committee.)

This is liberal pay for the railroads and is above the actual expenses incurred by the railroads in carrying the mails. Indeed these rates not only cover all operating expenses, but supply a large surplus for the companies to apply to the payment of interest on bonded debts, dividends, and all other expenses usually charged against operation revenues. It is open to very serious doubt whether the United States Government should pay the railroad companies sufficient above the actual expenses to pay interest on the bonded debts, which represent properties in which the mail service has no interest.

The average revenue for a passenger-car mile, from figures furnished by certain railroads for 1911, was found by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be 25.4 cents. Reducing this 10 per cent, to represent the difference between the passenger service and the mail service, leaves 22.86 cents as a revenue per car mile for the mail service. The present bill provides one-tenth of a cent more, or 22.96 cents, per car mile, though from hearings before the joint commission the associate statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission stated that 22½ cents would be a fair average rate for the mail service.

According to computations of the Post Office Department the amended rates provided by the bill, adding 4 per cent for growth, produce a total of $62,218,566 for the Railway Mail Service for the year 1915, or over $600,000 more than the appropriation for transportation and cars in that service made by Congress for that fiscal year. The Post Office officials state that, with economies, they may be able to make the appropriation cover all expenditures.

The Second Assistant Postmaster General, in his briefs submitted to the joint commission, showed that for the fiscal year 1910 the apportioned cost was over $1,600,000 less than the pay received by the railroads for performing the service; nor did this take into account the credit of $900,000 to which the department was entitled on account of land-grant deductions. It being clearly shown that the railroads were liberally paid under the present system on the basis of weights, it can not be contended that the provisions of the present bill, which upon the submitted estimates will cost the Government comparatively more, do not provide liberal rates for the services performed by the railroads. Under the department's apportionment of cost of operating expenses and taxes to the mail service these items amounted to 18.49 cents a car mile for a 60-foot car or its equivalent. The rate, therefore, of 22.96 cents under the proposed bill leaves a surplus of 4.47 cents a car mile, or over 24 per cent of the operating expenses and taxes. This will provide for the railroads over $49,000,000 for actual and apportioned operating expenses and taxes and nearly $12,000,000 surplus to be applied by the railroads to other charges against income, including interest on bonded debt and dividend on stocks. In view of such facts it can not be contended that the railroads are not receiving liberal payment.

A comparison might be made of the charges made by the railroads for carrying the mail and for carrying express matter. The Government and the express companies both accept merchandise for transportation, and on the basis of a 100-pound package and a 40-pound package a comparison was made between express and mail rates between specific points. In almost all cases the railroad receives a greater revenue for transportation from the mail service than from the express companies. Under a comparison made of the revenues to railroads from express service and mail service as a whole, if the railroads had been paid for mail service in 1913 at rates allowed the express companies, they would have received $49,389,607 instead of $51,566,030. If the calculation had been made on the basis of express rates after the changes made by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the $49,389,607 given above would have been reduced to $41,487,270.

The position of the express companies as to the present bill may be summed up in a few words. The parcel post and the change in the present law from weight to space, as will be accomplished by the bill under consideration, will absolutely put the express companies out of business. One of the express companies has already gone out of business. For the purpose of illustrating this line of thought, take the average load or weight of mail carried in railway post-office cars. In a 40-foot car about 20 mail sacks are carried, averaging each about 100 pounds in weight; in a 50-foot car, a little over 51 sacks, averaging each 100 pounds; in a 60-foot car, about 56 mail sacks of 100 pounds each to the car. Now, it may be argued that these weights would not give any large returns to the railroads, but the Government pays the railroads on a weight basis for the transportation of mail on railroad routes, and the number of cars employed may be few or many. Where the number of cars is few, the amount of rent for railway post-office cars is kept down; where many railroad cars are used over the same line in carrying mail, then, of course, this rental for cars is increased greatly. The average rental is so much per car, or a little over $4,000 per car, as I recall, and the same is true of storage cars. The average load of 40-foot cars is estimated to be 14,912 pounds; the average load for 50-foot cars is 12,589 pounds; and for 60-foot cars is 14,516 pounds. Speculation follows as to the reason why the average load for 50 and 60 foot cars is less than the average load for 40-foot cars; also why it is that for storage cars, where no mail is handled, the average load is less than 7½ tons per car. This, taken into consideration with the fact that the average load for through freight cars is generally more than two, three, or four times this weight, makes the railroads see that by a change from weight of mail carried to space occupied by the Post Office Department in carrying the mail the Government will effect great savings by increasing the weight of mail in railway post-office cars and storage cars. To pay more than $4,000 rent for each railway post-office car, as the Government is doing now, and then to carry an average load of railway mail of from 2,000 to 5,000 pounds in a car, is not economy. Should the railroads carry no more freight in the average car than is now carried in railway post-office cars and storage cars, every railroad in this country would be in the hands of a receiver inside of six months. These are some of the reasons for the necessity for passing the bill now under consideration.

I will, however, later on go more into detail as to the necessity for the legislation and reasons why some of the railroads and express companies fight the bill now before the House. I may add, however, in passing, that the proposed change will give to the short line and apartment car line railroads a considerable increase for carrying mails. At this time the pay for this service is insufficient.

As regards the carriage of parcels under the parcel-post law, I think it will be conceded by all that a parcel of merchandise going through the mail will cost less on a space basis than on a weight basis. It is estimated that approximately 500,000,000 parcels were handled during the calendar year 1913, on which the postage amounted to approximately $40,000,000. This estimate is based on statistics compiled on two counts—one in April and the other in October, 1913. The number of parcels will increase during the present fiscal year, because the limit of weight per parcel has been enlarged. The number of parcels handled during the present fiscal year should increase from 500,000,000 to 700,000,000, and the average postage on a single parcel should increase from 8 to 9 cents. This will give an approximate revenue of $63,000,000.

On pages 20 to 21 there are three provisions in the bill of great importance.

First. The Postmaster General is authorized to request information of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received from express companies for transporting express matter, and to arrange for transportation of mail matter, other than of the first class, at rates not exceeding those allowed the express companies.

Second. He is given discretion to ask that the Interstate Commerce Commission determine what is a postal carload, or less than carload, rate of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and to provide for transportation at such rates when practicable. He will thus be enabled to arrange for transportation at low rates for parcel-post matter and periodicals whenever it may be practicable.

Third. He is authorized to provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and of periodicals when he may secure lower rates for transportation without material detriment to the service. The department will be enabled to arrange its shipments of the less important classes of mail so as to make less frequent shipments between large centers, and thus to effect great economies.

It will do this by making such shipments only once or twice a day, which can be arranged by allowing mail of the classes mentioned to be held at points of origin or consolidation until a full carload has been accumulated. Similarly the department now transports carload lots of periodical matter published semimonthly or less frequently, and which do not contain news matter, between large centers of distribution. As the periodicals advance their date of delivery sufficiently to overcome the difference in time in transit between fast freight and mail trains, there is no detriment to the service, and by this economy the department under existing law now saves over $1,500,000 a year in the cost of railroad transportation. This system will be continued and extended under the present bill.

Another opportunity for economy provided by this bill is the authority given the Post Office Department to consolidate through mails between large centers into compact carload shipments. The competition between parallel lines will make it possible to secure lower rates for the transportation of such carload lots, whereas this is impossible under the present system of shipping in small lots by different lines. The plan allowing mail to be transferred from a train or route on which the space authorized is filled to capacity to another train or route where authorized space is available will make it possible to use all authorized space between two points before authorizing additional space.

Another economy will be the carriage of postal supplies and empty equipment such as mail sacks in the empty return space paid for in postal and storage cars. The greater movement of mail matter and the movement of empty equipment are generally in opposite directions. The space needed for mail matter is consequently less in the direction in which the empty equipment is going; hence the equipment can be transported in this empty space. At present the empty equipment is carried by freight at a cost of nearly $500,000, all of which it is believed can be saved under the new plan.

THE RAILROADS' OBJECTIONS.

As regards the objections by the railroads and express company interests to the proposed plan, the reasons assigned by them, strange as it may seem, are principally such as would have been expected of the Post Office Department. In other words, the railroads would make it appear that the responsibility has devolved on them to protect the interests of the Post Office Department. As a matter of fact, the railroads are simply opposed to all change in the organization of the mail service which does not result in giving them more money for the services they are now performing and thus continuing the express company monopoly. In the very beginning of the hearings before the joint commission the railroads submitted a plan to give themselves more pay. The railroads have consistently supported this proposition, and they have refused to lend any assistance toward the establishment of any other plan. They rendered little or no aid to the joint committee in their inquiry. Rather they were in such a spirit of criticism and opposition to all constructive legislation as to excite comment during the hearings of the joint committee.

They were open to conviction only in so far as a plan proposed coincided with their fixed convictions of what should be done. They have tried in every way to throw difficulties in the way of the Post Office Department and the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and to discredit what work the department and the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have done in preparing the present bill.

The error of the railroad committee in fixing 34.42 per cent as a proper proportion of the operating expenses and taxes charged to the passenger service instead of 29.21 per cent has been shown by the Post Office Department. (Hearings, p. 1258.) The application of this per cent of 34.42 is notoriously incorrect, as appears by the table of railway statistics for 1910, as shown on page 1259 of the hearings. The theory of the railroads, when summed up, amounts to the ridiculous statement that during the year 1910 mail-carrying railroads operated their passenger services at a loss of $104,158,513, while the freight services of these railroads provided a surplus of more than $272,195,661. Yet notwithstanding this, we have the railroads at present clamoring with the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase of freight rates on the ground that these rates are altogether too low. The contention of the railroads before the Joint Committee on Railway Mail Pay is that passenger service results in a loss to the companies of more than $104,000,000 annually and the freight service for 1910 and 1911 to a surplus or net income of more than $272,000,000 annually, and still the railroads are contending with the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase in freight rates and without any strong contention that passenger rates are too low and should be increased. It seems that for the purpose of the hearing and argument before the Joint Committee on Railway Mail Pay the railroads are satisfied with the freight rates and are altogether dissatisfied with the passenger and railway mail pay rates, whereas before the Interstate Commerce Commission the contention of railroads is generally the reverse.

The railroads should agree with themselves before they carry their contentions elsewhere. The railroad estimates are based upon the proposition that they did not receive 6 per cent net on the reported valuation of railroad property. The value of railroad property, as claimed by the railroads before the Joint Commission on Railway Mail Pay and the Interstate Commerce Commission, is over $14,000,000,000. When it is taken into consideration that this report as to value is made by themselves, and that it is not the same valuation as reported by them to the various State and county officials for purposes of taxation, and, in addition to this, that it includes a great deal of water injected into the valuation of railroads by the manipulation of those who in the past have had the control and management of the property—it can be easily ascertained why it is that this claim of the railroads is, generally speaking, unreasonable.

Mr. Howard Elliott, in his work on Truth About Railroads, states that the charges in the rates of interest to American railroads are not yet 4½ per cent in each case. Now, if this be true, and no one disputes the proposition, by what rule, founded in either law or equity, are railroads entitled to claim a higher rate of pay for carrying mails than for receiving pay from the public for the performance of like service in other lines of transportation? The Interstate Commerce Commission, under a resolution by Congress, is now and for some time past has been engaged in making a physical valuation of railroads. This work is not yet completed, and until it is completed we will have no real scientific basis on which to base the claim that a certain fixed per cent, based on valuation of railroads or upon return of income by railroads, is unquestionably the correct per cent. I apprehend that when railroad property is valued from the standpoint provided in the resolution mentioned a great deal of the value now claimed by the railroads for the purpose of fighting this proposed legislation will be found to be water, and when this is eliminated by a squeezing-out process the real value of railroads will not be much over or under 75 per cent of the value claimed by the railroads in the hearings before the Joint Committee on Railway Mail Pay. In other words, the claim of the railroads as to value is one of speculation. If the railroads are correct in claiming that 6 per cent is a proper return on their property, then it follows that 25 per cent of the valuation of railroad property as claimed by the railroads is water injected by manipulation and speculation.

It is stated by Samuel O. Dunn in his work Governing Ownership of Railroads, pages 65, 216, and 217, that a very large part of the physical value of the railroads is represented by terminals in large cities. This is in reference to handling passenger traffic and expressing architectural beauty.

One objection urged by the railroads to the recommendations of the department is that the department's policy is a vacillating one; that the Post Office Department has often changed its plan and therefore what it recommends loses weight. This course is evidenced by the fact that even now long arguments are mailed to Members of Congress. The latest of these is No. 15. On the contrary, I think the fact that the Post Office Department has at all times shown a mind open to conviction and a willingness to accept suggestions of the joint commission and others proves that the conclusion arrived at by them is both honest and probably correct. The Post Office Department has sought to incorporate in its suggestions to the joint commission all the best features brought out by the hearings, and its aid, particularly that of Mr. Stewart, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, to the committee in preparing the bill and aiding in securing data has been of very great value.

The railroads claim that they are now carrying the mails at a loss, while under the new bill, in view of the fact that many millions a year will be saved by the Government, their loss will be greater. It is true that the Government will save many millions a year under the proposed plan; probably more than $4,000,000 the first year, and thereafter a larger sum each year, based upon the growth of the Postal Service. That is one of the objects of the bill. It is also true, however, that these millions will not be taken out of the railroads' pockets, as they would have you believe, but will be saved by reason of economies and reforms only possible under a conduct of a railway mail service on a basis of pay for space instead of weight. The department, under the proposed plan, will be enabled both to give the country efficient service and to pay the railroads a liberal compensation for the service performed by them.

The railroads' claim that they are now carrying the mail at a loss was completely refuted by the briefs submitted by the Second Assistant Postmaster General on January 16, 1914, to the joint commission. In it he gave the joint commission, on pages 994, 995, 996, and 997 of the hearings, a complete statement of all operating expenses and charges against income as regards the mail service for the year 1910. In this statement the Post Office Department charged itself with its entire part of operating expenses and taxes, and then took a share of all other charges against income which were apportionable to the passenger service. The basis upon which it took this charge was the basis of the per cent of the operating expenses and taxes already charged to the mails. Such a basis was most liberal. After making this charge against the mail service the total expenses and all charges made were shown to be over $1,600,000 less than the total revenue received by the railroad companies for carrying the mails during the year 1910. In addition, this took no account of over $900,000 deductions made for land-grant service which the department might have taken credit for, because such land-grant deductions were made for an entirely distinct consideration, namely, in consideration of grants of land made to the railroad company. Under the law the land-grant railroads are compelled to accept the rate, large or small, fixed by Congress. In theory, therefore, the railroads receive the $900,000 deducted from the pay of land-grant railroads for their carriage of the mails. The railroads made two objections to this finding of the department:

First. That the division made by the department of general expenses between the passenger and freight services was not made upon the railroads' plan of revenue train miles. Such a basis for division has long ago been found to be both antiquated and unscientific.

Second. That the department refused to charge against the Government "dead space," which is space in cars run for the convenience of the railroads and not as a necessary incident to the mail service. Such space is entirely excessive, and the department refused to charge it to the Government.

There is no foundation, therefore, for the railroads' claim that they are underpaid. Because in 1873 the railway mail pay represented 31½ per cent of the gross postal revenues, while in 1913 it represented only 19 per cent of the gross postal revenues, the railroads claim that they are underpaid. This argument is based upon a very patent fallacy. It goes upon the assumption that there is a direct relation between the gross amount received for postage on mail matter and the amount of pay received for carrying the mail matter upon a basis of weight. The revenue derived by the Post Office Department is based entirely upon the rate of postage upon the several classes of mail matter, and the gross amount received for postage depends upon the amount of business done. It is also true that in 1873 the service was new, and since then economies have been worked out. As regards first-class mail matter, the amount of revenue received by the Government is very large as compared to the weight of such matter, when you consider the amount of postage derived from second-class matter as compared with the weight of such matter. Yet in each case the railroads are paid for carrying mail matter of both first and second class on a basis of weight. The Government receives but 1 cent a pound for all charges, including carrying second-class matter, yet it pays the railroads over 3 cents a pound for the average carriage of all such matter. Consequently, if the Government were to pay them a certain per cent of the postage revenue, regardless of what is a fair rate for carrying such matter, as the argument of the railroads, outlined above, would seem to imply, the result would go very hard with the railroads.

The railroad committee advance the astounding argument that if the weighing of mails were dispensed with "there would be no effective check upon the misuse of official discretion in the authorization of car space."

In answering such a charge it is only necessary to state that the weight of mails is never a criterion of the space required. A 1,000-pound lot of mail may, on account of bulk, require more space in a car for distribution purposes than would a 2,000-pound lot of mail of a more compact character. In other words, a pound of lead weighs the same as a pound of feathers, but it takes up much less space. As regards the charge of the possible misuse of official discretion in determining the space needed, the recommendation for authorizations are the subject of most careful scrutiny by not only the supervisory officials of the Railway Mail Service but by the large force of inspectors in the field. Extravagance in authorization of space could, consequently, not long continue without correction. As to the misuse of official discretion among postal officials, if there were a possibility of such misuse in authorization, it would result in additional pay for the railroads; consequently, their apprehension for the integrity of the postal officials is not worthy of serious comment.

The railroad committee raise objection to the present bill on the ground that confusion will arise in the manner of handling mails in unusual quantity where they can not be handled in the regular authorized space. The department officials inform me that no difficulties of this kind are expected, because upon lines on which may arise the conditions indicated it is proposed to authorize a certain number of additional emergency trips per month, to be used at the discretion of the field officers in charge of the service and to be paid for at regular rates.

The railroad committee seems able to argue two ways against the space basis:

First. They claim in their brief that it will reduce their pay below the amount it should be.

Second. They oppose it on the ground that it will be more expensive to the Government and require a greater outlay of money than the plan which they themselves suggest, namely, to change the present weight-basis law so that the Government shall pay them more money for the same facilities furnished.

As to the objections of the railroad committee with reference to the construction by the railroads of railway mail cars, the provisions in the pending bill amount to little more than the reenactment of existing law. There is no ground for the railroads' argument that such requirements supersede the railroad management and should be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railroad committee raises the objection that the rates under the proposed bill, being composed of a line rate plus an initial and a terminal charge, are very complicated. As a matter of fact, the rates are more simple than under the present law. The line rate and terminal rate are based on the size of car operated in a train. The unit for fixing a line rate is the train car mile of the sized car authorized, and the size of car is the base for the terminal charges. When these are fixed for a train it will be a simple matter to determine the compensation due a given train or route. A certain amount of space will be furnished by the railroad making a certain mileage, and this will be paid for, so that pay will be given only for service actually performed. The railroads need only give to the department a statement of the service performed by its trains on a route during a stated period, and will be paid accordingly at fixed rates. No expensive and complicated weighings, such as are made now every four years and costing annually $500,000, will be necessary. Furthermore, the payment for service actually performed will equalize conditions between railroads, which now, although they furnish the same service, receive a different compensation, because the class of mail carried by some roads—usually the large and heavy lines—is greater than the weight carried by the smaller roads. The new plan also gives increased compensation for frequency in carrying the mail, such as was not recognized under the old law.

Another provision in the bill to which the railroad committee takes exception is that authorizing the Postmaster General to pay "not exceeding" the rates named. The railroads demand that he shall pay absolutely the rates named in the bill, thus taking away discretion to pay less if the conditions of the service do not warrant the maximum pay. This provision leaving such discretionary powers in the Postmaster General is similar to provisions in all statutes regulating railway mail pay since 1838. Such a provision is found in the law of 1873, and it may be added that while no Postmaster General has ever made a reduction in rates applying to the whole service, he has in many cases, because of special conditions of the service, paid less than the maximum rates, and his discretion should not be taken away. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if the Clerk has the bill ordered printed with the amendments in italics?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the bill has not been printed.

Mr. MANN. I do not know when it was ordered printed, but it was not sent down until about noon to-day.

Mr. MOON. It was ordered printed yesterday, and it should be here now.

Mr. MANN. But it did not go over to the Printing Office until about noon to-day. The bill was ordered printed with the suggested amendments, but it did not go to the Printing Office until this morning, nearly at noon.

Mr. MOON. Let the Clerk go ahead with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereby authorized in his discretion to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territory, commencing about March 25, 1913: Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how much that one-half of 1 per cent amounts to in that case?

Mr. MOON. Oh, I do not know; I have not had any calculation made of it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it about $250,000 in round numbers?

Mr. MOON. I believe so.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question.

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And that is if the pay allotted to the railroads, both from the original 5 per cent increase of cars and from the proposed one-half of 1 per cent, would not amount in round numbers to about $2,000,000?

Mr. MOON. Possibly.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That payment that is provided for in the last proviso, section 1, is that in full for service already rendered?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the discussion of the question of railway mail pay yesterday I called attention to the fact that in the fourth contract section, which is the western section, by reason of the increase of the parcel post for the postal facilities the department had used a higher per cent for determining the average annual rate of expenditure than it previously used. Heretofore the usual annual rate for the increase has been 4 per cent, or for the four years 16 per cent. Multiplying it by the total rate of expenditure that is paid to the railroads in the section would give the estimate for the payment for the next four years. But with the establishment of the parcel post the rate is 24 per cent. In this fourth contract section on June 30, 1914, the railroads were receiving $17,200,000. Twenty-four per cent would aggregate more than $4,000,000.

In the Post Office appropriation act, following the authorization for the Parcel Post Service, a provision was carried authorizing the department to increase the railway mail pay in those districts to the extent of 5 per cent until weighings would be taken. It is given out broadcast through the country that the railroads have received 5 per cent increase, when, in fact, they have not. All that the railroads receive by reason of this authorization is $1,700,000, or 3.59 per cent. We are here providing an additional allowance, aggregating a quarter of a million of dollars annually, in addition to that heretofore authorized for the increasing weight of parcels from 11 to 20 and to 50 pounds. But the House can see that in the Middle West, the third contract section, where the weights will not be taken until next year, where the aggregate pay is $16,736,000, the railroads to-day are carrying, if they are entitled to any compensation for the parcel post, matter for which they are only receiving $500,000 additional to the determined allowance before the establishment of the parcel post, when under the present schedule of rates they would be entitled to $2,000,000. It is only a case of this added burden being thrown upon the railroads in these respective sections for which they are receiving no adequate compensation.

Mr. LLOYD. Do you mean to convey the idea that the Post Office Department has not carried out the law?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Post Office Department was authorized to pay 5 per cent.

Mr. LLOYD. Five per cent, or not exceeding 5 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not exceeding 5 per cent.

Mr. LLOYD. They have not paid exceeding 5 per cent, and there was no law violated.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not wish to convey by my remarks that the Post Office Department had not carried out the law.

Mr. LLOYD. I beg your pardon. I understood you to convey that idea.

Mr. STAFFORD. I said that the rate was 3.59 per cent. The allowance as proposed will only remunerate the railroads partially for the extra service occasioned by the establishment of the parcel post.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in order to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] a question. In the latter part of this section is a proviso which reads as follows:

Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

In view of the fact that the country is divided into four sections for weighing purposes, that last year the northeastern section was weighed, and that this year the western section has been weighed, that leaves two sections that are to be weighed in the future if the present system should continue; but undoubtedly the present system will be discontinued and we will go to the space basis provided in this act. What I want to know of the gentleman from Tennessee is this: In case of a railroad, say in Alabama, which was weighed two years ago or a year ago, as to the extra pay of one-half of 1 per cent which is allowed them will it be allowed the railroad for the full year of the contract term?

Mr. MOON. I think not, if we go on the space basis.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I wanted to know. You think that under the language of this paragraph when the space system is inaugurated this increase of pay by reason of parcel post will not be added for subsequent years?

Mr. MOON. Certainly not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not know whether the law continues that or not as it stands.

Mr. MOON. Construing all the law together, that is the meaning.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chairman will permit me, I direct the gentleman's attention to this specific clause in line 3, page 3, that says:

For the remainder of the contract term.

As soon as we adopt the new method of payment those contract terms terminate.

Mr. MURDOCK. They are not contracts at all?

Mr. MOON. They would end under the adoption of this.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster General in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdraw therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in accordance with the direction of the committee, by striking out that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out all of section 2, which is comprised in lines 6 to 15, inclusive.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise for the purpose of opposing anything that is in sight, in order to ask a question.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Is not the committee amendment to strike out the part through which the lines are drawn and insert that which follows?

Mr. MOON. To insert nothing. The department regards that as unnecessary.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this puts the empty equipment back into the mails?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. What will become of it?

Mr. MOON. After this new plan is adopted we are proposing in section 13 that the Government shall take care of its equipment either in the cars where they have space or where it is now.

Mr. MURDOCK. The complication I have in mind is this, that originally we took the empty and return equipment out of the mail. Then we permitted the postmaster between certain dates to return some of them. Now we are taking that car away from him. What condition does that leave us in?

Mr. TUTTLE. That section is repeated in section 13, page 21, which covers the very point covered here. It provides for the return of the mail bags and other equipment in case of emergency. You will find it at the bottom of page 21.

Mr. MOON. This section becomes unnecessary at this place.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That so much of section 4 of an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected, is hereby repealed.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 16, strike out the figure "3" and insert the figure "2."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] explain just what the origin of that was? Why was this amendment necessary?

Mr. MADDEN. I can explain the purpose of it. The department thought they ought to have the right to readjust at any time they wanted to regardless of whether there is a difference of 10 per cent in the weight of the mails or not. As it is now they are not allowed under the law to make any readjustment for payment or reduction under any contract unless the weight of the mails diverted exceeds 10 per cent. The department thought it an economy—and I agree that it is—if they be permitted to make any deductions or adjustments at all, that they should be permitted to make them whenever they pleased.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, in formers years the department could not make any difference in the amount of pay when the mails diverted from one railroad to another road did not exceed 10 per cent, and that is repealed in this section?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and it ought to be repealed.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the Second Assistant Postmaster General makes a very clear statement in explanation of this. He says:

> The present law allows readjustment in case of diversion of mails where the diverted mails amount to at least 10 per cent of the weight on any route affected. It often happens that diverted mails do not equal 10 per cent of the weight of any route affected, especially where the routes carry a very heavy weight of mail, and we would like to have the provision modified so that we can readjust the mails diverted to or from such routes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. The next section is the one concerning which there is considerable contest. I think, before we read it, Members of the House ought to have notice that we are reading the bill, and I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois not to make that point of order now. I realize the importance of that section, and I will ask unanimous consent to pass over that section.

Mr. MURDOCK. When will you have a better time than now to consider it? To-morrow is Saturday.

Mr. PAYNE. When will it come up?

Mr. MOON. It may come up later this afternoon, but I want everybody interested in it to have full notice.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose it goes over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. MOON. My suggestion was that it go over until we have finished the balance of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will make this suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee: It is barely possible that we might finish this bill to-morrow. To-morrow is Saturday, and it is likely that not many Members will be on the floor Saturday afternoon unless they are called in, and if they are called in it will be inconvenient to them. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to this section going over and being taken up the first thing when we go into committee to-morrow.

Mr. MOON. Suppose we work on this bill to the end of it, if possible, and leave this section 3 until we have finished the rest of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That might bring the consideration of section 3 late to-morrow, the most inconvenient time in the week.

Mr. MOON. Well, suppose we pass it over for the present and take it up after awhile.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Will there be permission, if we pass it over now, for the offering of a substitute?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes. We will act under the same rules.

Mr. MANN. It is quicker to dispose of it now. There will be a roll call on Saturday to get the Members here.

Mr. MOON. Do you want it the first thing to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. Let us do it to-day.

Mr. MOON. You want it now?

Mr. MANN. I think it is better for us now.

Mr. MOON. Oh, if the gentleman insists upon it, he has the right to demand it.

Mr. MANN. There are more Members here to-day than there will be to-morrow.

Mr. MOON. I think we should get through with these sections concerning which there is no contest.

Mr. MANN. You might run through those sections to-morrow afternoon, when the gentleman from Tennessee and four or five more Members are here, but you can not run this through then. I think it is safer now. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-one Members are present—not a quorum—and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 228 Members responded to their names, and he reported to the House a list of the absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being present, the committee will resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That hereafter any assistant postmaster who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to execute a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required to also execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant he is for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to require all applicants for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days, or as soon thereafter as practicable after the passage of this act, under the civil-service law, rules, and regulations, and the Postmaster General shall, under such law, rules, and regulations, appoint all assistant postmasters, and all laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 24, strike out "4" and insert "3."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I do not care to say anything in addition to what I said yesterday, except that I should like to have read a letter, written by Mr. George T. Keyes, assistant secretary of the National Civil Service Reform League, which letter I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all from line 24, page 3, down to line 16, on page 4, inclusive.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor. Does he desire to have this letter read in his own time?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. Does a motion to strike out and insert take precedence over a motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to perfect the text takes precedence.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a preferential motion.

Mr. MANN. A motion to amend takes precedence.

Mr. CULLOP. But supposing the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] is carried; would that deprive me of the right to offer a preferential motion to strike out and insert?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to perfect the text takes precedence.

Mr. CULLOP. Which is the preferential motion, the one to substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] has the floor. The Clerk will report the letter sent up by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
NEW YORK, July 11, 1914.

To the Members of the House of Representatives:

On behalf of the National Civil Service Reform League I respectfully urge that section 3 of the bill (H. R. 17042) introduced by Mr. MOON and reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be stricken from the bill. This section reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. That hereafter any assistant postmaster who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to execute a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required to also execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant he is for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to require all applicants for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days, or as soon thereafter as practicable after the passage of this act, under the civil-service law, rules, and regulations; and the Postmaster General shall, under such law, rules and regulations, appoint all assistant postmasters, and all laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

This requires all "applicants" for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, "including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made," to take a competitive civil-service examination. Those now in office are not applicants. The apparent purpose of this last-quoted phrase is to vacate all offices held by such persons, although this purpose is not specifically stated. A vacancy so created is to be filled by appointment from the list so established, which means that under the civil-service law and rules any one of the first three may receive the appointment.

The provision is wholly unnecessary for any other purpose. By the existing Executive order all applicants for assistant postmasters must now take a competitive civil-service examination—not within 90 days, but as occasion requires.

If the object be that which we have surmised, we are still quite unable to perceive what useful purpose will be accomplished. The only argument which could be made for vacating all existing offices would be that without such procedure it is impossible to get rid of incompetent political favorites who were given appointments before the Executive order of September, 1910. This theory, however, is absolutely untenable. There is nothing in the civil-service rules or in the statutes that prevents the easy removal of such an employee. All that is required is to give such an employee an opportunity to make an explanation of reasons submitted to him for his removal. No formal trial is required under this procedure, and there can be no review by the courts. This section would require the Civil Service Commission to waste both time and money on a needless piece of work.

The proposal is, furthermore, unjust to the assistant postmasters who now have a competitive classified status. The Executive order classifying the assistant postmasters did not automatically give the assistant postmasters a competitive classified status; instead no assistant then in office could receive such a status until he had satisfied the Postmaster General as to his efficiency. Under this provision of the order about 1,700 of the assistant postmasters appointed prior to the issue of the order have satisfied the Post Office Department of their efficiency, evidence having been obtained from reports of postmasters, post office inspectors, and other officers. Approximately 560, or 24 per cent, have been appointed under the civil-service rules and regulations either by promotion, transfer, or through open competitive examination. All of the 1,700 assistant postmasters carried into the service by Executive order have been in office for more than three years. Since the issue of the order they have been forbidden to take any part whatsoever in politics other than to cast their votes and express their political opinions in private. They have been required to devote their time to the duties of their office, and have depended upon the security given them through competitive classification won by faithful service. To require them now to enter a competitive examination for appointment which would give no guaranty of reward for efficient service can only result in disturbance to the service and the establishment of a precedent which may easily leave our civil service completely unstable and disorganized.

We beg to point out, further, that under the rule permitting the selection of any one among the first three on an eligible list there would be no guaranty under this section that if the assistant postmaster in office secures a place among the first three, or even if he is the first man on the list, he will receive appointment. On the contrary, this plan can easily be made a device for making political removals and political appointments under the guise of the merit system. Such a proceeding would bring disgrace upon the party responsible for it.

The last clause in the section, furthermore, specifically repeals "all laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act." Taken at its face value, this clause may repeal all of the civil-service rules applicable to the appointment of assistant postmasters, inasmuch as the act, if passed, will, of course, be superior to the rules.

A similar section was contained in a bill introduced by Mr. MOON early this year, and was opposed by the league on the same grounds. In view of the possibilities of interpretation of clauses in the section and unfortunate precedents which would be established were the section allowed to stand, we urge its elimination when the bill is reached on the calendar.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE THURMAN KEYES,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a preferential motion in the form of an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out all after the word "general," in line 5, page 4, down to and including line 16.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MANN. No; an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. MOON. How is it offered?

Mr. MADDEN. I offer it to perfect the text of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MOON. There is a motion pending to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a preferential motion.

Mr. MOON. I know it is; but I want to know how the gentleman is offering it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the section by striking out all after the word "general," in line 5, page 4, down to and including the word "repealed," in line 16, page 4.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. CULLOP. I have pending at the Clerk's desk a preferential motion, which I offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill deals with one of the most important questions now before the country. It ought not to be encumbered with any such political claptrap as this. We are dealing with a great economic problem—the movement of the mails by the railroads from one end of the Nation to the other—and that question alone is of sufficient importance to justify the best thought of every man in this House, and it ought to be so presented that every man in the House can give his thought to it. The introduction of this section in a bill dealing with the transportation of the mail is for the purpose of getting votes for that section that could not be obtained in any other way. The proponents of the section undoubtedly believe that if this section came before the House as an independent measure it would not have any chance whatever to pass, but they undoubtedly calculated that if it were tied up to a great measure that meets with the approval of every Member of the House, Members would vote for it even with this iniquitous section in the bill rather than vote against that feature of the bill which meets with their approval.

I submit that it is unfair to tie this section to the great economic measure. It is unfair to the people to endeavor to get around the civil-service law in any such way. It is unfair to the proper management of the Post Office Department so to embarrass it that you place every man who has executive duties of great importance to perform in a position of doubt as to where he stands. We need the best thought of every man in the Postal Service to get the results that the people of this country expect and should receive. We need the best thought of the best men whose services can be secured to this great service. We have introduced here a bill to scientifically reform the method of transporting the mails, and to provide for the appointment of assistant postmasters without experience and for political reasons in connection with this project is to throw the department into turmoil, to disorganize it, to make impossible an economical and efficient administration of the affairs of the department. One-third of all the money expended out of the Treasury of the United States, over $300,000,000 annually, is expended for the conduct of this department, and none but men of experience should be allowed to administer this great fund; politics should have no place in the conduct of postal affairs. It is unjust and unwise to load the bill down by any such iniquitous section as this. You will, no doubt, say in reply that this is only a means to give men a chance to be examined as to their fitness. That can not be true, because these men have already been examined as to their fitness. They have proved their fitness by their work, not by their words, and this amendment ought to prevail. This part of the section ought to be stricken from the bill, and the Post Office Department should be run on a strictly business basis [applause on the Republican side], not on the basis of spoils politics. The people of the United States are patient, too patient frequently, but the time has come, if you leave this section in the bill and it becomes a law and you turn these men out of office because you want the places, when the people will rebel against any such iniquity. The people will be heard from in November, when this injustice will be righted at the polls by turning you gentlemen out of office who to-day vote to turn honest, efficient men out of the public service without reason or justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is quite an interesting thing to hear my friends on the other side make their appeals against the civil-service law, against all law, against law and order in every shape, in order to uphold the Republican President in the expiring days of a Republican administration in putting 2,500 Republicans in office for life in the United States without an examination. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Talk of iniquity! That was the most shameful thing in the history of that administration. But let us see a moment what this bill, which the gentleman calls iniquitous, provides for: First, that the assistant postmaster, who now handles the cash and performs the duties of the postmaster, shall be required to give a bond to him for the performance of those duties, a thing that he does not do at the present time; and this committee now has before it cases where the assistant postmasters have defaulted and the Government has exacted money from postmasters, and application is made now for reimbursement.

But that is not the material point of this section. They complain that we require these 2,500 Republican postmasters, clothed with the power to perform the duties of that office for life by Executive order, to be examined to see whether they are competent or not. Why, under the civil-service law, should everybody else be subject to examination and these men kept out of examination? Mr. Taft put in thirty-odd thousand postmasters of the fourth class in the same manner. President Wilson said that it was not right, that it was a fraud upon the country to cover into these offices for life these fourth-class postmasters, and required a competitive examination, which has been and is going on now. Tell me, is there any difference between covering fourth-class postmasters by Executive order into office for life, and covering assistant postmasters? The logic of one is the logic of the other. What are you going to say when you go back to your constituents about this question? Are you going to say that you were willing that President Taft should select 2,500 Republicans without examination and put them into office, to prevent the fair and honest competition against them by all of the other Republicans of the country to which they are entitled under the civil-service law? Of course you would be willing to do it as against a Democrat. We would expect nothing more of you, but as against Republicans, have not other Republicans the same right to stand an examination and obtain these positions that the men chosen by the Taft administration have?

This act is in furtherance of the civil service, as far as that is concerned. It requires a compliance with the spirit of that law, which has been subverted by Executive order. Not only is it not iniquitous but it is perfectly fair and just and right. If I had been drawing a section upon this question that would meet my approval above all others, I would have said that the Postmaster General shall appoint these assistants, just as the President appoints the postmasters, because they are the confidential agents and assistants of the postmasters, and they ought to be his personal and political friends, whatever the administration may be. That would have been the businesslike way, the sensible, just way. You can not, by hollering fraud and iniquity, subvert the whole civil-service law, and if I mistake not the temper of this side of the House, you shall not longer impose these 2,500 Republican officials upon this Government without an examination.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Not now. I desire to call the attention of the House to the attitude——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for the consent that it has given. I just want to call the attention of the House to the attitude that is assumed by men who are called into office for life by Executive order, who feel that they are perfectly secure from examination or any interference in the holding of their positions. Look what these men say:

We hold status in the civil service, conferred upon us by due process of law.

Yes; it was due process of law! It was an Executive order—an assumption of power and authority, perhaps constitutional, but not in accordance with the principles and policies of this Government.

Our title is unquestionable—

That is, you, the Congress, the controlling law-making power, must not question these gentlemen, for they are in office for life—and our agreement is a legal agreement with the Government of the United States that we shall not be dismissed.

What a proposition! Officials of the Government claiming that they have a contract with the Government for the performance of official duties for life, and that they shall not be dismissed!

I call attention to this view expressed by these gentlemen to show their claim of implied contract of service. It shows how persistent and how insolent men may become in the assertion of a right to hold a public position when once clothed with that position for life, whatever may be the will of the dominant or sovereign power that does, in right, under the Constitution, control these places.

I had been willing to go just as far as this section goes, and require a competitive examination in which all, Republicans or Democrats, and these men themselves, might participate. Of course I would not for a moment think of an examination in which they alone would participate, but if you want to throw down the gage of battle, if you want to challenge this side about the sentiment it possesses, the feeling that we have on these questions, I will support an amendment to this proposition to take this class of men entirely out of the civil service [applause on the Democratic side] and give them over to the department for selection, because by the very nature of the service they perform they ought not to be under civil service, and ought to be the immediate confidential clerks to the postmasters who hold office by virtue of political power.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Here is one side of this that is very confusing to some of us. If an assistant postmaster now is incompetent, can not the postmaster find against him and get rid of him?

Mr. MOON. I would like to see how he can without violating the civil-service law.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is nothing in the civil-service law which makes a postmaster retain an incompetent assistant.

Mr. MOON. There is nothing in the law that permits the postmaster to discharge an assistant postmaster; that will have to be done by an act of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case of Milwaukee——

Mr. MOON. That has to be done under the civil-service law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. For a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case of the assistant postmaster at Milwaukee, who had been brought under the classified service, he was demoted and a Democrat put in his place by the incoming Democratic postmaster.

Mr. MOON. For what reason?

Mr. STAFFORD. That he is getting aged and was——

Mr. MOON. If he was incompetent, it would be through the operation of the civil service and through the operation of the Post Office Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it can be done if he is incompetent.

Mr. MOON. Yes; but that is not the question here. We are not talking about disabled men, idiots, or thieves. We are talking about able-bodied men, who have no earthly reason for being there under this administration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further? Does not your provision provide even if they qualified under the civil-service examination, if there are three persons who are ahead of them who are not in the service to-day, would not they be given preference of appointment and the present assistant postmaster removed, even if they proved to be efficient by a civil-service examination?

Mr. MOON. Yes; provided always these things are performed honestly. There have been, as I said a day or two ago, instances where second-class assistant postmasters were absolutely removed from one city and carried to another——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. I do not care to take any more time, but I can talk all the time that you can give me.

Mr. MURDOCK. As I understand, the gentleman states this. That if an assistant postmaster to-day is incompetent he can be removed through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MOON. He can be removed on proper charges brought before the Civil Service Commission and sustained through the operation of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why is not that the way to get at this proposition?

Mr. BURNETT. Did you do it in that way——

Mr. MOON. The trouble is——

Mr. BURNETT. Did the Republicans put them in that way?

Mr. MOON. I am not talking about getting rid of them after they have gone in in the way they have. I am saying they have gotten in wrongly, that they have gotten in without any examination at all, and that they ought to be made to take a competitive examination in accordance with the civil-service law before they should be permitted to continue. I would not let them be exempt from the operation of that law and other classes of officials be compelled to submit to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman think any appreciable number of assistant postmasters now holding under civil-service examination, where the first three on the list can be selected, will get back?

Mr. MOON. Of those now holding I do not know; if they stand the examination and get on the list the first man is mighty apt to get back.

Mr. MURDOCK. Unless there is a Democrat among the first three.

Mr. MOON. Not at all; there are many instances I can cite in my district where such a rule absolutely prevails.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: When a postmaster under the present situation complains against his assistant postmaster because of incompetency the charge comes to Washington. An inspector is sent to investigate that charge. If that inspector finds the assistant postmaster is competent, that precludes the postmaster from getting away with the assistant postmaster. Now, is not that one of the troubles with reference to this proposition, and speaking frankly and sincerely you have got——

Mr. MOON. Do not take up all of my time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not one of the troubles here your Republican inspectors?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then let us get down to brass tacks. Why do you not go after the Republican inspectors? Why are you pounding the poor assistant postmasters?

Mr. MOON. Of course the Republican inspector will ordinarily give advantage to his Republican friend when it comes to his selection, but the gentleman from Kansas is taking up the back end of the question. I want to get down to the front of this proposition and get out of these offices men who have gotten in there improperly and in violation of the spirit of the civil-service law and all laws, and put them on an equality with the rest of mankind in an examination under the law and ascertain whether they are competent and entitled to the places.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think the gentleman has gone the long way around.

Mr. MOON. I will get there in about three minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question for information?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. President Taft covered into the civil service the fourth-class postmasters. That order was changed by President Wilson so that all men who had not taken the examination must take an examination.

Mr. MOON. I just stated that a moment ago.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Has President Wilson the same right and the same power to make an Executive order as President Taft had when he made his order as to these assistant postmasters?

Mr. MOON. We do not have to ask him to do so. He has the power, if he does not like our legislation, to veto it. I want to say this: That I am tired of the suggestion that this administration or this House is going to hold these offices, in the department or anywhere else, regardless of the civil service, in trust for the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I voted for this civil-service law 30 years ago, and nearly every Member of the House on both sides voted for it, in a Democratic House. The civil-service reformers formed associations, and they had the pledge of nearly every Member of Congress to vote for this law. They wrote them a letter just before election and said the voters wanted to know how they stood on the subject, and when they got the letters they published them, so that nearly every man came here pledged to vote for a civil-service reform law. The law had a provision in it by which the service might be extended from time to time by order of the President by rules and regulations, and a great majority, nearly all, of the people now under the civil service are there by the Executive orders issued from time to time. This is no new thing of 3 years ago, or 10 years ago, or 15 years ago. The blanket of the civil service has been extended by order of the President from time to time.

Mr McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Not just now. I have only five minutes. If I get more time, I will yield to the gentleman later.

Your great President, Grover Cleveland, from time to time extended this civil-service order to different branches in the administration, and men are there in the civil service to-day that came in under Cleveland's order. So this thing about which gentlemen get so much excited is not an unusual thing.

I have several assistant postmasters in my district, or the Government has. I have never recommended or intimated to a postmaster in the district in 30 years whom he should appoint as assistant postmaster or to any other position in his office. [Applause.] They have appointed them of their own free will.

Mr. BURNETT. Have they not always appointed a Republican?

Mr. PAYNE. No, sir.

Mr. BURNETT. Who is the Democrat? Tell us who he is.

Mr. PAYNE. Just give me half a minute. Some 12 or 14 years ago I recommended a postmaster for the village of Canandaigua, now the city of Canandaigua. The postmaster came to me and said he wanted to continue the present deputy postmaster. I said, "If you want to, why do you not continue him?" He said, "He is a Democrat, and I do not know whether you want it done or not." I said to him, "You have been appointed postmaster because of your ability, and I expect you to conduct that office and conduct it in the best manner possible, and if you say this man is fully competent why in the world should you not keep him there even if he is a Democrat?"

Mr. BURNETT. Did he vote for you?

Mr. PAYNE. He never was questioned about his vote. You do not know what politics are down in your country. We play it fair and square up our way.

Mr. BURNETT. You do not know it then, if you call it fair and square.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I will put my reputation against the gentleman's, even right here in this Democratic House.

Mr. BURNETT. I will do it.

Mr. PAYNE. And that man stayed there as assistant postmaster until he died, a year or two ago.

Mr. BURNETT. You killed him?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, "killed him." That is precisely the argument, and the only argument, you gentlemen can make on this subject. "Killed him!" And another man was appointed in his place under civil service. In another town within two years they appointed a Democrat, and he was the son of a Democratic committeeman for that county, as assistant postmaster. I do not know to exceed six assistant postmasters personally, and I have not during that time, and two of them were Democrats and vote the Democratic ticket, and nobody ever questions them about it. Oh, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," and the besom of destruction is hovering mighty near the Democratic side of this House right now.

You want more trouble. I met a Democratic friend of mine, a Member of this House, two days ago, and I said to him, "You are looking a good deal better than you did five or six months ago." He said, "I am all right now." I said, "How is that?" He said, "I have got all the post offices in my district filled, and I have not any more trouble about it."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Have you not trouble enough now? I used to have trouble about the postmasters. The best thing that happened to me was when President McKinley took the stand that he would reappoint a man in a presidential office if he was a good postmaster, and they have been reappointing them ever since. And we have not had any but good men in the offices that I have recommended. Some of them have served 12 or 15 years, and they are so good that the Democrats have left them there until they served the full four years of their last term.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I will.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman believe the Republican administration and the Democratic administration have administered the civil-service law fairly and justly?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I can not get down to the gentleman's plane about the fairness of administering it. I do not want the gentleman to take up my time now.

Mr. MOON. We will give you more.

Mr. PAYNE. There is another question I want to get at.

Mr. MOON. And if it has been administered fairly or unfairly—the gentleman does not seem willing to say which way it was. Can you tell me why it is that in the first and second class offices it happens that 98 per cent of the assistant postmasters are Republicans and those who are Democrats have been convicted of treason two or three times by the party?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how you get at that. I know how it is in my district. These were appointed before the civil service was applied to them, and, I understand, many of them since.

But, gentlemen, if you want to get at this matter, you do not have to pass any law. The same law that put it in the power of the President to cover these men into the civil service provides that he can remove every one of them to-morrow morning.

Your President can remove every one of them to-morrow morning. Are you not willing to trust him? I say he can remove any one of them to-morrow morning. Can you not trust your President? Why do you want to pass this law? It will follow you to your districts. Oh, your people were afraid of it 30 years ago. They got in under cover then. They all signed that letter, and they all said they were for the reform of the civil service. But after you vote wrong this time it will not do you any good for you to write a letter to your constituents. They are onto such a game as that. They will know you are not in earnest about it. They will know that you are not telling the truth about it. They do not want these deathbed conversions on your part. [Laughter.]

Oh, there are a few men in your districts that want the offices, but the great majority of your constituents do not care a rap about them. They are for the civil-service-reform law, and they are interested in seeing it executed, and they want these offices filled on the ground of merit right along.

Now, if you think that the appointing power should not choose out of the three highest, limit them to one, to the very highest. Limit him to one choice, and then, of course, there can not be anything to it but a lottery, and the man who gets the highest percentage is the man who will be appointed. There is no trouble about that, if you are afraid the Republicans will get the advantage of it. They can not do it unless they are the brightest and pass the best examinations.

Now, do not, gentlemen, break up the post-office business in these towns, where often the assistant postmaster is the most important adjunct in the post office, as he was in the office at Canandaigua, when they kept that Democrat there and kept him until he died. Be careful about these things, and do not let your heads run against a stone wall by going blindly for any such attachment as this to such a great economic measure. Stand up and do not be whining around here a month before election and crawling into your holes after having addressed a letter to the Civil Service Reform Society, saying you have repented and that after this you are going to be good. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan and on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois close in five minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that all debate close in five minutes on the amendments submitted by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the amendment. This morning I had occasion to investigate the expenditures in the postal system, to find out what we pay the postmasters in the country.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry; but I want to say to my friend from Kansas that I do not want to cut him off.

Mr. MURDOCK. Go ahead, so long as it does not come out of my time.

Mr. MOON. Has the debate on this amendment been exhausted, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; it probably has.

Mr. MOON. On both of these amendments?

Mr. MURDOCK. I can strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOON. Whether, under the rules, the Chairman holds that the debate has been exhausted on the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been exhausted on the amendments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the total expenditures for the Postal System at the present time are $300 000 000. Ten per cent of that goes as pay to the postmasters. It is an enormous overhead charge for the executive service rendered. It is enormous for many reasons, but chiefly because the rate of pay to the postmasters has not been adjusted to the latter development of the whole system, for the rates of pay have not been changed for something like 30 years.

Now, the postmaster is an individual of constantly diminishing political importance by reason of popular primaries and other changes which are moving us away from the boss system, but he is still strictly political in respect to his appointment. He is usually not selected by reason of his competency or his knowledge of postal affairs. Almost universally in the United States he is an official of considerable leisure. The place in the larger cities is purely executive. And by reason of the political manner of his selection and his lack of knowledge of postal affairs the average postmaster is under the necessity of having an assistant postmaster who does know the postal system. Men who do know it are those who have been trained in subordinate places, for I think I can say truthfully that most assistant postmasters of my acquaintance in larger offices have come up from the subordinate places in the service.

Now, it is a mistake to disturb those skilled men. I know how anxious the Democrats are to get the places and I know how anxious the Republicans are to retain the places. I think that both sides of the aisle, both the Republicans and Democrats, exaggerate the importance of getting and retaining the places. The average assistant postmaster in the United States within my observation is so busy with the affairs of the office, usually doing many things that the postmaster himself ought to do, that he has no time for politics. Most of the assistant postmasters of my acquaintance are Republicans, men who were brought up out of the service and given these places by Republican postmasters. But most of those I know do not busy themselves in politics.

If this bill passes—and it will pass, of course, and become a law, because the majority party wants it—what is going to happen? All of these holding assistant postmasters will have to enter a competitive examination for the places. The local politician will be busy. He will pick up in a given community one or two or more Democrats who are after a political job; men of education; men who are up in book learning; men who can pass the ordinary technical tests that are put before applicants in the civil-service examinations, and there will be certified for selection three names. On that list will be, among the first three, probably one or two Democrats, and possibly the assistant postmaster, now a Republican. The selection will be made from those three men at the top of the list; and, politics dominating, of course the Democrat will be selected. In the course of time, through acquaintance with the system and experience, he will make just as good an assistant postmaster no doubt as the holding Republican assistant postmaster.

But what about the public and the public interests in the meantime? You have here in the United States a corps of assistant postmasters who know the service. They happen to be most of them Republicans.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. They perform efficient service for the public. They are there. They understand it. The public has the benefit of their experience.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MURDOCK. Your proposal is to put them out and put in men who are untried in the technicalities of the service; men who, under a technical examination, can name the seaports of Asia; men who can solve problems in logarithms; but men who would have difficulty in describing the difference between second and third class mail.

You are crippling the service for the interim between the time you appoint your man and the time he becomes expert in the service. You ought not to do it.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes to answer two questions.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will take the time unconditionally, but I will answer the questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, I yield first to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. I want simply to ask this question: If these assistant postmasters are as efficient as you say they are, why are they, or you for them, afraid to bring them into competition with other Republicans and Democrats who may want to take the examination?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no fear whatsoever for them.

Mr. MOON. I suggest that with the Republican examining boards the gentleman ought not to have any fear.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will let me answer, I will say that I have no fear whatsover for these gentlemen. My concern is for the good of the service and for the convenience of the public.

I happen to know, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] knows, that a man may be very competent as an assistant postmaster, skilled in the technicalities of that service, but for the life of him he could not tell what is the capital of Kamchatka. You are going to put into these places a lot of men who in time will be just as good assistant postmasters as they have to-day, but while they are learning the system the public is going to suffer.

Mr. MOON. Would it not be a good idea to educate a few new men for fear that some of your pet Republicans may die?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman can not say anything to me about "pet Republican" assistant postmasters. I have no pet assistant postmasters in my district. Postmasters now are mostly Democrats, and the assistant postmasters are largely Republicans. But I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee, if he has the real intestines, if he has the right kind of bowels in this situation, he can get down to brass tacks. Down in his heart he believes that no Republican ought to serve as an assistant postmaster, and if he means business, if he lives up to his lights, he ought to put them out. One way to put out Republican assistant postmasters and do it with dispatch is to put another branch of the service into politics—to change your inspector force. Let the gentleman, if he means business, face the music and bring to his Democratic friends not a half remedy, but full relief.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. My two minutes have expired, but I should like to answer any other questions the gentleman wishes to ask.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman from Michigan offered an amendment to strike out. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offered a preferential motion, which was to amend the text. I desire to know now whether it is competent to offer an amendment to the preferential motion of the gentleman from Illinois as a substitute?

Mr. MOON. I want to move that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] has the floor.

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to offer a substitute for the preferential motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that he can not offer it——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that he does not know, until he hears the amendment read, whether it will have a preferential character or not.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offered an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. And the gentleman from Kansas moved to strike out the last word, and you can not have two amendments pending at the same time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. I object. We will vote all the afternoon on those amendments if you want to, and we will have tellers on the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAY. You can not debate it all the afternoon.

Mr. MANN. No; but we will have tellers. If you want to get gay on it, get gay.

Mr. HAY. I am not going to be bluffed into withdrawing the point of order by threats made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the Chair will remember that the first motion offered was one by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to strike out the section. That was followed by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out a portion of that section.

The CHAIRMAN. To perfect the text.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it in order now to offer a further motion to perfect that paragraph?

Mr. MANN. But there is another motion pending that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] insists upon having a vote upon, and that is the gentleman's motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. MURDOCK. I withdrew that, or tried to.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman could not do that except by unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Virginia objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. Then the bluff did go, did it not?

The CHAIRMAN. An examination of the motion submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] shows that in the opinion of the Chair it is not a preferential motion.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon that for a moment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon that amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. I want to be heard upon the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HULINGS. The section which we are considering now provides for the appointment of assistant postmasters, and I am offering a substitute, providing a method which will take this whole business out of partisan politics.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman offered an amendment which has not yet been reported. No one knows what is in the amendment. I believe the Chair has ruled it out of order, but, I suppose, must have ruled from a private inspection of the amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

Mr. MANN. If a gentleman offers an amendment he is entitled to have it reported.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment until we have taken a vote on the other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3, page 3, by striking out the section and substituting the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act all vacancies arising in first, second, third, or fourth class postmasterships shall be filled by appointment by the Postmaster General, of the assistant postmaster if there be one, or if there be none, then of some other person, to fill such vacancy until a postmaster shall have been selected and commissioned in the manner hereinafter provided—that is to say, the Civil Service Commission shall, as soon after said vacancy shall occur as possible, certify to the commissioners of the county or to the persons whose duty it is to prepare the ballots for general elections in the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office may be in which said vacancy shall occur, the names of three citizens of the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office is, qualified under the civil-service rules to be postmasters, and at the general election next succeeding thereafter the commissioners shall cause to be printed on the official ballot the names of the three persons so recommended by the Civil Service Commission, who shall be, but not under any party designation, the candidates for the office of postmaster in such city, town, borough, or township, and the person who shall receive a plurality of the votes cast for postmaster at the said election upon giving a satisfactory bond, the amount and terms of which shall be determined by the Postmaster General, shall be commissioned by the Postmaster General as the postmaster of such post office for the term of six years, and be entitled to the pay and emoluments now provided by law: Provided, That said postmaster when so selected and commissioned shall have authority to appoint from the classified service an assistant postmaster; and such appointee when approved by the Postmaster General before entering into his office shall give satisfactory bonds for the faithful discharge of duty to the Postmaster General: Provided further, That whenever in the discretion of the Postmaster General any postmaster shall be or become incompetent, inefficient, or neglectful, upon charges made and hearing thereof had of which the person is charged shall have had due notice and opportunity to defend, the Postmaster General may remove such postmaster and fill the vacancy as herein provided for until another person can be elected and commissioned. And all laws and rules and regulations inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed and rescinded."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Chair what he understands the situation to be as to the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] submitted an amendment to strike out the section. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] submitted a preferential amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. MOON. Does the Chair regard that as an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No; that is an amendment to the section. That is a preferential motion to perfect the text. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submitted an amendment which has just been reported by the Clerk, which is an amendment to strike out and substitute, which does not take preference over the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. MOON. The Chair then does not regard this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as one in the third degree?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is distinctly with respect to amending section 3 of the bill with reference to the appointment of assistant postmasters. With that amendment I am in part agreed, but it does not meet my views fully, and I have introduced an amendment that has particularly to do with the manner of the appointment of the assistant postmasters. If that is not germane to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, I can not imagine what sort of a motion would be germane. It has to do with the very same subject, and I suggest that this is the only part of this bill, where it can be offered, where we can seek to perfect the text by an amendment that will give relief from a very embarrassing and disturbing situation. Always when you come to the appointment of these postmasters with all the disturbance and petty politics that go with the present system of appointment, the natural and reasonable inquiry is, Why should not the people of the district select their postmasters? They are far better judges of the qualifications of the applicants than judges 1,000 miles away, whose appointments are always made for purely partisan political reasons.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. In just a moment. If a man has been certified as being in the classified service——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this motion is in order; and why can not the gentleman offer it at the end of this bill as a separate section, when it will be in order without dispute, instead of taking it up now and incumbering this section with it?

Mr. HULINGS. Following the suggestion of the gentleman, I will say that if the motion be held to be in order at that time I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. MOON. As an independent section it might be put in this bill, but whether it will be in order or not——

Mr. HULINGS. If we pass this section, as I presume it will be passed, then any amendment such as I have offered will be inconsistent with section 3 and subject to a point of order. Now, when we are dealing with section 3, and dealing with the very subject carried in my amendment, though not in toto, I hold that it is entirely competent to deal with the entire subject, not only with assistant postmasters but postmasters also, and not fourth-class postmasters only but every postmaster in the land. There is no reason why the people should not have the authority to elect from the list submitted by the Civil Service Commission the men who are to serve them as postmasters.

Everybody knows the present system is corrupt. Everybody knows that the post-office system is a political football. Everybody knows that presidential appointments are made strictly on political lines. Everybody knows that the political "boss" uses these appointments to reward the "wipers and oilers" of the machine. Everybody knows that the Post Office Department is one of the big assets of the boss system, and the sooner it is abolished the sooner you will get rid of the meanest element in party politics.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order. I understood the Chair to rule it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that he made a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HAY. I did—that he can not make two motions to strike out at the same time. I did not make the point of order in that form. The point of order was sustained and never has been withdrawn.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on the pending amendment do now close.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I was recognized.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to speak on this amendment?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I move, then, that all debate on this amendment close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it all debate to the section and all amendments pending?

Mr. GARNER. To the amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. To the two amendments? Will the gentleman from Tennessee give his attention? Is his motion only directed to the two amendments—one offered by the gentleman from Michigan and one by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOON. Certainly. When they are disposed of the section will be open to further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon these two amendments close in five minutes, after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who is to have the five minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 55.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. MOON and Mr. MANN) reported that there were—ayes 89, noes 53.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I rise now to offer an amendment that I have already submitted to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ruled out of order, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, under whatever disguise this movement may be attempted——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the regular order.

Mr. COOPER. If I had had any idea when I rose that I was going to precipitate a riot of this character, I would not have risked it. [Laughter.] As I was saying, under whatever disguise gentlemen may seek to conceal this attempt it is plainly an effort to further the movement inaugurated early in the present Congress and since then diligently carried on step by step to do away with the civil-service system. That is exactly what it is. Now, the present civil-service law had its origin in conditions which were intolerable. Among the men foremost in urging and securing its enactment were some of the greatest of Democratic statesmen. For example, Senator Bayard, of Delaware, in a notable speech in the Senate; Senator Pendleton, of Ohio; Senator Vest, of Missouri, and other eminent men of their party.

President Grant, in a message, declared that the old spoils system made conditions intolerable. Garfield, on this floor, in a speech eloquent, philosophic, profound, unanswerable, and in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, also unanswerable, said that the old spoils system could not longer be endured, that he could not go to bed without leaving office seekers in his house nor rise early enough in the morning not to find them there. Daniel Webster and John C. Calhoun joined in a report in which they denounced the old spoils system under which Senators and Representatives claimed that the appointive offices were their property and used them to rig up corrupt political machines, and in that report those two illustrious statesmen warned the country that the corrupt and corrupting system, if allowed to continue and strengthen, would mean death to republican institutions.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asserted vehemently that the President of the United States, a Republican, covered into the civil-service class, by Executive order, 2,560 assistant postmasters, all Republicans. Now, it chanced that when he made that remark there sat beside me, on my right, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], and next to him the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN]—both Republicans. I remarked to them that there was covered into the civil-service class by that order one of the strongest Democrats in my district as assistant postmaster at Beloit, a city of 15,000 inhabitants. Before that he had been Democratic committeeman. His name is Larry Rosenthal. I never attempted to interfere with him. The office did not belong to me. It belonged to the citizens of Beloit—the people who were its patrons and as such entitled to the service that such an expert could render. What he thought about the tariff or any other political subject did not in any degree affect his efficiency when distributing the mail of either Republicans or Democrats.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] interrupted my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] while he was defending the civil-service law, and said to him, "You do not know anything about politics."

The trouble is, Mr. Chairman, that in the matter of appointments politicians of a certain type forget their plain duty to the great mass of the people and know nothing except politics.

The gentleman who sat at my right [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], a Republican from Michigan, informs me that in the city of Muskegon, a port of importance in that State, there had been a Democratic assistant postmaster for the last 10 years. The gentleman from Michigan said, "I never thought of interfering with him either before or after he was covered into the civil-service class." Next to the right of the gentleman from Michigan was the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], who said, "At Beatrice, in my district, for several years the assistant postmaster has been a Democrat, and I never sought to interfere with him."

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I have only five minutes, at the end of which time debate on this amendment is to cease. The gentleman refused me when the time for debate had not been limited.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] assumed that only Republicans had been put into the civil service by Executive order. It was pure assumption. In my district we have assistant postmasters who are women. They can not vote; they can take no part in politics. At least one of them has neither father nor brother. I did not know that she was assistant postmaster until I visited that office. But she is a good woman earning an honest livelihood, and I would be ashamed of myself to attempt under any pretense to have her removed. Do you say that Assistant Postmaster Rosenthal, a Democrat, formerly a member of the Democratic committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], to strike out the last part of the section.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the language reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, after the word "General," strike out the following language:

"And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to require all applicants for assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices, including those now in office who were carried into the service by Executive orders heretofore made, to take a competitive civil-service examination within 90 days, or as soon thereafter as practicable after the passage of this act, under the civil-service law, rules, and regulations, and the Postmaster General shall, under such law, rules, and regulations, appoint all assistant postmasters, and all laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 90.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. MOON took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the section.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I rise to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Clause 7 of Rule XVI provides:

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost shall neither preclude an amendment nor motion to strike out and insert.

The Chair will therefore put the motion to strike out first. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH], to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks for a division. Those in favor of the motion will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-six gentlemen have risen in the negative. The ayes are 50 and the noes are 86, and the motion to strike out is lost.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH and Mr. MOON to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 85.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. To offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Rhode Island, who is a member of the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 16, after the word "repealed," insert the following: "Provided, That assistant postmasters now in office who shall pass an examination as required by this section shall not be removed from their positions or be demoted except for cause, as in the case of other employees of the classified service."

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that assistant postmasters now in office who shall pass an examination as required by this section shall not be removed from their positions or be demoted except for cause, as in the case of other employees of the classified service.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will at least test the good faith and sincerity of those who make the claim that the purpose of section 3 in this bill is to advance and to further perfect the present civil-service system. If I understand the meaning of the civil service, it is designed to promote efficiency in the public service. And the question here, as proposed by section 3, as I see it, is whether or not this section 3 will promote efficiency in the Postal Service.

Some time ago—I think it was in the month of January last—this same proposition which we have before us in this bill was attempted to be enacted into law as a rider in connection with the Post Office appropriation bill. It went out of that bill upon a point of order. Section 6 of the Post Office appropriation bill was substantially the same as section 3 of this bill. The only difference, I take it, is that section 6 of the Post Office appropriation bill attempted to accomplish directly what section 3 of this bill attempts to accomplish indirectly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment I have just offered will give to the assistant postmasters who succeed in passing this examination such meed of protection as they are entitled to, because of the high class of service which they have rendered during their incumbency in office. I have no objection to section 13 of the bill, which provides for an adjustment of railway mail pay. I believe, after listening to the explanation of that section by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE], a member of the joint congressional committee, appointed to investigate the subject of railway mail pay, that it will provide a plan that at least deserves to be tested. But I object to using the good features the bill contains as a vehicle for the carriage of a proposition which still further tends to break down the civil-service system. [Applause, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. HULINGS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I rise to offer the amendment which I heretofore sent to the Clerk's desk as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is the preferential motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. HULINGS. I do not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to perfect the text, while the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a motion to strike out the whole section and substitute something else.

Mr. HULINGS. It is a motion to strike out and insert, it is true, but it has to do with the same subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not germane to this amendment, for the reason that it does not say anything about it, and it contemplates the striking out of the entire section. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. MOON. Give us tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. MOON and Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 79.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have reported the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That hereafter any assistant postmaster, clerk, or employee in any post office who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to execute a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required to also execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant, clerk, or employee he is, for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General. The postmaster of all such offices shall have the power to select his assistant postmaster, all clerks, and employees irrespective of any civil-service law to the contrary, and all laws, regulations, and orders in conflict with this act are hereby repealed and nullified: Provided, That all such appointments shall be for a period of four years."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of protecting postmasters, and to aid them in giving good public service. The postmaster gives bond for the faithful discharge of his office. He is responsible for the acts of every employee in his office, and he ought to have the right to say who the employees in the office shall be. As the law now stands, he has nothing to say about who his subordinates shall be, but must take what the Civil Service Commission doles out to him. Much has been said about the good of the service; that the civil service brings about an efficient service. Will any gentleman tell where or how? It has been a political machine up to date, operated for partisan purposes and in the interest of partisan politics, and it is so operated now. There has not been any change in that respect. It is operated now against the administration in power, and very much to its detriment. It has already embarrassed it, as many well know, and will continue to do so. Much has been said about the efficiency of the men. Why, if some of these men should die, what would become of the positions? From the way some gentlemen talk they would go out of business. Andrew Jackson spoke a solemn truth when a man came to him and wanted a position in the service, and he called the head of a department and said it would be necessary to remove a certain man. The head of that department said that he could not run his office without that man. It would cripple the service to remove him. Andrew Jackson then replied, "Tell me the name of the office, and if there is only one man in this country who can run that office I will abolish it at once." [Applause.] President Jackson had the right idea of the situation, and the official was removed and another appointed to the place, and things moved on all right.

The postmaster knows better who can give good public service than any three men a thousand miles away here in the city of Washington can know. The postmaster knows better who will suit the community for assistant postmaster and the clerks in the office than any set of men a thousand miles away here in this city.

Now, what is the condition? In many of these offices the postmaster has to accept employees for the conduct of his office who are not in sympathy with him or with the policies of his office. No official ought to be burdened in that manner, and no one can ever make a good administration of the office and be harassed in that way. It is no use to try to hide the question, gentlemen. It will not down. This is a government of parties, and the party in power ought to name the officials.

The civil service as pretended to be conducted puts educational qualifications as the supreme test for office. Educational qualifications are not the only qualifications necessary to the successful administration of an office. Sometimes it happens that the man with the better education is less qualified for the administration of the duties of an office. Business qualifications, energy, tact to meet with the people, are as essential to the proper conduct of an office as are educational qualifications. The method now enforced as the test is calculated to produce a deterioration of the public service, and a deterioration of the administration of the public duties under this administration. This amendment gives postmasters in first and second class offices the right under the law to name every clerk, every employee, and every assistant postmaster; and the postmaster better understands who can work in harmony with him, who are better qualified to discharge the duties of the office, than any three men a thousand miles away in the city of Washington. [Applause.] He knows the wants of his community, the nationality of the people, the habits and disposition of the people and the parties who may apply for positions, and is in a position to pass upon these matters and thereby secure efficiency and build up the business of the office. It puts a premium on good service and inspires men to greater activities in the satisfactory operation of the office. The principle upon which the civil service is now administered is antiquated and is not in keeping with the spirit of the times, the life tenure of office created by it is hostile to our institutions, and can not be justified from any standpoint of true Americanism. It creates a bureaucracy in its most hideous form, and one of the most dangerous in character, against which the American people are unalterably opposed.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has not expired. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I have not the time to yield now. [Laughter.] Let me give you an illustration——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I object to five minutes, but I have no objection to two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Indiana proceeding for two minutes?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, a while ago when we were courteous enough to give the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] 15 minutes he immediately rose shortly afterwards and shut off debate on this side of the aisle by a motion to close debate. I shall not object to this request——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. But if this course is to be pursued hereafter, I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that the gentleman from Illinois reserves the right to object.

Mr. DONOVAN. But he can not reserve the right to object. He must either object or not object. He can not make a speech.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Indiana is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, let me call attention to how a civil-service inspection is made. Only last week I noticed in the paper a report of an inspector who was sent to investigate a charge preferred against an applicant for a little fourth-class post office. The investigation was made on Thursday, and on Friday afternoon the result of that examination appeared in a leading Republican paper of the county seat of that county. It was published and sent broadcast before it arrived in Washington, and by the time the report of the inspector reached the Post Office Department in this city the newspaper containing the publication was also here. That is the manner in which they are conducted. Does anyone doubt there was collusion in this matter? If so, how could he? This relieves them of that work. There is another consideration to this amendment. Already this Civil Service Commission controls more than 250,000 offices in this country. The salaries of these are enormous. The desire to retain the office and the power conferred is great. That is too much power to be placed in the hands of a commission composed of three men. The salaries reach into the millions. That power must be decentralized. It is now centralized in three men. Some day it will become a menace to the administration of the Government. It is powerful enough now to control the votes of many of the States of the Union. It can dictate to these officeholders how they shall vote and how they shall act in the political campaign. It is not the number of officeholders alone subservient to the wants and desires of this commission, but added to this great number are those dependent on them for subsistence and those who are interested in these persons holding their positions. This number is rapidly increasing, and this power is daily manifesting itself throughout the Republic. This power is asserting itself in politics and is attempting to shape policies and direct the course to be taken in public affairs and thereby control the affairs of the Nation. Selfishness always asserts itself with power. Give it an opportunity and it exercises it not in favor of the many but for the enhancement of the good of the few.

We can not change human nature any more than we can change the spots on the leopard. Men thus clothed with great power will prostitute it to selfish purpose, to sordid ends, and whenever they do so it is always done to the injury of others who are not so fortunate. Civil service has in the past been employed for political purposes to advance political fortunes, and it will, if the power is not removed, be so used again. The cause which inspired this legislation and made it necessary grows out of the fact that it was made to cover a class of offices, to enhance political advantages and political fortunes of some one. No use to deny it.

Did any civil-service reformer protest then? No; not one. They gulped it down in quiet. When the Executive order was made putting assistant postmasters under the classified service the blanket covered incompetent men, and the time between its promulgation and its becoming effective was given to clear the decks of men in the service who were not as good party workers as desired, and for the appointment of partisans as a reward for party services. The most flagrant abuse of both spirit and letter was practiced, and now some holier than thou rises up and cries "Spoils" when we propose this action. Oh, well, the Savior of mankind nearly 2,000 years ago, when on earth, warned the people to beware of the men who stood in public places and proclaimed they were better than other men. That doctrine was true then and it is true now, and the same admonition should be invoked now and here. Yes; these men who now declare they are better than other people and cry "Spoils" are only doing so because they are unable to control the spoils. If they were, they would be doing now as they did when in power. There is no use of denying this proposition.

It is true, and the civil service has ever been operated as a political machine, and as such it has succeeded admirably, and it is high time the mask should be removed and its political operations exposed. It needs investigation in order that the people may know to what extent its political machinations have been carried on. If publicity were turned on its proceedings for the last 16 years I doubt not it would be a great revelation to the people and furnish them some interesting facts for consideration. No better evidence need be furnished for this assertion than the fact that the offices to which it applies are nearly all held by people of one political faith. More than 90 per cent of them are held by Republicans. They controlled the operation of this political machine and made it do splendid service to reward party workers. No one can successfully combat this proposition.

All this could not have been by accident, because the accident, it seems, invariably happened. It might have been an accident and happen occasionally, but when it happened nearly every time, then we know it was by intention. It has been a "swindle service" sure enough, as it is frequently called. It is in disrepute everywhere because of the hypocrisy practiced in its name and under its rule.

For one I believe every postmaster in this country should be elected by the patrons of the office. They are capable of selecting their postmaster, and the power should be given them to do so. We would then secure good and efficient service, an economical management of the office, and a more satisfactory administration of the duties. They are the people's offices, and the people should by ballot say who the officials should be. This would better please the whole people.

Now, a life tenure of office is not in accord with the spirit of our institutions, and is not approved by the people of the country. They oppose such tenure and demand that it be eliminated from the statute books. They pay the taxes, support the flag, and defend the country from all attacks without or within our borders. It is well enough that their wishes be consulted and carried into effect. Fixed tenure will get better services and a more faithful administration, because the officeholder then will keep in touch with the people and feel that he is responsible to them for the conduct of his office. This is the people's Government, and the wishes of the people should be supreme.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division. This is an infamous proceeding by gag rule and we all know it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, let us have tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. MANN and Mr. MOON were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 47.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment that I have already sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MOON. Is that the same amendment that the gentleman offered before?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. MOON. But the point of order was made to that and it has been sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. But this is at a later stage of the proceedings. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. We can not tell what the character of the amendment is until it is reported.

Mr. MOON. But the gentleman said that it is the same amendment that he offered before.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to have his amendment reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would debate close in five minutes in any event?

The CHAIRMAN. In five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Would there still be five minutes' debate in order on this section if we should vote now upon the pending amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. There would still be five minutes of debate remaining.

Mr. MOON. As I understand it there is only five minutes' debate remaining on all amendments?

Mr. MANN. I understand, but if we dispose now of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, then the gentleman from Pennsylvania could offer his amendment and have five minutes.

Mr. MOON. I do not object to his having the time.

Mr. MANN. It is already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the question will be taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CULLOP and Mr. SMITH of Michigan were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment I sent to the desk reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 3, page 3, by striking out the section and substituting the following——

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until the amendment is reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all vacancies arising in first, second, third, or fourth class postmasterships shall be filled by appointment by the Postmaster General of the assistant postmaster, if there be one, or, if there be none, then of some other person, to fill such vacancy until a postmaster shall have been selected and commissioned in the manner hereinafter provided; that is to say, the Civil Service Commission shall, as soon after said vacancy shall occur as possible, certify to the commissioners of the county or to the persons whose duty it is to prepare the ballots for general elections in the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office may be in which said vacancy shall occur the names of three citizens of the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office is, qualified under the civil-service rules to be postmasters; and at the general election next succeeding thereafter the commissioners shall cause to be printed on the official ballot the names of the three persons so recommended by the Civil Service Commission, who shall be, but not under any party designation, the candidates for the office of postmaster in such city, town, borough, or township, and the person who shall receive a plurality of the votes cast for postmaster at the said election, upon giving a satisfactory bond, the amount and terms of which shall be determined by the Postmaster General, shall be commissioned by the Postmaster General as the postmaster of such post office for the term of six years and be entitled to the pay and emoluments now provided by law: Provided, That said postmaster when so selected and commissioned shall have authority to appoint from the classified service an assistant postmaster, and such appointee, when approved by the Postmaster General, before entering into his office, shall give satisfactory bonds for the faithful discharge of duty to the Postmaster General: Provided further, That whenever in the discretion of the Postmaster General any postmaster shall be or become incompetent, inefficient, or neglectful, upon charges made and hearing thereof had, of which the person is charged shall have had due notice and opportunity to defend, the Postmaster General may remove such postmaster and fill the vacancy as herein provided for until another person can be elected and commissioned. And all laws and rules and regulations inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed and rescinded.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the point of order?

Mr. CULLOP. The first point of order is that it is clearly against the Constitution. You can not elect postmasters now, until you amend the Constitution, and the very passage of that would be nugatory; it would amount to nothing. There are but two ways you can come to the election of postmasters in this country——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana state his point of order?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; my point of order is that it is not germane to the provision that has been amended. Second, that we have now perfected that section, and that, therefore, further amendment is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order, if it has not already been made, that the committee by a vote has just stricken out the section and inserted a new section, and that new section is beyond amendment in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The points of order submitted by the gentlemen from Indiana and Illinois are sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That after June 30, 1915, the compensation of postmasters at post offices of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly installments, and shall be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General on the basis of the gross receipts of their respective offices for the calendar year, to take effect at the beginning of the ensuing fiscal year at the rates now prescribed by law.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 4, line 17, strike out the figure "5" and insert the figure "4."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first is upon the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, after the word "law," insert the following: "Provided, That hereafter postmasters of the first, second, third, and fourth classes shall be selected from the classified list of postal employees, and all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act in so far as they affect this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to compel the future selection of all postmasters to be made from men in the Postal Service under the merit system. Under the present method practically all of the men in the Postal System are selected by competitive test of their fitness. The only men who are not now taken from the classified list are the postmasters themselves. This proposition of mine is one which goes to this point, the extension of the merit system, now over part of it, over the entire system.

When the Postal System was first established it was not a service which required great skill, and it became an easy and popular field for the politician, but as it has developed it has constantly been removed from the political field and carried more and more into the practical business field. The first thing was the post office, and without general means of intercommunication it did not develop materially. But with the advent of the railroad and rapid and frequent dispatch of mails all manner of developments requiring skill and business management followed. City delivery was inaugurated. A little later the money-order system was added; the Railway Mail Service was developed, rural delivery was adopted, and parcel post. The Postal System was no longer one of small and segregated local units. It had become a magnificent organized business. And the Nation has been taking it out of politics. Until the attempt was made this afternoon, no one has seriously proposed for years to put any part of the Postal System which we have taken out of politics back into politics. That attempt can not obtain popular indorsement. Instead, I think that the country as a whole, South as well as North, East, and West, demands that that portion of the Postal System which is now in politics be taken out of politics.

Preeminently the part of the Postal System which remains in politics is that part represented by the politically appointed postmaster. My amendment is a very simple one. It is reasonable. It is businesslike, and I can not see for the life of me why Congress should resist it. It provides what? That in the selection of postmasters hereafter the Government shall make postmasters of whom? Of the partisan politicians in the town? No. Of the men who are thought to control some city, some precinct, or ward? No. It provides that the Government shall reach in among the thousands of faithful servitors of the system itself, among the skilled men in the Railway Mail Service, the skilled men among the carriers, among the trained clerks in the post office, men who have reached a high degree of efficiency, and choose from among those men who understand the service the most able and promote them to the highest executive places in post offices. There is not a man here who can stand on the public platform and combat before the people that proposition with success. The people of the United States do not believe that politics should have a part in the great business affairs of the Post Office Department. They believe in weeding politics out of it. They know all over this land from personal observation that the men who would be most proficient as postmasters are the men in the service to-day, who are barred from appointment by the alleged political necessities of some partisan who knows nothing of postal duties. Competent subordinates are not barred from promotion in other businesses. Why are they here?

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the gentleman a question that I desired to ask him a few moments ago.

Mr. MURDOCK. Surely.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a very high respect for the gentleman's views, and I want to ask the gentleman if he believes, as a matter of principle, that as many as 2,500 assistant postmasters should be given virtually places for life by Executive orde.? Does the gentleman think that?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; as a rule I do not. But I do think this, that by putting in the amendment to this bill which you did a few minutes ago you are subjecting the service to a period of a year or two years of inferior service, in order to get an advantage politically that will not, as a matter of fact, bring you a thing. Twenty-five hundred Democrats put in as assistant postmasters in this country will not do the Democratic Party any good, and it will do the service for the first year or two infinite harm.

But I was not on the subject of assistant postmasters. I am speaking of postmasters. I ask you, Democrats and Republicans, when the Government comes to select a postmaster, where ought it to look for one? Ought it to go among the men who are skilled in the service, among the men who know the service, or ought it to go out in the town and hunt up some politician who can carry a ward for some one? My proposal is a business proposition. Why not meet it? Why not take this branch of the postal system out of politics and put it all on a businesslike plane? Surely it belongs there. I wish I could have a record vote on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has expired.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman if he will yield for a moment?

Mr. MURDOCK. If I can secure more time.

Mr. MOON. What section do you want this amendment to?

Mr. MURDOCK. I offer it to section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MOON. I am speaking in my own right, Mr. Chairman, then. What section do you offer your amendment to?

Mr. MURDOCK. To the word "law," in line 25, at the bottom of page 4, which is the bottom of section 4.

Mr. MOON. I understand the purpose of your amendment is to select the postmasters from those in the Postal Service now?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; from the classified service.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I just have this to say about that proposition: I can not conceive anything that would be worse than to pursue a policy of that sort. It would establish in the Post Office Department absolutely gross corruption all around, and you would find just exactly what there has been heretofore—a very corrupt condition. I do not believe that your idea would be possible with the partisanship that is carried on in that office to-day. And take this department down here now, and when the Democrats went in ninety-odd per cent of employees there were Republicans. There have been some reductions and some promotions; I do not know for what reasons, but possibly political, and there ought to be; and yet there are a lot of chiefs in each department to-day, 90 per cent of them Republicans, who have not been changed and who are ruling and controlling the country.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. In just a moment. I wanted to demonstrate this fact, that you have already got there now a partisan gang, who make it a business to tell the people that the party in power is not capable of Government, that they have got nobody that is fit for those positions; and these Republican chiefs and Republican clerks in there are the real rulers in that department. And, unfortunately, that may be too true as to the details and the administration of the department.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; not now. If you favor carrying it out and taking all the postmasters and assistant postmasters and other officials and bringing them up through the whole service, departmental or field, so that nobody else can get a position in there, you have just simply turned over this great department of the Government to a class; and, considering the corruption and villainy that have gone on in this office before, and the infernal partisanship that has been carried on there by the men who were retained from the old administration, and the manner in which they conduct things, I can not conceive of any idea of the corruption and the fraud that would result from a policy like that which the gentleman from Kansas suggests outside of hell itself.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman yield? The gentleman has covered me with a fog here. I am trying to benefit the service, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, and not to corrupt it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the most efficiently managed post office in the United States is in the city of Chicago. It is the biggest post office in the United States, with the greatest receipts of any post office in the United States.

There is absolutely no politics in that post office, and there has not been; and one-half of the men who are managing the affairs of that office have been there since they were appointed under Mr. Cleveland's administration. They are Democrats. Nobody ever questions their right to their Democracy. There is no place to find men who are qualified except in the ranks.

In commercial life men are trained from boyhood in the technicalities of the institution in which they are serving, and they are allowed to serve during all their lifetime because of the knowledge they have of the business in which they are engaged. I remember very well, when I was 10 years old, starting in the business in which I am now engaged, and every man who is subordinate to me started in when he was a boy and followed me from the bottom to the top.

I believe that these men, every one of them, are experts. We are looking for men who are specialists in their line of business. We are looking for experts, for specialists. This is an age of specialization, and if there is a business institution anywhere in America in which no politics should be indulged, that institution is the United States post office. It is one of the greatest business institutions anywhere in the world. We spend $300,000,000 a year in its conduct, and no success has ever been achieved in reducing the expenditures except by hearty and unified cooperation with the men from the bottom to the top of the ranks.

Talk about postmasters knowing anything about the business of the post office. No postmaster can know. He comes into the service for a period of four years, with almost a definite understanding that that is to be the end of his service. He has other things to do. He does not care to learn the intricacies of the Postal Service. He has not time to do so. He is there for the job.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MADDEN. I regret I have not the time. He does politics part of his time. The assistant postmaster, the superintendent of carriers, the superintendent of mails, the superintendent of the registry department, and the chief clerks of all the bureaus are the men who have the experience and the knowledge which make the service efficient and economical. I would be glad—gladder than I can tell you—to see some law passed by means of which men will be recognized in this service because of their experience and their efficiency and not because of their political pull. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section close now.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I have been recognized.

Mr. MOON. Then I move that the debate close in three minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will increase the time limit in his motion. I would like to have three minutes. Let him make it six minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's motion will be in order at the end of my remarks. I have the floor now, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, philosophically I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is all wrong in policy and politics. The adoption of his philosophy which would install a class of officeholders from among whom the employees of the Government would be selected for life is all wrong and unsound. If there is any Democracy or any Republicanism in the establishment of an office-holding class who alone would have control of the greatest business organization of the Government, I fail to see it. No private business would for a moment consent to the statement that they must employ all their servants from some particular class of citizens. The banker will not do it, but you would close the door of your post-office business——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. No; I can not. You would close the doors of your post-office business so that no man, unless he rose up in it almost from boyhood, could enter it. It is the wildest dream that ever a politician thought of while he is scoring politicians in his denunciation. No private business would stand for it, and yet he wishes to subject the great business interests of the post office to a rule that no banker, no merchant, and no manufacturer would apply to himself, so that thereby he could not go outside the circle of his subordinate employees to find a man qualified for his employment. It is a closed door. It is absurd. It is unphilosophical. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that commitee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, in view of the existing situation I have no objection to that, if the gentleman will say that he will move to adjourn the House to-morrow when we get through with the pending bill, if we get through with it.

Mr. MOON. Yes. We shall not want to stay after we get through with this bill, and by meeting to-morrow morning early we hope to get through with it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, I should like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that when the House meets to-morrow morning the amendment which I have offered will be pending, and a vote will be had upon it immediately. Ordinarily when the House meets here at 11 o'clock, if there are 10 or 15 Members here, it is a good many.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we shall have to have a roll call anyhow, whether we meet at 11 or 12.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not a roll call in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. We shall have to have a roll call on this bill, whether we meet at 11 or 12. We can not pass a bill like this without calling in a quorum.

Mr. MURDOCK. I know, but the gentleman from Illinois misunderstands me. I have offered an amendment in Committee of the Whole which is now pending, and undoubtedly the vote will come upon it almost immediately after we meet in the morning.

Mr. MANN. It will not come until "the gentleman from Illinois" has made the point of no quorum.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the House?

Mr. MANN. In Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 288. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved May 2, 1914.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes; and

S. 4966. An act proposing an amendment to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes.

FUNERAL OF MRS. WILSON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House for the benefit of all concerned that it is intimated from the White House that the funeral of Mrs. Wilson will be at 2.30 o'clock Monday, and that at 4.30 the funeral train will leave for Georgia, provided the brother of Mrs. Wilson gets here. If he does not, the whole matter will be postponed 24 hours; and if we do meet on Monday, the Chair suggests that the members of the House committee meet at the right-hand gate that goes into the White House Grounds, just inside the gate.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 7967, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the House print of the bill showing the Senate amendments there is an error.

Mr. MOON. There is an error, and the bill is to be reprinted.

Mr. MANN. I discovered it by looking at the original amendment.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman called my attention to it, and it will be reprinted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MOON, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 8, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, as we look without upon the appalling disaster of nations, and look within upon the grieved heart of our own people, we can but turn to Thee for a hiding place under the shadow of Thy wing. In meeting the tasks of every hour, and in serving the country we love, we need that balance of thought and that calm composure which grace alone can give. May we find our refuge in Thee. In this busy, anxious hour, while our hearts are linked together in loving sympathy, guide Thy servants in the conscientious discharge of every duty. "Lead, kindly light, amid th' encircling gloom." Hear our plea, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TRANSFER OF VESSELS FROM COASTWISE TRADE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, a copy of the department's telegram of the 5th instant to collectors of customs instructing them to ascertain the vessels now in the coastwise trade which the owners would use in over-sea foreign transportation in the present emergency, together with copies of telegrams received in reply thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. That communication is in response to a resolution which I presented and which was agreed to by the Senate. It is a report upon ships in the coastwise trade available for foreign commerce. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, as it directly relates to the subject under consideration by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection that will be done. Is any further action to be taken?

Mr. GALLINGER. It might well be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action also will be taken.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE,
Port of Philadelphia, Pa., August 6, 1914.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with instructions in department's telegram of the 5th instant, I have the honor to report that the shipping interests at this port have been canvassed to ascertain what vessels now engaged in the coastwise trade would be used by them in over-sea foreign transportation. The results to-day are as follows:

The Southern Transportation Co., 608 Bourse Building, owns three vessels, namely, Algiers, 1,788 tons net; William P. Palmer, 1,609 tons net; Shawmut, 1,100 tons net. Of these the Algiers is the only one available for service at this time.

The Independent Pier Co., Pier 34, South Wharves, owns two steamers, namely Mae, 1,497 tons net, and the Evelyn, 1,185 tons net. The president of this company writes as follows in reference to these vessels, namely:

"These two steamers have been out of commission for some months, owing to financial difficulties of the former owners, but they could be put into condition in from two to three weeks time. The vessels were purchased by us only recently, so that no special effort has been made to put vessels in commission."

Chas. T. Magee & Co., 135 South Second Street, advise that they have four schooners, namely, Charles K. Schull, 827 tons net; Josephine, 842 tons net; Florence Creadick, 657 tons net; David Baird, 632 tons net, which they can use for any purpose for transportation to any port on either side of the Atlantic Ocean.

The Berwind-White Coal Co., Commercial Building, reports as follows:

"In reply to your letter to us of this date quoting the Senate resolution in regard to coastwise vessels, beg to advise that we do not own any vessel that could be used for this purpose.

"The Havana Coal Co., a subsidiary company of ours, owns two vessels of 8,625 tons capacity, used as colliers, which fact is known by the United States Naval Bureau of Investigation, and they are at present under the English flag."

If any further information is received, the department will be immediately notified.

Respectfully,

H. K. LATHY,
Special Deputy Collector.

PURCHASE OF VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, August 7, 1914.

SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C.

SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: The situation the European war has developed makes clear the deplorable dependence of the United States upon shipowners of Great Britain and of European nations. Farmers, manufacturers, miners of coal transportation companies, merchants, bankers, are all much embarrassed by the destruction of established lines of ocean transportation, and all clamor for immediate relief from this dependence upon British and European shipowners, and they must be relieved at once by Congress if industrial transportation and commercial stagnation, death to many worthy people, is to be prevented. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the many plans now proposed for relief, because, in my judgment, all are most inadequate, all palliatives, none remedies, of an intolerable situation that exists; but it is my purpose to make a definite proposal I believe Congress should at once accept, and by prompt enactment of law make the ship policy of the United States one for the general welfare, not for private profit.

A. Congress to appropriate for immediate expenditure by the President and Secretary of Commerce $200,000,000 for purchase of modern steamships, some of 8,000 tons, some of 10,000 tons, some of 12,000 tons, for use in foreign trade. This amount of money would no doubt be adequate for purchase at this time of from 150 to 200 ships of capacity and kind for both passenger and freight business on the several lines of trade now so broken and restore the flag of the United States to a position of power and respect and also save the amount of the proposed expenditure to the producers of the United States.

B. The steamships owned by the United States should be operated by the Department of Commerce of the United States for the general welfare and so the charges for transportation of passengers and freight should be made, by authority of Congress, such as would pay cost of operation and maintenance of the ships and provide a sinking fund that would sink cost of ships within 15 years.

C. These public-owned ships should be run from the several ports of the country the President and Secretary of Commerce deem best for the development of the export and import trade of the country.

At this time it is manifest many British and European shipowners would sell ships of the kind needed at prices fair to both seller and buyer. It is also manifest the American people would approve and indorse at once the expenditure of public money I propose and give most emphatic approval of the policy of public-owned and public-operated steamships. It is also manifest the carrying trade of the United States would be done in American steamships and that the position of the United States in foreign ocean trade would be what all Americans would like it to be. The adoption of this policy would, of course, result in construction of many ships in American shipyards, because purchase of foreign-built ships at this time is only an emergency measure.

I do not send herewith draft of needed bill, because I know many Senators and Representatives of the United States can draft such bill more in accord with the established customs of Congress than I can. I subscribe myself, Senators and Representatives of the United States Congress, with great respect,

Your fellow citizen.

WHARTON BARKER.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MOON, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 288. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved May 2, 1914.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present telegraphic communications from citizens of the United States regarding the pending shipping bill, and ask that they be read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, August 7, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

The amendment of Senator JONES to the shipping bill now under discussion would, if it became operative, either put our fleet of 26 American-built steamers out of business or force them under a foreign flag. In view of the fact that there are now over 40 American steamers to be applied to the coast-to-coast trade, such legislation is unnecessary, and with such a menace would deter us or anyone else from building any more ships in this country.

AMERICAN HAWAIIAN STEAMSHIP CO.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 7, 1914.

Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to pending legislation providing for American registration of foreign-built ships, would strongly urge that provision be made in bill giving right to said ships to engage in trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports of United States, and further giving them right to import free of duty foreign materials necessary for repairs in like manner as American-built ships, contained in section 5 of Panama Canal act.

NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 7, 1914.

Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Following our telegram of yesterday, and referring to pending registration bill giving foreign ships right to register under American flag, we strongly urge that provision be made for these vessels to engage in trade between Atlantic ports and Pacific ports of the United States, and, further, that they be permitted to import free of duty materials necessary for repairs, in line with section 5 of the Panama Canal act granting this right to American-built ships.

NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE,

NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE,
J. D. HARDIN, President.

Mr. JONES. With reference to the telegram from the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., I wish to say that I have had a similar telegram from them which I inteuded to read. On yesterday morning before I received the telegram I also received a telegram from Mr. D. E. Skinner, one of the lumbermen of the Pacific coast, from which I shall read. It emphasizes the significance of the telegram of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. and shows one of the main reasons probably that influence them in their intense desire to prevent the adoption of the amendment. Mr. Skinner says:

Please consider the plight we are in now due to the lack of transportation facilities between the two coasts. The American-Hawaiian Line has only offered a carrying capacity of about 75,000,000 feet annually, and that has been under option to one eastern wholesale lumber concern.

Showing that that company does not offer us any facilities for the transportation of our lumber, and that all the lumber it does transport is transported for one particular firm.

Mr. BURTON. I have three telegrams, two pertaining to the pending bill in regard to a change in our navigation laws, and the other to pending legislation, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 7, 1914.

Senator T. E. BURTON,
Washington, D. C.:

On our British ships we are now paying our officers full American wages. CLARK'S amendment must be changed. It is unworkable. Many men are now idle having master's license that I would not trust with a rowboat. At present utterly impossible to get sufficient number of reliable and trustworthy officers, and we will never consent to send our vessels to sea with incompetent officers, and under such unreasonable conditions we would not change the flag. My suggestion is giving master and officers now on ships privilege of immediate citizenship, and if they decline, then others must be found, so that full complement of licensed officers shall be American citizens. Coast to coast privilege from lumbermen's viewpoint is correct. From coastwise shipowners' viewpoint it should not be allowed. The bill must put us on equal terms with all foreign competitors; otherwise ships will change flags at end of war. Do your very best to make this bill permanent and the Senate will earn the hearty appreciation of the whole Nation.

ROBERT DOLLAR.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., August 7, 1914.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully urge amending Panama Canal act permitting all foreign vessels irrespective of age to obtain American registers, limiting them to foreign trade only and excluding them from coastwise trade.

RUFUS CHOATE,
President Chamber of Commerce of San Diego County.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The board of directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce earnestly repeats its suggestion that no further legislation disturbing business conditions be acted upon at this session of Congress. The situation brought about by the European war would make any further readjustments, such as would be necessitated by pending legislation, exceedingly unfortunate and untimely.

MORRIS A. BLACK.

Mr. WEEKS. I present a telegram relating to the pending bill from the Fall River Chamber of Commerce, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

FALL RIVER, MASS., August 7, 1914.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Fall River Chamber of Commerce desires to register with you the same opinion in the same terms as telegraphed to you by the Boston Chamber of Commerce on Wednesday relative to the Underwood bill for the American registration of foreign vessels in the present exigency. The Underwood bill is unsatisfactory and likely to involve the United States. We strongly urge the passage of legislation which will result in an effective and permanent increase in the number of ocean carrying vessels flying the flag of the United States, either by immediately providing Federal aid which will put American steamship lines owned and officered by American citizens on a parity with lines owned and operated by foreign companies or by admitting foreign vessels to American registry only under such conditions as will insure their remaining under the American registry when the present exigency has passed and insure their nationality being respected by the world.

OLIVER S. HAWES, President.
WILLIAM A. HART, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I present a telegram which bears on the general tenor of the pending bill, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

CASHMERE, WASH., August 6, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Present European conflict, with consequent withdrawal of British and German vessels from American commerce, will seriously affect export shipments of fresh apples from United States. Curtailment British and German export business means overplus of production usually absorbed by these countries must be unloaded in this country, all of which will have decided tendency to reduce returns from this fruit to producer. We can not urge too strongly, for these reasons, desirability of providing American registry for foreign vessels.

CASHMERE FRUIT GROWERS' UNION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In connection with a number of telegrams which have been presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I desire to present two telegrams from the Portland Chamber of Commerce on the subject of American registry of foreign-built ships. I desire that these telegrams may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the telegrams to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 3, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are profoundly uneasy about foreign trade prospects as result of European war. Urge everything that will safeguard and establish transportation for our trade with Europe during crisis. We join San Francisco in request that craft owned by American individuals or companies now under foreign flag be permitted to fly the American flag under conditions of measurement, inspection, and crew limitations as will induce the change, provided they engage in foreign trade only. Any good work to protect our trade relations should be supported, as sea carrying situation looks serious.

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
A. H. AVERILL, President.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 6, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We wish to amend our message of August 3 to provide that craft owned or hereafter acquired by American individuals or companies now under foreign flags be permitted to fly the American flag under conditions of measurement, inspection, and crew as will induce the change, provided they engage in foreign and intercoastal trade. We are adding intercoastal trade, as we consider it fully as important as foreign.

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By A. H. AVERILL, President.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present two telegrams, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND, ME., August 3, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Consider proposal to allow foreign vessels to be placed under American flag will work detrimental to American shipping and ruinous to Maine shipping interests. Will appreciate any assistance you can render to prevent such legislation.

J. S. WINSLOW & CO.

PORTLAND, ME., August 3, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the board of managers of Portland Board of Trade that any legislation which contemplates conferring the rights and privileges of the American flag upon foreign vessels would be hostile and inimical to the highest interests of American shipping industry.

FRANK M. LOW, President.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, Mass., and a petition of the New England Shoe and Leather Association, of Boston, Mass., praying that the pending antitrust legislation be postponed until the next session of Congress, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented papers to accompany the bill (S. 3425) granting an increase of pension to David H. Hall, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURTON presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to make common carriers engaged in foreign trade liable for the loss of cargoes, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS presented petitions of the Baptist Sunday School of Grimes; of the Westminster Presbyterian Sunday School, of San Francisco; and of the Methodist Sunday School of Mayfield, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

GEORGE P. HEARD.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2728) for the relief of George P. Heard, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 735) thereon.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, and I submit a report (No. 732) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. In doing so I wish to say that it provides for a second homestead; and a bill has passed the Senate exactly as we report the House bill from the committee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, on page 1, in line 3, after the word "entry," to insert the words "or entries"; in line 10, after the word "entry," to insert the words "or entries"; on page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5, to strike out, after the word "entries," the following words: "and that he has not relinquished his former entry or entries for a valuable consideration in excess of his filing fees," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person, otherwise duly qualified to make entry or entries of public lands under the homestead or deesrt-land laws, who has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and who, through no fault of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, or who may hereafter lose, forfeit, or abandon same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead or desert-land laws as though such former entry or entries had never been made: Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report accompanying the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 1657:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the following amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "entry," insert the words "or entries."

Page 1, line 10, after the word "entry," insert the words "or entries."

Page 2, line 3, after the word "entries," strike out the comma and insert a period, and also strike out the following: "and that he has not relinquished his former entry or entries for a valuable consideration in excess of his filing fees."

As thus amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The legislation provided for in this bill is identical with that contemplated in S. 2068, which passed the Senate February 12, 1914.

The Department of the Interior approves of this measure, as evidenced by letters from the department to the Committees on Public Lands of both the House and Senate, and which are found in House Report No. 766 of June 4, 1914, reference to which is hereby made.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and I submit a report (No. 734) thereon.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question in regard to the joint resolution. I understand that some persons favoring the retention of the present members of the board asked a hearing of the Committee on Military Affairs, particularly to maintain the contention that there were no vacancies on the board of managers. I should like to ask if any such request has come to the Military Committee; and if so, whether such a hearing was granted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall any such request. There was a request from the Senators from Indiana to be heard, and they were advised when a meeting was to be held and one of them was present. That was the only hearing I heard mentioned in connection with the matter.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio, if there is any question about it, and if there are Senators or others who desire to be heard, I would be very glad to have the joint resolution rereferred to the committee, because there was no disposition or desire on the part of the committee to exclude anyone from a hearing. As a matter of fact, as reported, it is just as it passed the House, with one change in the personnel. The name of George H. Wood, I believe, was stricken from the joint resolution and the name John C. Nelson, a former member of the board, was inserted.

Mr. BURTON. Wood, I believe, was a Spanish War veteran?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Is Nelson a Civil War veteran or a Spanish War veteran?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Nelson is a Civil War veteran, and he was a former member of the board. His name was substituted for that of a younger man, I think possibly a Spanish War veteran. I am not sure about it, but I think Nelson is a Civil War veteran.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to say that I should like to be heard at the time when the joint resolution is reached upon the calendar. There is a question, I think, as to the existence of a vacancy which should be carefully considered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say to the Senator that if he prefers to have the joint resolution go back to the committee, I am sure the committee will be glad to have that action taken; but if it suits the Senator's purpose just as well to discuss the resolution here, I think it would be better to do so, because the matter ought to be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. BURTON. I will say that if the joint resolution is not to be taken up in my absence, and a reasonable time is given for its consideration, I am entirely willing that it should go to the calendar, but I do desire to give some examination to the question and also to be present when the resolution is considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CLAREMONT, N. H.

Mr. SWANSON. I report back favorably, with an amendment, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the bill (S. 1693) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Claremont, in the State of New Hampshire, and I submit a report (No. 733) thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a matter of considerable urgency. It will take but a moment to pass the bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I think there can be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 12, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$75,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$100,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices in the city of Claremont and State of New Hampshire, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least 20 days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed site and such others as he may think proper to designate to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals, and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

The building shall be unexposed to danger by fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 6245) authorizing a report upon the feasibility of constructing the Colorado River Indian irrigation project; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution, which I should like to have read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives to consider advisability of additional legislation to increase the number of bona fide American vessels, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the necessity of maintaining a transocean service under the American flag which will continue the prompt delivery of passengers, mail, and freight, whatever may be the prevailing conditions; and

Whereas the legislation which has been proposed or adopted is admitted to be either temporary or makeshift in its character, or will be in its effect; and

Whereas the urgent and immediate requirement is such a modification in our laws, policies, or methods as will bring about a permanent increase in bona fide American vessels through a consistent building or other policy which will result in American-owned ships, flying the American flag, under American officers, manned by American seamen; and

Whereas this should be a great national policy, devoid of partisanship: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That a nonpartisan joint committee, consisting of six Senators and six Representatives, be appointed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, who shall at once take this subject under consideration and report at the earliest day what additional action, if any, can be taken to carry out the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to have the joint resolution which has just been read referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I am well aware that this whole subject has been thrashed out by a very competent commission, but my purpose in introducing the joint resolution is to call attention to the fact that the legislation which we are about to adopt is more or less of a temporary character, and that there may be further steps which can be taken which will thoroughly establish a permanent policy of building up our merchant marine.

I am and will be quite content if the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate and the Committee on Commerce of the other House are to consider this matter further, but I have been fearful that, having considered and passed one bill, they might not take further action. I am confident that this is the time when further study and consideration should be given to this question. Therefore I hope in having the joint resolution referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals that that committee will take up the matter and either report it out or take such further action as they may consider desirable in promoting the purposes of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, although clearly it is a matter that, under ordinary circumstances, ought to go to the Committee on Commerce. The bill that we have been considering, known as the shipping bill, properly, of course, belonged to the jurisdiction of the Commerce Committee, but as it was almost exclusively confined to amending the Panama Canal act, it was thought best that it should go to the Interoceanic Canals Committee instead of the Commerce Committee. As this joint resolution deals with the same subject, I think probably it ought to go to the Interoceanic Canals Committee, so that one committee may deal with both of these propositions.

I am saying this because I do not want to seem, as a member of both of these committees, to agree to such a reference without stating the peculiar circumstances of the case as a justification for what I regard as an improper reference of this joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LONGEVITY PAY IN THE ARMY (S. DOC. NO. 562).

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a very carefully prepared paper on longevity pay based upon service in the Army, a matter that has engaged the attention of Congress, and will engage it in the future. I ask unanimous consent that the paper may be printed as a public document.

Mr. OWEN. We could not hear the request on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a paper in reference to longevity pay based upon service in the Army. It is a question that has been debated here and will be again debated, and I simply ask that the paper may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I have a copy of a communication made by Melville W. Mix, president of the Dodge Manufacturing Co., of Mishawaka, Ind., to the publication known as "Mill Supplies," Chicago. The article bears on the subject of merchant marine, is pertinent to the bill now pending, and indicates the temper and feeling of an increasing number of our business men in relation to the subject. There is also before me a copy of an editorial appearing in the New York Commercial bearing on the same subject and treating the question with rare intelligence and discrimination. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to insert these two articles in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The articles are as follows:

To "mill supplies"—Chicago:

The remainder of 1914 ought to produce a very active business in all lines. All normal prophecies are more or less upset by the extraordinary conditions which may be developed by the European war. No parallel situation has ever existed in modern times. If the people of the United States will keep cool and take advantage of the inevitable opportunities of this time, nothing can prevent us from being the conservative provider and banker for the remainder of the world, regardless of whether these nations may be engaged in conflict or not. A foundation will be built such as will not in many generations be disturbed. The warring countries will be many years in restoring business relations; we will be, in fact, the world's clearing house, as by all God-giving right we are intended and entitled to be; our national resources and wealth will make us the world's headquarters for all commodities of world-wide consumption; we will sell less raw and semifinished products and produce more of the higher standard of commodities, carrying the higher wages and greater profits.

The tremendous losses and expenses due to the war and the restoration of armament of these countries will increase taxes in all of the involved countries; their labor supply will be sadly depleted and those who are spared will require better pay; their production costs will increase and their manufacturers and merchants will no longer be underbidding us in the world's markets. Their wastes must be absorbed and they must earn the extra money to meet the losses.

Will the United States grasp this situation, take its proper position in the field, and thereby profit as it will never again have such a chance to do? I think it will.

I have too much confidence in our composite enterprise and reputation for progressive conservatism to believe that we will do otherwise. We will relegate to the rear all of our fads, isms, alleged unrest, etc., and accept with cheer the task now set before us and work like one Nation, one being, to perform the world's service that now seems to be our lot.

You ask what of 1914: It is up to us to make it what we will. It looks fine now; it may even look better later. God has blest us with immense crops and the opportunity is here to realize upon it at a highly advanced figure over any ordinary possibility. Merchandise stocks are low and must be quickly replenished. We must conserve for the benefit of the world, however—but there is one large "if" which, were it a reality now, as it will no doubt now be very soon, would earn its cost many times over and annihilate years in reaching the destined goal that is intended for this great American country, and that is—a merchant marine. If we only had it now! What could stop us?

Can there be any doubt now of its value or need? Can there be any reasonable argument against the wisdom or necessity of our absolute independence in this great form of world-wide communication and transportation? How we may get it does not matter. We must get it by all means, and now. The powers that be at Washington have a great opportunity. Will they respond?

[Copy of editorial from the New York Commercial, August 3, 1914.]

THE CHANCE OF THE HOUR.

In a great crisis, such as now impends, extraordinary remedies must often be resorted to, even when they may inflict losses on an innocent minority. The greatest good to the greatest number justifies President Wilson and Congress in so changing the navigation laws of this country that we may be able to ship our surplus foodstuffs and other necessaries of life to Europe when vessels flying the flags of the great powers of that continent dare not venture out of home or neutral ports.

General war in Europe this year means untold suffering for millions who already face famine. The grain crops in Germany have been almost ruined by rainstorms in the harvest season, and the scanty yield of the Danube Valley will be wasted under the hoofs of war horses. Great Britain, after completing her harvests, will have food for less than three months, and France will not be self-supporting. Russia's grain will be unavailable, just as it was in the days of the Crimean War, when wheat rose to about $3 a bushel at the Atlantic ports of the United States.

We can not stand this loss of trade and money ourselves, and we can not sit by and see others starve while we have food in abundance. It would be better to buy every ocean-going vessel in our coastwise trade at a fair valuation and give it to whoever would navigate it than to lose the chance of securing enough steamers from all available sources to carry on our trade with Europe. We had to give up most of our ocean shipping to Europe at a sacrifice when our Civil War let loose a swarm of privateers, and we can now regain a substantial part of our former importance and prestige if Congress shows statesmanship and common sense.

America can quickly and easily become the money center of the world as well as the chief source of food supplies and many lines of merchandise. Capital will flow to us, because we are safer from the perils of war, and, with the money markets of Europe closed to foreign borrowers, we can establish relations with Canada, all Latin America, Australasia, and the Far East that will remain strong and close after peace comes again to exhausted Europe. As bankers for the world this country should grow as invincible financially as it is now from a military standpoint.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On August 8, 1914:

S. 23. An act for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13, and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANK FUNDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. BRISTOW conferees on the part of the Senate.

MAY STANLEY.

Mr. BRYAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$3,000"; and the House agree to the same.

N. P. BRYAN,
COE I. CRAWFORD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

EDWARD W. POU,
GEORGE C. SCOTT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the so-called shipping bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 4.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as it will be necessary for me to leave the city very shortly, I want to take the time now—and I hope I may have the attention of the Senate for 5 or 10 minutes—to discuss not the amendment which is now pending, but the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which, in a word, provides that this bill may be so extended in its provisions that foreign vessels may be used in the carrying trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Mr. President, I am confident that that is a proposition which, if it is going to be considered at all, should be considered on its merits separately rather than in connection with this emergency legislation. We are in the midst of a very difficult and trying situation, and every attempt is being made to put ourselves in a position where we may provide for our citizens such emergency facilities as will enable them to meet the pressing needs of the hour.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington has nothing whatever to do with the situation, so far as our foreign trade is concerned. It is a proposition to change our coastwise laws; and I hope Senators will bear in mind that while they are considering an emergency proposition relating to our foreign trade, we are asked to change those laws which have been in effect for more than 100 years.

As an emergency proposition, as it stands to-day I approve of what is being done, although there is grave doubt in my mind whether we are not going to get ourselves into trouble as the result of the legislation which is now pending. I hope we will not; I hope it will bring about some results which will be beneficial to our people; but now we are asked, in addition to that, to make an entering wedge in an effort to change our coastwise laws which, as I have said, have been in operation for more than 100 years.

It may be true that our coastwise laws should be changed; that is a matter for discussion and debate. In my judgment they have been wise and salutary, and we are now in a position where we may be able to help our trans-Atlantic trade as a result of our coastwise laws, because we have a large number of vessels in that service which may be used for this purpose. If we had not protected our coastwise service, quite likely that trade would be in the same condition that our foreign trade is in to-day. Therefore I am opposed to making any change in our coastwise laws under any circumstances; but I do say that if we are going to change this great national policy which has been in operation for more than a century, it should be done as the result of a deliberate proposition which should be brought into the Senate and carefully considered on its merits, without any regard to the emergency legislation which is now pending.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago, Mr. President, I offered a resolution, which was agreed to, asking the Secretary of Commerce to make inquiry and to report to the Senate the number of vessels in the coastwise trade that were available for overseas commerce. That report has come in this morning, and I have asked that it be printed in the RECORD. I trust Senators will read it. I have hurriedly counted up the number of vessels which the Secretary of Commerce finds available in a few of the larger ports, and they are 97 in number.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Can the Senator see any reason why foreign-built ships registered in the United States may not be permitted to engage in the coastwise trade? As conditions exist on the Pacific coast now, one of the principal industries of the Northwest, namely, the lumber business, is at a very great disadvantage in competition with the lumber business of British Columbia. For instance, as was shown by some of the telegrams that were read by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the other day, a British-owned vessel sailing from Vancouver, British Columbia, with a load of lumber, manned cheaper, sailing cheaper, and handled very much cheaper, passing through the Panama Canal under the same terms as an American registered vessel, can unload lumber at Atlantic ports very much cheaper than a vessel starting out from Seattle, Wash., or from Portland, Oreg.

We of the West can not see why vessels bought from some foreign country and given an American registry should not be permitted to engage in that traffic, so as to put the people of our northwest territory in the same position, at least, as the British people are placed in with reference to the transportation of this important product.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Oregon are sincere in their desire to furnish a better market for their products, but that is a matter that ought to be considered from every standpoint before we change this great national policy. I am not convinced that the carrying capacity of 75,000,000 feet annually, which, as was suggested in the telegram read by the Senator from Washington to-day, is available, will not be sufficient to carry all the lumber which the Pacific coast will have for shipment to the Atlantic coast.

I know something about the Pacific coast lumber business; I have had some interest there; I have a collateral interest there now; and I know that the market which the average lumberman on the Pacific coast finds is in the interior. Very frequently, when times are good in Saskatchewan and Alberta, he ships into those Canadian Provinces.

I do not know how much lumber will come from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast as a result of the building of the Panama Canal; but if the Pacific coast is going to be embarrassed in that trade I am quite willing—and I am confident that Congress will be quite willing—to take that question up and consider it on its merits. I do not think, however, that it should be injected into this emergency legislation now pending.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator once more?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand if foreign ships are permitted to come under American registry and are permitted to engage in the foreign traffic that there will be any change at all in the coastwise-shipping laws. Permission will simply be granted to foreign-built ships registered as American ships to engage in the coastwise trade on the same terms as American vessels; that is all. The management of the ships will not be changed at all.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it may develop that the suggestion which is being made is desirable. It may, I say; but if it is desirable to use such ships for the purpose of transporting lumber from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast, an argument may be made that it would be desirable to use the same class of shipping in transporting cotton from the State of Texas to the northern mills. I understand that there are something like 4,000,000 bales of cotton raised in the State of Texas, which is very largely taken to New England and manufactured there. If it is desirable to use foreign ships for the purpose of transporting lumber from one coast to another, the people who are interested in the cotton trade may properly say it is desirable to use foreign ships to transport cotton from Texas to Massachusetts; and others may say, I believe, with equal force, that it is desirable to use foreign ships to transport coal from Norfolk to New England, or to do very much of the other larger and more bulky business which is carried on in our coastwise traffic.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that this question is so large, and is so important to this great interest which has been developed as a result of 10 years of industry, and which is to-day in a reasonably prosperous condition, but which, in my judgment, will be destroyed if we admit foreign ships, that it ought to be considered on its own merits without any regard to this legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. One of the great purposes of the pending bill is to secure ships that may engage in foreign commerce.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the great purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that is the one purpose. I assume, however, that there will have to be some inducement to cause American citizens to purchase these foreign vessels. I fear they would not purchase vessels for a temporary trade in foreign commerce, which will place them, as soon as the war is over, at a disadvantage, because of our shipping laws, unless they can use those ships afterwards in the coastwise trade. Ought there not to be some provision that any of the ships that may be purchased at the present time to engage in foreign commerce may engage in the coastwise trade whenever the conditions become normal again?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not in favor of that, and I do not think it is desirable.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Could the ships that may be purchased ply between New York and San Francisco, through the Panama Canal, under the terms of this bill?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think they could under the terms of this bill, but they could under the terms of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Washington. That is what I am opposing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only desire to ask the Senator if he heard the statement which I was authorized to make yesterday by a prominent and reputable attorney of this city? He told me that he had been informed on the long-distance telephone by some of his clients who are large shipowners, and who are engaged in trade on both the Atlantic and the Pacific, that if the amendment I have proposed to this bill is adopted, which allows foreign-built ships to be registered here and to make voyages through the Panama Canal, but not otherwise to be employed in the coasting trade, there will be an immediate application by them for registration of a substantial number of ships; and I have reason to believe that that statement is true. Now, of course, that gives the ships the right to trade through the Panama Canal in interconstal service, but not to engage generally in the coastwise trade.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator if he understands that those are ships now owned by American citizens and flying a foreign flag, or whether they are ships that are to be purchased under the provisions of this bill and given an American registry?

Mr. SAULSBURY. My understanding was that they were ships owned by Americans and now sailing under a foreign flag.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there is no question about that, and that is not affected by the contention which I am making. There are several lines of steamers—the United Fruit Co., the Plant Line, what is known as the Provence Line, the Red Star Line, and several other lines, I think—which are owned by American citizens but are sailing under a foreign flag. If this bill is passed in its present state, I have no doubt that they will immediately transfer to an American registry, which they can easily do, and I think it is desirable that that should be done. That is one of the reasons why I am in favor of this legislation, notwithstanding the fear I have that it may get us into trouble.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I ask the Senator whether his objection goes to these vessels being permitted to engage in voyages which require passage through the Panama Canal or whether his objection goes generally to their entering into the coastwise trade proper?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no objection at all to the proposition which the Senator from Delaware is discussing. What I am objecting to is purchasing foreign vessels which, as soon as the emergency is over, shall be transferred to the coastwise service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a great deal of sympathy with the point of view of the Senator from Massachusetts, because I think I know something about the coastwise trade by reason of the shipbuilders in my immediate neighborhood, who have frequently talked to me on this subject. I also sympathize with the purpose of the resolution which has been introduced, and I hope at the proper time it will be adopted.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to say just a final word, and to say it with all the emphasis of which I am capable. This question is so important to a great national interest, it is so important to certain sections of this country which are engaged in this trade, that it ought not to be considered at this time in this haphazard way as an amendment to an emergency bill which will enable us to carry out our obligations to our citizens in connection with the foreign trade. That is the point I want to make.

If anybody wishes to introduce a bill to-morrow and ask consideration for it at this session of Congress or any other session, so as to enable us to discuss the merits of the coastwise trade and of our manner of conducting it for the last century, I am quite ready to admit that that is a practical and a proper method of approaching this important question. Otherwise, just the minute you let the bars down as far as traffic from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast is concerned, you are furnishing an argument to let down the bars to that traffic in other directions; and you will live to see the day, in my judgment, and not very far distant, when American coastwise shipping will be a thing of the past. That is something that you ought to consider in connection with this amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment further?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator if he does not believe it to be a fact that if this bill passes now, practically the only foreign-built vessels that will be admitted to American registry will be the ships of the Standard Oil Co., which they have patriotically gone abroad to have built, and the ships of the United Fruit Co., who have gone abroad and had their ships built in foreign shipyards; and, now, because they can not operate them during the pendency of the war, they would come over here and register their foreign-built ships under the American flag, so as to be protected by the American Government? In other words, I desire to ask the Senator whether he believes there will be any foreign-built ships actually bought by any American citizens, and their capital invested in them, except those that are already owned by American people?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as to the ships to which the Senator from Oregon has referred, I am willing to assume, although I do not know, that some of them were built abroad. I know that some of them were built in this country. Certainly the United Fruit Co. has had a considerable part of its shipping built in the United States; so the Senator's statement is not correct as far as that company is concerned. It may be true, also, of the Standard Oil Co. I do not know where their ships were built. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if he knows where they were built?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that only a very small proportion of them were built in the United States. I am frank to say that I have not examined the record; but can the Senator say why the United Fruit Co. has its ships under British registry instead of under the flag of its own country?

Mr. WEEKS. They do it because the ships can be operated cheaper in that way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And now they want to come back here in order that they may be protected by the United States Government?

Mr. WEEKS. They do. The stock of the United Fruit Co. is owned by American citizens, every dollar of it, as far as I know, and why should not we protect American capital? This is exactly what we are trying to do.

I will say frankly to the Senator from Oregon that as far as I am personally concerned I would not put a dollar into foreign shipping under the provisions of the bill. I think it would be an extremely hazardous investment, and only the great chances of receiving large rates are going to induce any American citizen to take advantage of the provisions of the bill. If I were to put any money into shipping, I would put it into that shipping that is less than 5 years old, which I can do under the present law, rather than buy old junk.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I am not opposing the Standard Oil ships or the ships of the United Fruit Co. or the ships of any of these other companies coming to the United States. I am glad to have them driven back to patriotism by the war, if need be, and to have them come back home. I am willing to admit them here. It does seem to me, however, that while we are doing that we ought to open up the intercoastal trade, at least, to the ships that come back here and register as American ships.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I hope in this emergency the Senators from the Pacific coast, the Senator from Oregon, and the Senator from Washington will forget the selfish interest—and it is a selfish interest—which they represent in the lumber trade of that coast, and try to treat this question as a great national question, rather than the local possibility of getting some product to market by the subterfuge of putting on an emergency bill relating to foreign commerce an amendment which will break down our coastwise trade.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the Senator admitted, a while ago, that this was not a local question pertaining to the northwest coast alone. The Senator has shown that it might apply to the cotton-producing section of this country, and these ships might be made to ply between ports on the Atlantic coast as well as between ports on the Pacific coast. It is not a local question. It is not a selfish question. It is a national question, it seems to me.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. President, nobody has asked for this amendment or for this legislation except the Senators from Oregon and Washington. The Senator from Ohio has had read to-day from the desk a telegram from San Diego opposing this legislation; and if the question of changing our coastwise laws were the one under consideration, not the question of providing emergency transportation to European ports, I believe the Senator from Oregon would find a decided opposition from all sections of the country to breaking down this national policy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to one of the protests that was filed here this morning. One of these protests was filed by a shipowner who now has a number of his ships under British registry and doing business from Vancouver, British Columbia, to New York, and yet he also has a line of ships doing business between San Francisco and Portland and Seattle, doing strictly an American business; and at the same time he is taking advantage of the British registry law to compete with his own ships, or practically to keep out independent lines on the Pacific coast. I think another protest which was read here was from shipowners similarly situated.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no desire to reflect on what I have termed a selfish interest. Quite likely there are others, and many of them, which would be glad to benefit by the great emergency which we are facing. If they had time to do it, I have no doubt they would have injected here any number of schemes which would help out this interest or that interest; but let us consider these matters on their merits, and not in connection with the legislation which was originally introduced.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator From Oklahoma?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to know what the Senator thinks really ought to be done in this emergency. I do not thoroughly understand the question myself. The Senator has been living on the coast, and I think he could give us some points of interest and of value.

Mr. WEEKS. Such argument as I have been making for the last few minutes, or trying to make, has been in opposition to any change in our coastwise laws under the present conditions, hoping that if there is to be a change made it will be fully considered and carefully debated by the Senate as a separate proposition. I introduced to-day a resolution, which has gone to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, calling attention to the fact that I believe further action can be profitably taken in connection with our merchant marine.

I am not prepared to say offhand what I think can be done, but I think this is the opportunity of a lifetime for the American Nation to develop its foreign trade, and that that is the question which should be given the most careful consideration during the continuance of this session of Congress. I have introduced that resolution, of course, without any reflection upon any committee or anyone else, but with the hope that it would call attention to the necessity for further consideration of the whole subject.

I have not time to say anything more, and it is not necessary; but I do sincerely hope that the coastwise shipping will be left intact until the coastwise trade is considered upon its merits as a separate proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, when the Panama Canal tolls bill was under consideration the distinguished senior Senator from the State of New York [Mr. ROOT] made an argument which attracted very profound attention in this Chamber, in the course of which he maintained that shipping engaged in commerce between the ports of the Atlantic and the ports of the Pacific was not engaged in the coastwise trade at all; that it was actually engaged in the over-seas trade. Although that argument, in my judgment, could not be sustained if made upon the basis of our existing law, which it seems to me clearly defines traffic of that character as coastwise traffic, if we dismiss from consideration the arbitrary provisions of our law, I do not see how the argument of the distinguished Senator can in reason be answered. The traffic between these ports is really over-seas traffic.

It was likewise disclosed in the course of the hearings upon that bill that if the advantage of no tolls was not given to the coastwise shipping, the lumber industry and other industries of the northwest coast, indeed of the entire west coast, would be put at a most decided disadvantage; that the lumber interest, particularly of the State of Washington, would suffer, and the lumber interest of British Columbia, adjacent to it, would profit, because the lumber of the Washington ports, for instance, could be carried to the Atlantic ports only in American ships, while the lumber of British Columbia could be carried from British Columbian ports to Atlantic ports in English ships or in any other ships which could be operated at a very decidedly less cost.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, until I complete the statement, the traffic in that form would give a decided advantage to them. Furthermore, those interests are obliged to rely, as I have indicated, exclusively upon American shipping for the transportation of their products. We have adopted that policy, and we have put them at the disadvantage which everybody must conceive exists.

Not only that, Mr. President, but now these American ships which could engage in the transportation of these products from the American Northwest to the Atlantic ports will be drawn out of that business in order to meet the exigencies that confront us in respect to over-seas trade. So an additional disadvantage will accrue to these interests of the Northwest in consequence of the present emergencies that confront us, and it does seem to me that the people of the Northwest are asking very little at the hands of Congress when they say to us that they would like to have the President given the power to suspend the act confining trade from Pacific ports to the Atlantic ports to American ships while the existing emergency shall obtain. They are suffering because of the existing conditions in respect to trade traffic just exactly the same as are the ports of the Atlantic, and it does seem to me that in consequence of these reasons the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington ought to receive favorable consideration of this body.

I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I do not see how the distinguished Senator from Montana can make the declaration he does in reference to the transportation of lumber. If I understand the laws governing the transportation of lumber, the ships of British Columbia and of the State of Washington or Oregon, as the case may be, are put on an equal footing now with other ships in crossing the Isthmus. The cost of crossing the Isthmus without the canal is about $3 a ton, and there is a detention on an average of about 12 days. How the building of the canal, when the cost will be perhaps about 60 cents a thousand on actual tonnage, would give British Columbia any advantage more than she now has I do not see.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator would not entertain any doubt at all of the matter if he read the testimony that was given before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. He would learn from that that lumber can be carried from British Columbia ports in English ships to ports upon the Atlantic for at least $3 per ton less than the same lumber can be carried in American ships from Puget Sound ports to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. WEST. I understand that; but in going from either one of those ports have they not to pay the same now, without the use of the canal, in crossing the Isthmus?

Mr. WALSH. I do not comprehend the question of the Senator. They pay exactly the same tolls.

Mr. WEST. In going to Panama and unloading a vessel, crossing on a railroad, and reloading it into another vessel, the charge is no more for the vessel going from Washington than for the vessel going from Vancouver.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but they are not going to carry lumber that way.

Mr. WEST. I know; but they are placed on exactly the same footing that they were before the Panama Canal was built.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Senator is correct about that; but I say there is no lumber that travels around Cape Horn.

Mr. WEST. I know lumber has crossed the Isthmus on the railroad.

Mr. WALSH. There was nothing to speak about, nothing commercially.

Mr. WEST. Quite a number of cargoes crossed there, I know.

Mr. WALSH. Nothing that entered into commerce in any sense.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington ought to be adopted; but, recurring now to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, I think, upon the argment made by the distinguished Senator from New York, we are really not invading the legitimate province of the legislation in relation to our coastwise trade, inasmuch as that traffic may very properly be denominated as over-seas traffic.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, we are confronted with a great national emergency—one that appeals to the whole Nation. Whether we have been derelict in the past in our duty toward a merchant marine in providing what the country needs in ships to carry our commerce does not now concern us. The emergency which we see is one which the whole Nation comprehends.

I am very sorry that at this particular time Senators should speak of the Northwest or of any particular section of the country, and seek to amend a great national measure in the interest of any particular section of the country. I am not sure but, considering the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington by itself, I might favor it. I am not so sure but that it would be in the interest of commerce and in the interest of the whole Nation; but at the present time, when we have before us an emergency measure, it seems to me that it should not be narrowed to accommodate any particular section of the country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the Senator what is the necessity for this legislation at all?

Mr. JOHNSON. The necessity for the legislation must be apparent to the Senator. We want ships to move our foreign commerce, our grain, our cotton, and other articles.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think that the emergency is confined to any particular section of the country or to any particular product? Does not the Senator know that the same cause which makes the emergency on the Atlantic coast has also an effect on the situation upon the Pacific coast?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that there is where the Senator is mistaken. Let me tell him that the foreign ships that have been carrying our lumber from our ports to foreign ports by virtue of this emergency are now out of the business. Therefore we are put in the same position that you are on the Atlantic coast, although products of so great value may not be affected.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will pardon me, the ships have not yet been put out of business. He fears that they may be. If that occasion arises, I will cheerfully cooperate with him to meet that emergency. It does not exist to-day.

Mr. JONES. Some of them are shut out. They are now afraid to leave port under the flag they have been sailing under. The case with the vessels of different nationalities on the Pacific coast is just the same as on the Atlantic. The belligerents will prey on the commerce on the high seas there just as on the commerce upon the Atlantic. The same situation exists and in the same degree that it exists on points on the waters of the Atlantic. That is the reason why it is just as important for the Pacific ports as it is for the Atlantic ports. The occasion does exist now on our coast just as it does on the Atlantic.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator speaks of the carrying of lumber and is narrowing it to a particular section of the country and a particular interest when we are discussing a national emergency in which the whole Nation is interested.

Mr. JONES. This is a part of that national emergency.

Mr. JOHNSON. I might as well argue about the interests of New England and its shipbuilding interests and ask to have them considered, but at this particular time I would not narrow the discussion to that; it is wider and broader. I ask the Senator to withhold his amendment until we can consider it later, as the Senator from Massachusetts has asked. This is a question now which, I say to the Senator, should not be narrowed to meet the special interests of any section of the country.

Mr. JONES. I am not asking the Senator to narrow it. I am asking him to broaden it. He seems to narrow it so as to exclude our interests. I want it to cover his interests, and I want it to cover ours, too.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not like the suggestion of my distinguished colleague from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] that because we of the West are insisting that we shall be recognized in the pending legislation, while you are aiding another section of the country, in an international emergency, we are therefore chargeable with selfishness. An argument was made here yesterday in a lengthy address by one of our distinguished Senators [Mr. SIMMONS] that the cotton crop of the South was the thing that most needed assistance in this emergency. We make no question about that, and we concede it. Then the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] insisted that the manufacturing industries of New England were in the same fix. There is no question about that. We accede to that proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will yield in a moment. You can not mention any product in any part of this country that is not involved in the same emergency and in need of the same relief. Because we happen to instance the unfortunate situation that the Northwest is placed in by reason of a continental war the distinguished Senator from Maine talks about our advocating a selfish and a local interest. Mr. President, we have as much patriotism in the Northwest as they have in Maine or in any other part of this country, and we do not propose to sit here silently and see legislation enacted in behalf of one section of the country and not raise our voices in behalf of our own section.

The Senator truly says we ought not to have a selfish feeling in regard to this important legislation. I agree with him. I am willing to go as far to relieve the situation in New England and in the South as any Senator, but I do not propose to have the interests of the West ignored and overlooked without protest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The observation I made was not in reference to this bill at all. One Senator appealed for relief as far as the silver industry was concerned and another Senator for another metal, and I observed that the manufacturing interests of New England were likewise disturbed. My suggestion was rather against taking up matters that simply affected particular sections or particular States. If we are to legislate to relieve the silver mines of the country and the copper mines of the country, we can well care for the manufacturing interests of New Hampshire; but I want no local legislation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in accord with the Senator. The truth is, and it is the truth of history, that you can not materially injure one section of the country without injuring the whole country. As a rule, legislation which is beneficial to one section is beneficial to all sections of our country. I feel that this a great national question, and I am favorable to legislation that will relieve the transportation situation. Notwithstanding the fact that the distinguished Secretary of Commerce is quoted as saying that no legislation is needed at this time and that things will adjust themselves after a little while, I am willing to do anything possible to help relieve the general situation; but I make the prediction, Mr. President, without any suggestion that there is anything wrong about the pending bill—for I intend to support it, provided it is not so framed as to injure the West—I make the prediction that the foreign-built ships that come into this country and seek American registry after this law passes will be the Standard Oil ships that have been constructed abroad because they can be built cheaper there, and those that are being operated under foreign registry because they can man and operate them cheaper under foreign registry. These ships are such as would have remained under foreign registry if it had not been for the fact that the emergencies of war are driving them from the sea, and the only harbor in which they can seek refuge and be protected is an American port under American registry and under American guns.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, will they not go right back under the foreign flag as soon as the war is over?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The very moment that the war is over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Wait a moment. I am led to make this observation on account of the attack that has been made upon me and my colleagues from the Northwest, charging that we are selfish because of the steps we are taking in this matter in striving to protect ourselves from hostile legislation, or rather, to see to it that the West is treated fairly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What the Senator from North Dakota says is true, and I desire to add that there is no patriotism in the owners of these ships I have just mentioned. They register their ships where they can be operated cheapest. They build them where they can be built cheapest. They are driven to these ports now simply because they are afraid of losing their property as the result of war, and they will stay here just so long as it will be to their interest to remain in these ports, and pay the higher wage paid to the sailors of this country only so long as may be necessary. They will go back into the British or other foreign registry just as soon as the emergency of the war is over.

As the Senator suggests, another class of ships that will come here and register will be those of the United Fruit Co., that has its ships, or some of them, built abroad and operated under foreign registry. Why? Because it can build them cheaper abroad. What interest has this corporation in American shipyards? It can operate its ships cheaper under foreign registry than it can in this country. They will come here immediately, because they are owned by American capitalists, and register just as soon as this bill goes through, and then, when the war shall have ended and just as soon as they can safely go to sea without fear of attack by German or British cruisers and those of other belligerents, they will go right back and register as they did before, because they can be operated cheaper than they can be operated here.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Will not the lumber business get exactly the same relief from the registration of the Standard Oil ships and the Fruit Co.'s ships as any other industry?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the Standard Oil ships, as a rule, are doing business for the Standard Oil, and for that corporation alone.

Mr. FALL. Is not this emergency legislation for the benefit generally of all the industries of the United States, of which the lumber business is one? Why will it not afford the same measure of relief to the lumber business that it will afford to the cotton and the wheat?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For the simple reason suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] a little while ago. The higher freight rates, the advantage that will be given to ships that engage in the over-seas trade, will take the few ships we now have engaged in the lumber trade.

Mr. FALL. Will not these foreign-built ships which register under our law pay smaller wages? I do not see why the lumber industry of the Northwest needs any different legislation from that for any other section of the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We are not asking for any special legislation for our section of the country. We are asking for justice for the Pacific Northwest, as well as coastwise ports, both on the Pacific and the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I fear the distinguished Senator from Oregon has misunderstood my position. Certainly in what I said I made no intimation that there was any lack of patriotism on the part of Senators from the Northwest, and certainly that was farthest from my mind with reference to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] or the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I only had this in mind: That in considering the particular national questions when this great emergency has arisen it seemed to me we should divest it of any local coloring and consider it as affecting the whole Nation and not particular sections.

The Senator from Washington had urged that at this particular time his amendment would assist the people in his State if the laws relating to our coastwise trade were so changed that ships between the Atlantic and the Pacific might be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade, even if foreign built, and to that extent suggested a change which would affect his section of the country. I do not know that I would not favor such a change when considered by itself, but at this particular time I was only asking that we consider the question in its broad national light, as it affects Oregon, as it affects Maine, as it affects Texas, as it affects every State in the Union and not any particular section of the country.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator takes his seat let me ask him a question. A few moments ago he suggested that this narrows the measure. It seems to me that it enlarges the measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does narrow the matter.

Mr. CLAPP. What is the objection to it, standing by itself? That is what I should like to hear discussed.

Mr. JOHNSON. If we are going to have any revision of the laws relating to our coastwise trade, let us take that question up by itself. We are now considering the question of enlarging our merchant marine for our foreign commerce, and not for our coastwise trade, and that is a larger proposition, in face of the emergency which confronts us.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, I grant the over-seas commerce may be said to be a larger question than the coastwise trade; but they are more or less interwoven. Ships are needed for both, and, for the life of me, I can not understand why if at this particular juncture you are going to enlarge the registration of one, you should not enlarge the registration of the other. Personally, of course, I come from the Middle West.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know, as I have said, that I would object to some changes in our coastwise laws; but that is a matter which should be taken up by itself and not at this particular juncture.

Mr. CLAPP. It should no more be taken up by itself than should the other proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. It occurs to me that it is a distinct proposition.

Mr. CLAPP. We are met now by a contingency where, whatever may be the effect or benefit to the owners of ships who heretofore have kept out from under our flag, we propose to give them the privilege of our flag from the viewpoint of American advantage and American welfare. I confess my sympathies are very much with the Senators who, desiring not to limit, not to restrict, not to localize the benefits to be derived from this proposed legislation, but as a part of this whole purpose of broadening and increasing the tonnage under the flag, ask that its provisions may be applied to the coastwise trade.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not at all consider the ownership of these vessels. As I look at the question it makes little difference who owns them or what has been their course of conduct in the past. It is only a question now of getting vessels into our foreign carrying trade, no matter what their ownership has been or what their registry has been in the past. For that purpose this bill is offered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. When he spoke just now he said that immediately the emergency ceased these vessels would be transferred to the foreign flag. I fear that my amendment has not sufficiently attracted the attention of the Senator from Oregon to have him consider the effect of the amendment which immediately will follow the one which is now pending if that is adopted, or, indeed, even if it is not adopted. It provides specifically that such transfer may not take place without the consent and approval first given by the Secretary of the Treasury, and although such transfer of ownership in any wise does occur that always the United States Government shall have the right to take for its use such as it desires of the vessels which will now seek American registry. I think that is a very valuable provision.

The first amendment which I offered, which is now pending, provides that American citizens shall be the bona fide owners of the vessels, and that the Secretary shall practically certify to that fact before they are admitted to registry.

The second amendment provides that such vessels shall not be transferred by their owners without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, but that in any event they shall always hereafter be subject to be taken by this Government for its use.

The third amendment which I have offered provides that naval officers may be employed on these vessels. That amendment has been accepted by the committee, and I think it improves the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Delaware yield for a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Then, the second amendment means that a company or individual to which a foreign ship has been transferred for which an American registry has been taken can not sell, even to another individual or corporation, without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the purport of the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Delaware believe that any company or individual would buy a boat under such circumstances?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was informed yesterday, as I have already stated, that there were a substantial number of vessels now flying foreign flags which would seek American registry immediately the amendments which I have offered were adopted, and that the amendments were satisfactory. Because of the source from which the information came, I think it is reliable.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, you are proposing that a purchase shall be made, but that the purchaser shall be disabled from the right everyone else has to dispose of his property; he must hold it in mortmain, if we may call it so.

Again, I call attention to another feature of this amendment. There is no definition or statement of the conditions under which the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow a transfer to be made; the right to forbid an assignment even of a share of stock is given; but no principle is laid down which shall govern the action of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, is in error in that to this extent: The amendment to which I have referred, which will come before the Senate after the one now pending, provides that the Government may take these vessels for its use, and that the vendees, whoever they may be, even if allowed to obtain a transfer from the holder of the vessel when registered, shall have such a conditional holding as that that provision shall not be void; in other words, the conditional holding means that the vessels shall not be removed from the possibility of being taken by this Government for its use. That, I think, is defined by reference also to the provisions of the old act under which the American Line steamers were originally obtained and are now operated.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, that does not diminish the obstacle at all; it makes the conditions even more onerous. Not only is the purchaser of the boat forbidden to sell, but the holder of any share of stock in a corporation owning the boat is forbidden to sell. There is, in addition, a further condition held over him—that in his hands or the hands of any purchaser from him the Government may take the vessel at any time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. At an appraised value.

Mr. BURTON. That second condition is, of course, inserted in some navigation laws, but it does not relieve the burden of the purchaser under such circumstances.

According to this amendment the corporation, individual, or partnership buying a boat must contemplate this situation—that the boat must never be disposed of except to the Government of the United States without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury. No rule is laid down under which the Secretary of the Treasury shall act in consenting or refusing——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Which, if the Senator will pardon me, means that a sale will not be authorized except to an American citizen from whom the boat may be taken by the Government. It confines the purchasers from the people who register the boat practically to American citizens. That is the object of the amendment, and I think it is sufficiently expressed.

Mr. BURTON. I can see plainly what was in the mind of the Senator—that when a boat was purchased by an American citizen or corporation and American registry was taken out, as soon as the European war or other emergency has passed it should not be immediately transferred to the country from which it was acquired or transferred to some foreign registry; but it seems to me this provision goes to an altogether unreasonable length in disabling the owner from the enjoyment of the rights that every property owner should have.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SHIVELY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has been very patient for a long while. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition whatever to prolong this discussion. Two days ago I said all that I cared to say on the general proposition; but the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], as well as the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], opens up an entirely new question, and I feel constrained to say a few words concerning that proposition.

Mr. President, this very question was before the Senate less than two months ago, in a less complicated form than it is at the present time, and it was then voted upon. On the 11th day of June, when the bill proposing to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act was under consideration, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] offered an amendment as follows:

SEC. 15. Vessels other than vessels of the United States may enter the ports of the United States and engage in the coastwise trade of the United States to the same extent and under the restrictions imposed upon vessels of the United States—

And so forth.

To that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offered this amendment:

Provided, That foreign vessels engaging in such coastwise trade shall be subject to all the laws, regulations, and rules of the United States Government pertaining to vessels of the United States in every respect as though such foreign vessels were vessels of the United States.

That amendment was accepted by the Senator from Missouri, and, after debate, the matter went to a vote. I was absent from the city, Mr. President, at that time and was paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Had I been here I should have voted against the amendment; how the Senator from New York would have voted I am not authorized to say. The yeas on that question were:

Ashurst	Cummins	Kenyon	Reed
Brady	Hitchcock	Lane	Thomas
Clapp	Jones	Martine, N. J.	Thompson

Twelve in number. The nays were:

Bankhead	Gronna	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hollis	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Hughes	Page	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	James	Perkins	Smoot
Burleigh	Johnson	Pittman	Sterling
Burton	Kern	Poindexter	Stone
Catron	La Follette	Pomerene	Sutherland
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Root	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	Lewis	Saulsbury	Townsend
Colt	Lippitt	Shafroth	Vardaman
Crawford	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Culberson	McLean	Sherman	West
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shively	White
du Pont	Myers	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Goff	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

Sixty-seven in number. So that, Mr. President, when this proposition was fairly before the Senate two months ago 12 Senators voted in favor of it and 67 voted against it.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I will say that I voted against that amendment, as appears from what the Senator has stated. I did so, however, for the reason that I did not care to entangle the proposition pending at that time with the amendment proposed, and not because as an independent proposition I was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think it wise to entangle the proposition now before the Senate by raising this question of the coastwise trade, any more than he did on the previous occasion?

Mr. President, as I said, I am not going to detain the Senate. There was a vote of the Senate, 12 in favor and 67 against the proposition; but now that an emergency arises and the administration is demanding that this emergent bill shall be passed—I do not think the country is greatly exercised over it except in spots—the opportunity is sought to destroy the coastwise legislation of this country and open practically our coastwise business to foreign ships.

I presume it will succeed; I presume it has been ordained that this opportunity shall be seized for the purpose of accomplishing what has failed heretofore. Effort after effort has been made during the last 25 years, to my knowledge, to modify in important respects, and in some respects to repeal, the coastwise laws of the United States, but it has never found more than a handful of supporters in either House of Congress.

Mr. President, I have taken a reasonably active part in the discussion of the question of an American merchant marine. I have had no personal interest in it. When John Paul Jones sailed out of the harbor of Portsmouth in command of the Ranger we had some foreign commerce in the harbor of Portsmouth and we did some shipbuilding in New Hampshire. We have not any foreign commerce there now; we do not build a ship in New Hampshire, and, so far as I know, there is not a ship of any character owned by any citizen or any corporation of my State; so that I am not representing any personal interest. I have flattered myself that I have taken a broad national view of this question, and I have endeavored to treat other questions in which my State has not been directly interested as national questions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I came into the Chamber just as the Senator from New Hampshire was reading a roll call in which I seem to have been numbered in a very small minority, and he made a suggestion that there was an identity between the question then voted upon and the question about to be voted upon. I can not quite recall the amendment upon which the roll call which he has given us was had. Will the Senator from New Hampshire repeat that part of his statement?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was during the discussion of the bill to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] offered an amendment practically wiping out the laws relating to the coastwise trade of the United States; and the same proposition now is made in a modified form to a bill that is called an emergency measure admitting foreign ships to the foreign trade of the United States under the American flag.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no resemblance between the question voted upon at the time indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire and the question that is proposed in the amendment now offered by the Senator from Washington. I have no desire, of course, to recall my vote on that; I would vote the same way again——

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the opportunity were afforded me, but the question raised in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington is simply whether foreign-built ships shall be admitted to our coastwise trade, not whether foreign ships shall be admitted to that trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator know any foreign ships that were built in the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and the Senator can not find one.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard it asserted here now half a dozen times that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington was an invasion, was a destruction of our coastwise shipping laws. I do not so understand it. It is simply an amendment that goes to the extent of allowing foreign-built ships taking American registry, governed by American law, and controlled by American regulations to engage in the coast-to-coast traffic.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think I understand that question as well as does the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Hampshire did not understand it when he asserted that there was an identity between the question voted upon in the roll call which he mentioned and the amendment now proposed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly not, but there certainly is a very striking identity, the only difference being that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri admitted all foreign vessels absolutely to our coastwise trade, while this amendment does so to a certain extent; that is the only difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. This amendment admits foreign-built ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not foreign-manned ships or foreign-officered ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will recall the fact, this is an amendment to the law which does the very thing which the Senator says it does not do.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, if I understand the amendment, it simply admits to the intercoastal trade—not to the general coastwise trade—ships that were built abroad, and that have been purchased by Americans or American corporations. It does not interfere with any other coastwise regulation, such as the officering of the ships, or the sanitation of the ships, or the crews of the ships. Am I not right about that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite sure as to that.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it seems to me it is perfectly clear that the amendment does do that exact thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it does it, exactly.

Mr. BURTON (reading):

> The President is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of domestic trade require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law confining the trade from points on the Atlantic coast to points on the Pacific coast and from points on the Pacific coast to points on the Atlantic coast to American ships.

That is, it does not limit the exception to foreign-built ships that take out American registry, but in perfectly plain English it says that "the provisions of law confining the trade from points on the Atlantic coast to points on the Pacific coast," and vice versa, to American ships, shall be suspended.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand that language, what I had in mind was this: Only American-built ships can engage in the coastwise trade; no foreign-built ships. If there is any foreign-built ship that has an American registry, it can not engage in the coastwise trade, as the law prohibits a foreign-built ship from engaging in it. The only suspension the President is authorized by the amendment to make is of the law confining the coastwise trade to American ships.

Mr. BURTON. That lets in foreign ships, then.

Mr. JONES. Why, no; because no foreign-built ship, even though it may have an American registry, can engage in the coastwise trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. It can under this proposed legislation.

Mr. BURTON. If we wanted to throw this trade open to foreign ships, doing away with the law which limits the coastwise trade to American ships, what more distinct or better language could we devise than that which the Senator has used here?

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I will resume, and will conclude in a very few moments.

Mr. JONES. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to call attention to the fact that the Senators who have just been addressing the Senate have been doing so upon an amendment which is not before the Senate. The Senator from Iowa was precisely correct when he said that the amendment before the Senate provided only for admitting to the intercoastal trade foreign-built ships which had been purchased by Americans and had American registry. That is to say, the amendment before the Senate provides that those ships may engage only in such coastwise trade as requires a passage through the Panama Canal on the particular voyage in which they have been engaged. The Senators from Ohio and Washington have been discussing another amendment entirely, which is not before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, I did not understand that there was any proposition before the Senate that a ship——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have the floor, and must insist that Senators get recognition from the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator if he desires, but I will not yield for a general colloquy when I intend to occupy only two or three minutes.

Mr. President, these technicalities do not amount to a great deal. The purpose of this is well understood and well defined in the minds of some of us. It will be the camel's head in the tent, and a considerable part of the camel's body as well, when either of these amendments shall have been agreed to. The purpose is to break down the coastwise laws of the United States and admit foreign ships to our coastwise trade. There is no doubt about that. It is in the minds of Senators. It has been asserted here over and over again. It was clearly and unmistakably asserted in the amendment that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] offered on the 11th day of June. It received the concurrence of only 12 votes in the Senate. I presume it will receive a great many more to-day, because of the fact that it is coupled with what is called an emergency measure, which, we are notified, can be opposed only if we are unpatriotic.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I do not wish to disturb the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator always.

Mr. WEST. Why do they confine it to trade from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast through the canal and not say "all coastwise trade"?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, Mr. President, the purpose is evident. There is some lumber to be transported from the Northwest, and I suppose they will get it to market a little cheaper if they can break down the coastwise laws of the United States and take the first step that will destroy every shipyard in the United States and put us absolutely at the mercy of foreign shipyards and foreign shipbuilders and foreign Governments, so far as our transportation by water is concerned. There is no doubt about it. The purpose is evident. I shall not vote for it, but I presume it will be agreed to, because this is an hysterical hour, and we are going to enact some hysterical legislation.

Now, Mr. President, what is this going to do? Why, it is going to open the ports of the State of Maine, the ports of the State of Massachusetts, of Maryland, of Pennsylvania, and of every other North Atlantic State to foreign ships trading through the Panama Canal. Do you tell me that that is not a serious matter, so far as the coastwise trade of the United States is concerned? There may be some benefit to a few men somewhere. Special legislation always benefits some individual or some corporation or some group of men; but while this may benefit a few men on Puget Sound, it sounds the death knell of the coastwise laws of the United States, and the death knell of every American shipyard, which is only kept open now by building ships for the coastwise trade and for the Government of the United States. Do not deceive yourselves, Senators. It is understood by some of us; and, in my judgment, there are some men who in due time will be called to account for the action that it is now proposed be taken on this matter.

On yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said—and he quoted a Mr. Bloedel as his authority—that there are only two ships on the Pacific coast adapted to the lumber trade and practically none on the Atlantic coast under American registry. How does Mr. Bloedel know that? The Secretary of Commerce reports to-day that there are 97 ships in the coastwise trade adapted to trans-Atlantic business. I apprehend that some of those ships can carry lumber as well as cotton and wheat and corn. There has been no effort made in this entire matter to find out whether we had American ships that could do this work. There is an outburst on the part of some sections of the country that the commerce of the United States is going to suffer unless we perform the unusual thing of calling upon foreign shipowners to come to the relief of the great Republic of the United States.

Mr. President, while I doubt very seriously the wisdom of the proposed legislation, I intend to vote for it, provided the amendment that I have been discussing is not added to the bill, but I do appeal to Senators, not in the interest of the State of Washington or the State of Oregon alone, but in the interest of the great commercial and industrial States of this country, not to strike down the laws relating to our coastwise trade.

Mr. President, I have performed my duty. I do not know that I shall say another word on this subject. Let it go to a vote; let this disastrous legislation be enacted; and then let the American people settle the question at a later day.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, from the moment the present crisis confronted our foreign commerce it has been clear to me that whatever may be done in the future our immediate efforts should be directed persistently to the relief of our deep-sea marine; that the nature of the crisis makes this subject the paramount and controlling consideration; that the emergency is too great to allow time to rely on or mature schemes of experimental naval adventure in the carrying trade or mix up and confuse the subject with the interests and attitude of the coastwise marine.

This does not mean that I am opposed on principle to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. His amendment applies to intercoastal trade—that is, to trade between a port on the Pacific coast and a port on the Atlantic coast and between a port on the Atlantic and a port on the Pacific, as distinguished from trade from port to port on either coast. While, of course, this intercoastal traffic is domestic commerce, it partakes of the physical aspects and environment of the sea-carrying trade in foreign commerce. On the facts stated by the Senators from the Pacific coast as to present conditions of traffic there, the reasons which make action on the main question imperative become strongly persuasive in favor of the proposed amendment.

But the Senator who proposed the amendment must have noted the instant alarm sounded from certain quarters. That alarm was voiced by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. At once came the classic reference to the "camel's nose." The amendment is regarded by the alarmists as an entering wedge to free ships in the general coastwise trade. This possibility arouses and inflames the cupidity of that powerful interest which for over a hundred years has enjoyed an iron-bound, steel-riveted monopoly in ship construction and ship operation in that trade. Through all these years this interest has steadily fought all movements toward free ships in the over-seas trade. With the total loss of the deep-sea shipbuilding industry to the country and the disappearance of our deep-sea marine under the fatal policy of exclusion the last pretext for opposition by this interest to free ships in our foreign trade was gone, and yet it persisted. In the present crisis the necessity for ships under the flag of the United States to move our foreign commerce is so overwhelming as to silence that opposition and arouse its fear lest in the general revolt against restriction its coastwise monopoly may be broken. Certain it is that if our general coastwise marine is ever thrown open to ships of foreign construction the chief contributor to this end will have been that short-sighted selfishness that well-nigh banished the flag of the country from commerce on the ocean and took deep-sea shipbuilding out of the category of American industries. But whatever may be the developments of the future, so immediately vital do I regard the main feature of the proposed legislation to our foreign commerce and domestic industry at this moment that I shall support amendments otherwise meritorious only when convinced that they will not endanger the early passage of the bill.

Moreover, Mr. President, I must be permitted to doubt the expediency of a part of the amendment presented by my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. Not that I regard the amendment as endangering the passage of the bill, but as tending to render the bill nugatory when it does pass. I refer to the clause affixing a servitude to the control of the ship, and conditions to its subsequent sale and transfer. The good intention of the author of the amendment is defeated if the clause repels the citizen from investing in the ship. The clause involves a limitation on his property in the ship, a restraint on his title, a red-tape entanglement with the Government in the operation of the ship. The restriction is too much of a kind with that body of regulations that regulated our merchant marine off the sea. Just at a time when we are trying to liberalize our navigation code in the interest of our foreign carrying trade is not a good time to incorporate clauses that must inevitably beat back the forces on which we must rely to revive and restore that trade. For this reason I shall oppose that clause of the amendment.

Passing from these amendments I draw on the indulgence of the Senate while I briefly recall certain chapters of history bearing directly on the main question. We hear hope expressed on all sides that there may be an early restoration of our merchant marine. I heard the same hope expressed with equal earnestness 25 years ago in the House of Representatives, and have witnessed the efforts made to realize on this hope within the time of my service in the Senate. For over 50 years resort has been had from time to time to subsidies in form of extra mail payments, and to-day under the Revised Statutes and under the contract act of 1891 we are paying over 100 per cent more for the transportation of mails in American vessels than we pay for like service in foreign vessels.

Despite this, the saddest spectacle that confronts the American traveler in his journey around the earth is the sight in the great seaports of the world of the flags of about all countries save that of his own. And when the clouds and fogs of sophistry and fiction with which a narrow and mistaken self-interest has enveloped the subject shall have been dispelled by an enlightened policy, the chief wonder of the impartial historian will be that at the end of the long struggle even the present slender remnant of our once powerful merchant marine should have survived.

In approaching a remedy the most natural inquiry goes to the question of the origin, nature, and effect of that code of restrictions and regulations in force through the period of decline. The chief features of our navigation code are not of American origin. They were taken bodily from the British code which harked back to the days of Richard II, and which in the middle of the last century Great Britain herself tore up root and branch and cast away. When the Federal Constitutional Convention assembled, a clear majority of that body was determined to put up bars against that code by inserting in the new Constitution a prohibition against the enactment by Congress of navigation laws except by a two-thirds vote. This was in accordance with the spirit of the Revolution, which had indicted George III for "cutting off our commerce with all parts of the world." The Middle and Southern States, in memory of the hardships they had suffered from the restrictive system, were especially set on limiting the power to ingraft it on American policy.

But as the days passed in the convention, other interests also developed and new factors were thrust into the problem. George Mason and James Madison led the Virginia delegation in a determined effort to incorporate a provision to abolish the slave trade and have such abolition go into effect with the adoption of the Constitution. The South Carolina delegation and certain other forces from the South were opposed to the immediate abolition of the slave trade. Meanwhile New England was profitably engaged in importing molasses from the West Indies, distilling the molasses into rum, trading the rum for darkies on the coast of Africa, and selling the darkies in the slave markets of Charleston and other southern ports. Besides, New England had made substantial progress in ship construction and in the navigation art, and planned to engross the merchant marine of the young and growing Republic.

With all these elements present, the situation in the convention became ripe for negotiation, log-rolling, compromise and bargain. The upshot was a coalition of molasses, rum, shipping and slavery. The specific products of that coalition were the incorporation in the Constitution of the clause postponing the abolition of the slave trade for 20 years and the exclusion from the Constitution of the proposed restriction on navigation legislation.

The door being thus kept open, a long series of provisions from the British navigation code were enacted into law between the years 1790 and 1820. Because of the exasperating hostility to our ocean commerce of Great Britain in the late years of the eighteenth and early years of the nineteenth centuries, and her final exclusion of our merchant marine from the West Indies trade, these enactments were acquiesced in at the time as fancied weapons of retaliation drawn from her own armory.

The keystone of the British code was denial to the British subject of registration for any ship not built in a British shipyard. This provision, paraphrased so as to deny to the American citizen United States registry of any ship not built in an American shipyard, was enacted by Congress in 1792 and is to-day section 4132 of our Revised Statutes, except as that section was modified by the five-year limitation in the Panama Canal act of 1912.

Under another section, if an American ship on its voyage abroad meets with an accident that requires the owner to take the ship to the nearest foreign shipyard for repairs, the owner must pay into the United States Treasury a sum equal to one-half the cost of the work and material in the repairs or lose the registry of his ship as an American vessel. Under another section of this imported code, if an American citizen purchases a foreign ship wrecked on our coast and takes it into an American port for repairs, he must prove that the repairs constitute three-fourths of the cost of the ship or be denied registry for the ship. By another section, though the ship is built in an American shipyard for an American citizen and receives registry, if the citizen sells it to a foreigner and subsequently repurchases the ship, he is denied renewal of registry for his property if in the meantime any change has been made in the build or style of the ship. Such are a few illustrations from scores that could be cited showing the tenor and spirit of the code. They disclose how, at every point, the vast and commanding interests of our foreign commerce and merchant marine were sacrificed to the narrower interest of the deep-sea shipyard and, as will appear, were sacrificed without gain to the shipbuilder.

Despite this code, through the first 60 years of our national history our merchant marine grew in strength and magnitude. It is nearer correct to say that it grew without reference to the code. Why do I say this? Those were the days of the wooden ship. The country that makes the best tool of the trade for the price is bound to take the market where the market is free, and in no field do superiority in the tool and superior efficiency in using it tell with more force than in that of the ocean-carrying trade. In this country there was an unlimited and convenient supply of timber and all other materials that went into the construction of the wooden ship. Even in colonial days Americans had developed unrivaled aptitude and efficiency both in ship construction and in the navigation art. With the natural advantages of abundant and cheap material and the acquired superiority in ship construction and navigation, our American shipyards and merchant marine steadily gained on their competitors. In the middle of the last century the United States had come abreast with Great Britain and had distanced all other rivals for supremacy on the high seas. The American flag was on every ocean and in every port.

Then it was that Great Britain felt the deadly pinch of her navigation code. She was losing in the struggle for the world's carrying trade to the rival that made and operated the cheaper and superior ships. Her navigation code denied to her subject access to the best tool of his trade. What did Great Britain do? Did she cling to her code and sacrifice her merchant marine? She chose her merchant marine, and did the only thing she could do to save it. She did what we, in a measure, propose to do here. In 1849 she repudiated and repealed her navigation code and enfranchised her subjects with the right to purchase ships wherever built, bring them home, have them admitted to registry, and operate them under the British flag.

Was that repeal accomplished without a struggle? Quite the contrary. It came at the end of a prolonged and embittered agitation. A terrific roar went up from the shipbuilders. The thousands of workmen from the shipyards of Great Britain were dragooned into laying their remonstrances before Parliament. Thousands of allied business organizations protested against the repeal. Disraeli led the opposition in Parliament with a torrent of pathetic eloquence and withering sarcasm. He prophesied desolation of the shipbuilding industry and destruction of the merchant marine. He even predicted that the repeal involved the dissolution of what he called the "empire foreshadowed by the genius of a Blake and consecrated by the blood of a Nelson."

But all to no avail. The statesmen behind the repeal had correctly diagnosed the disease. They went forward with the remedy. Following the repeal, British seamen and business men flocked to the shipyards of the United States and replenished their merchant marine from the finest wooden clippers that ever sailed the ocean. Great Britain became the home of these ships. Her shipyards got the repairing. The laborers found the tenure of their employment more secure and their wage improving. Within two years after the repeal the last note of opposition had been silenced, and neither Disraeli nor any other British statesman was heard to suggest the restoration of the navigation code.

For several years after the repeal of the British code the American shipyards went forward, building ships for our increasing merchant marine and supplying ships on foreign account. In 1855 one-third of the deep-sea marine of the world was under the American flag, one-third under the British flag, and the remaining one-third in varying shares under the flags of other nations. When the better ship could be purchased for less money in this country than abroad there was neither necessity nor temptation to purchase abroad, and the code that denied registration to a foreign-built ship could neither help nor hinder the progress of our merchant marine.

But, Mr. President, then came the fateful day of the iron ship and the demonstration of the marvelous capacity for mischief in our navigation code. Great Britain for years had been studying and perfecting iron-ship construction. She had a convenient abundance of iron ore, coal, and limestone, the raw materials of iron construction. The iron ship proved to be the superior ship. The shipbuilders of Great Britain at once reconstructed their plants and adapted their art to building the improved vessels of commerce. They quickly shifted to the iron ship and the screw propeller. The American shipbuilder clung to the wooden ship and the paddle wheel. He refused to adjust himself to the new construction and to supply the American citizen with the new and better tools of the trade. The code denied to the American citizen registry of an iron ship purchased abroad. Between the impossibility of securing an iron ship from an American shipyard and the impossibility of securing registration for an iron ship made in any other shipyard the process of strangulation of our merchant marine was on.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana how he accounts for it that under the same law the American merchant marine flourished as long as ships were made of wood and decayed when they commenced making ships of iron? Is not this country rich in the raw material, and could not the country have accommodated itself to the change of material under existing law?

Mr. SHIVELY. When the American wooden ship was the cheapest and best ship in ocean commerce our merchant marine flourished, because it had access to the best tool of the trade. In the presence of this natural superiority the harsh restrictions in the existing law were ineffective for good or ill. When the superior iron ship came into ocean commerce the existing law, which denied to the American seaman access to that superior tool of his trade, became effective in retiring that seaman from ocean commerce. However abundant in this country the raw material of the new construction, the American shipbuilder did not avail himself of it.

Under these circumstances the effect of the existing law on our merchant marine was precisely the same as if such abundance had not existed. In the day of our superior wooden ship our navigation code was inconsequential to our merchant marine. In the day of that ship the like British code became disastrously consequential to British merchant marine. In the day of the wooden ship the British code, by barring our superior ship from British merchant marine, gave our own merchant marine the advantage. With the coming of the iron ship our code, which barred the superior iron ship from our merchant marine, gave British merchant marine the advantage.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that what I am at a loss to understand is how it was that America flourished in the shipbuilding as long as it made superior wooden tools and failed as soon as the iron ship prevailed. I would assume that the United States, with its great deposits of iron, ought to be able to keep up with any other country in the construction of iron ships.

Mr. SHIVELY. The fact that the American shipbuilder did not change to the new construction with the transition from wood to iron is far more significant in connection with the effect of our navigation code than are the reasons why he did not so change. His failure to change set in full operation the strangling effect of the code. As for the reasons, the British shipbuilder had been losing in his competition with the American shipyard in wood construction and eagerly welcomed the change to iron, which brought to his door in abundance the raw materials of his industry. The American shipbuilder had been triumphantly successful in wood construction and clung in abiding faith to the wooden ship and the paddle wheel, the raw materials of which were still profusely abundant at his door. He was selling tonnage against the competition of the whole outside world. His clippers were leading the prize fleets in merchant marine on every sea.

The habit of wood construction was strong on him. However abundant and convenient to him the raw materials of the new construction, his pride, his fortune, his successes were associated with the old. He refused to reconstruct his plant or admit the assured ascendency of the iron ship and screw propeller. Above all, he fell under the fatal delusion that the provision of the code that denied registration to the superior ship and its admission to our merchant marine, except it came out of his shipyard, rendered his future secure. The code could deny the citizen admission to our merchant marine, except that he go in with an inferior tool of his trade, but the code could not compel him to embark in or to remain in that merchant marine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have been very much interested by the Senator's address. He seems to have a grasp of this situation that is very great. I want to ask him whether it is true, as I have heard, that, on account of the development of our iron and steel industry, we will again become the cheapest market in the world for the construction of steel products, and that thereby we will get the returns of the merchant marine of the world by reason of the cheap construction which is promised by reason of the development of our iron and steel industry?

Mr. SHIVELY. I am approaching the question the Senator raises. I shall discuss it before I close. But let me assure the Senator now that I do not share in the gloomy view entertained in some quarters as to the future of our merchant marine. I have never been more hopeful of that future than at this hour. The crisis upon us is compelling a closer examination of the causes of the decline and presenting an unusual opportunity for intelligent action to encourage and secure its restoration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right in saying that in the days of wooden ships we excelled all the nations of the world in shipbuilding. The clipper ships of New England had no equal in those days, and never have had an equal in the history of the world. The Senator says, however, that when the iron and steel ship came in we rested on our oars and allowed foreign nations to build those ships, and we did not do anything in that line. Let us admit that we were careless about that matter. I think the Senator rather exaggerates it, unintentionally of course; but, admit that we were careless about it, is there any reason, in the Senator's mind, aside from the fact that we can not navigate our ships as cheaply as foreign countries can and that they are giving greater governmental aid to their ships than we are, why our people should not build those steel ships now? We do not do it, but we certainly have caught up with the other nations now in all the arts and crafts and in the matter of shipbuilding as well as everything else.

Mr. SHIVELY. My prediction is that there will be a revival both of our merchant marine and our deep-sea shipbuilding industry. The start toward recovery of the ocean-carrying trade will precede rather than follow the renewal of activities in American shipbuilding for that trade. The Senator knows that not a dollar of American capital is being employed to-day in building ships for our foreign trade. Not a dollar of wages is being paid to labor for ship construction for that trade. In the present emergency the case would be hopeless were we required to depend on a supply of deep-sea vessels from our shipyards. The immediate crisis would be over before a single ship could be furnished. Nor do I consider that subsidy is a factor in the problem, nor that the relative cost of operating the ship is either as marked or as consequential as the Senator claims. There would be at first a practical difficulty which the Senator well understands. The shipbuilder in the country with a flourishing merchant marine has standardized construction. He builds 6, 8, 10, or more ships of like type and capacity at the same time. Building at wholesale rather than at retail, he has the advantage of this economy in construction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is correct in saying that the fact that foreign governments standardize their ships and build a large number of the same type——

Mr. SHIVELY. I am not saying "foreign governments," or if I did, I should not have said it. I mean the foreign shipbuilder.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I meant; I did not mean the Governments themselves, but I referred to foreign shipyards which are standardizing their ships and build 6 or 8 or 10 or perhaps 12 of the same type, and in that way build them very much more cheaply than in this country. That has been dwelt upon in all of our discussions, and until we can get a sufficient business in that line to enable us to resort to standardization we are, of course, handicapped in that respect as well as in many other respects. That is true.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, because I know that the persistent assertion of erroneous and fictitious reasons for the decay of our merchant marine and the disappearance of the American flag from the ocean has beclouded the subject and postponed the revival and restoration, I am emphasizing the true reason. The decline did not begin with the repeal of the preferential tariff rates on merchandise imported in American bottoms. The preferential tariff was one of the paper expedients of that system of mutual restriction and obstruction born of the Napoleonic wars which convulsed Europe in the early years of the last century and which projected their operations over ocean commerce. By provoking retaliation abroad the preferential tariff can easily kill more export cargo than it encourages import cargo. Our merchant marine reached its highest point of prosperity long after the preferential tariffs had been abandoned.

Nor did the decline begin with the ravages of the Civil War. We carried a larger percentage of our foreign commerce in American bottoms and built more ship tonnage both for our own and for foreign merchant marine in the year 1855 than in the year 1860. In 1855 the proportion of our foreign commerce carried in American bottoms was 75⅔ per cent. In 1860 the proportion had fallen to 66½ per cent. For the year 1855 the production of ship tonnage of all kinds in American yards rose to 583,450 tons, the highest for any one year in our history. In 1860 this production had fallen to 212,892 tons, a loss in five years of over 50 per cent. In 1855 our sales of American ships on foreign account reached 65,000 tons; in 1860 these sales had fallen to 17,000 tons.

These figures are inseparably associated with the advent of the iron ship. They tell the story of an agency more destructive to our merchant marine than the Alabama, the Shenandoah, the Florida, and other Confederate craft in the days of the Civil War. Was the iron ship the real agency of the decline? Certainly not. The real agency was the navigation code which prevented the American seaman from meeting the iron ship with an iron ship. With the advent of the iron ship nothing could save American shipbuilding for deep-sea marine but a ready and successful shift to the new construction. It was the code that tied our merchant marine to the American shipyard and sacrificed the one to the mistaken policy of the other.

For it must be kept in mind, Mr. President, that merchant marine is the more general, the superior, the paramount interest. This truth is now coming home to the American people. Shipbuilding is an important but still the more local and secondary interest. The policy that sacrifices the superior interest destroys the secondary interest. The policy that preserves the superior interest in the end saves and serves the secondary interest. When in 1849 Great Britain found herself losing to her American rival with the superior ship, she recognized her merchant marine as the superior interest, repealed her navigation code, replenished that merchant marine from the best vessels the world could supply, and by this means saved her merchant marine and with it the future prosperity of her shipyards. When from 1855 forward the United States was losing in the contest for the ocean-carrying trade to her great rival with the superior ship, she refused to recognize in that trade the paramount interest, yielded to the clamor from the secondary interest, declined to modify her navigation code, and thereby lost her merchant marine and with it the shipbuilding interest dependent upon it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not a fact, however, that iron ship construction did not commence until after 1860? And is it not a further fact that possibly the hand of the Steel Trust has been on the throat of the Ship Trust and has kept it from doing what it might have done?

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIVELY. I desire to conclude my remarks. What is the question the Senator from Georgia desires to ask?

Mr. WEST. I want to ask the Senator from Indiana a question for information. I see he is thoroughly familiar with the matter of ship construction, and it would be a great satisfaction to me, at least, to have my question answered. A different solution has been suggested to me of this matter. I think our wonderful enterprises here, the great facilities for production in our industries, our wonderful potentialities and possibilities, the increasing of the wages of labor here to such an extent that we can not compete with the cheaper labor of foreign countries, afford a reason why to a large extent we are losing our shipbuilding trade.

Mr. SHIVELY. In reply to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE], let me observe that the iron ship had been in process of experiment and improvement for years prior to 1856; but it was in that year that it appeared in active, general, and successful competition in ocean commerce. That, of course, was before the day of the Steel Trust. It should be added that at that time England had attained high development in the general iron and steel industry, a fact doubtless that also influenced the American shipbuilder in his adherence to wood construction, though the fact only rendered such adherence the more fatal in so far as it applied to construction for the over-seas trade.

Replying to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST], I do not overlook nor underestimate the considerations with which he points his question; yet I note with interest the fact that his question relates to shipbuilding and not to our merchant marine. Whatever caused the failure of the American shipbuilder to construct the iron ship, such failure proved disastrous to our ocean merchant marine only because the navigation code prevented the American seaman procuring abroad the ship that was denied him at home.

But to answer within the scope of the Senator's question, I remind the Senator that from the advent of the iron ship the shipbuilding industry for ocean commerce was inseparably bound up with the general iron and steel industry of the country. I have shown that because of the failure of our shipbuilders to shift to iron construction the demand for tonnage from their yards fell off over 50 per cent between the years 1855 and 1860. Within a few years thereafter was revived and applied that principle of customhouse taxation which gave the domestic iron and steel industry almost as complete a monopoly of the domestic market as the navigation code gave the domestic shipbuilder for the American coastwise and deep-sea marine.

The effect of this principle, like that of the navigation code, was to protect old methods and wasteful processes in production. When the law made their market secure against outside competition they clung to the old ways. Not until near the year 1890 was the policy of sending to the scrap heap obsolete plants, discarding ancient processes, and reducing to a minimum the first cost of a ton of iron or steel entered on in the United States.

With the artificial restriction against competition in force the reduction in cost to the domestic producer did not mean a proportionate reduction in price to the domestic consumer. When, from the margin between the low cost produced by skill and invention on the one hand and the high price protected by the favor of government on the other, one citizen walked off at the end of a few years with a fortune of over $400,000,000 and two others, through the medium of iron and steel, transmuted the same favor of government from nothing into control and ownership of one of the great railway systems of the country, it is obvious that the temptation may not have been strong to invest in ship construction that must meet the competition of the world on the high seas. But it is equally obvious that the wages of labor are indexed in the first cost rather than in the selling price of iron and steel, and that the influence of the American scale of wages has been made a grossly exaggerated factor in the problem of ship construction for our ocean carrying trade.

It is no defense of our navigation code in its relation to deep-sea marine to point to the magnitude of our domestic shipbuilding for the domestic river, lake, and coastwise marine and the magnitude of that marine. The power of government can follow the coastwise ship. The code can and does deny the citizen the use of any ship whatever in that marine except it come from a domestic shipyard. It insures a perfect monopoly of ship construction for this trade and ship operation in this trade.

Whether the exactions of this monopoly be great or small, the citizen is helpless to escape them. The Government can compel this condition because it has jurisdiction over our coast and inland waterways. The power of government can not follow deep-sea ships from our shipyards onto the ocean and compel either the citizen or the foreigner to patronize them in the ocean carrying trade. In that field world-wide competition and not the code determines what ships shall carry the cargoes. The country that does not meet this environment can have no place in over-ocean marine.

Now, Mr. President, in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and in further answer to other questions bearing on the American cost of construction and cost of operation of ships for and in the ocean carrying trade, I invite attention to a series of facts. At the end of the first half of our national history our American shipyards led the world in ship construction and our merchant marine equaled that of its chief competitor on the ocean. That was American labor and American capital in successful competition in both construction and operation of American ships.

For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, the United States sent into the markets of the world over $2,400,000,000 worth of the products of her industries. Of these, over $1,100,000,000 worth were manufactures of various forms. All were the products of American capital and labor, and as such took the markets of the world against all competition. This fact is compelling on the question of capacity to compete.

Of these exportations for that year, over $305,000,000 worth was iron and steel and manufactures of iron and steel. The major part of this export was high-class machinery and fine steel tools representing iron and steel carried forward to the line of ultimate use and consumption. This was American labor and capital in successful competition not only in the neutral markets of the world, but in a vast number of instances it was laying the products down in the shadow of the foreign furnace, mill, and factory. Will it be claimed that the iron and steel industry which produces all these cargoes of exports in successful competition with world's market is unable to produce in successful competition the steel bottoms which carry the cargoes to that market?

Each year over one-half of the entire iron and steel output of the world is being produced in the United States. There is no place left where a ton of iron or steel is produced cheaper than in the United States. This cost comprehends the capital invested and the labor employed, and answers all questions as to capacity to compete in the production and supply of the raw materials of modern ship construction.

Within the next few days there will be launched the two Argentine battleships built from American shipyards. These ships cost approximately $11,000,000 each. One was built by the New York Shipbuilding Company and the other by the Fore River Company. The contracts for their construction were taken in open competition with the outside world. Are our shipyards able to compete in the construction of battleships for foreign nations, and yet unable to compete in the construction of merchant vesels for our own foreign carrying trade?

That country of Europe which has the highest general wage level leads the world in merchant marine. The maritime country of Europe which has the lowest general wage level is at the bottom of the list of European merchant marine. These facts are incontestible; but how do they comport with the contentions in this Chamber that the high level of American wages is the barrier to the successful operation of an American ship?

The foreign and domestic shipping papers on file in the Bureau of Navigation and the unchallenged testimony of sailors before the Merchant Marine Commission in 1904 show that, as between ships of like type and cargo capacity, the American vessel ships with the smallest crew of any ship in the world. More work is required of each man. This fact is known to the sailor in whatever port he may be and figures in his wages when he signs up for service. Yet the difference in wages based on an equal difference in the burden of service is claimed in this debate as a difference in the cost of operating the ship.

It was the concurrent testimony of both masters and sailors before the Merchant Marine Commission in 1904 that in the ocean carrying trade there is no such thing as a national scale of wages. There is only what is called "port wages" or the "wage of the port." There are New York wages, San Francisco wages, Liverpool wages, Hamburg wages, Hongkong wages, but no such thing as a standard of British, German, or American wages. The wage depends on conditions in the port. The difference in wages between New York and San Francisco is often greater than the difference between New York and Hongkong.

These facts, Mr. President, show how frail is the basis for the statement frequently heard in this Chamber that the cost of construction and operation of American ships is from 25 to 50 per cent greater than the cost in foreign countries. This is one of the myths employed to induce reliance on those artificial expedients so potential in starting our merchant marine on its decline and so futile to save or revive it. The navigation code deprived the American seaman of access to the best tool of his trade and drove him from the ocean. Twin in mischievous character were the artificial devices which encouraged and protected slothful methods in the production of the materials of modern ship construction. Even as late as in 1892, on their return from a visit to the principal rolling mills of this country, certain representatives of European iron and steel industries stated that they would be delighted to accept as a maximum profit in their industry a per cent equal to the waste about American plants. But improvement has been going forward until many departments of our domestic iron and steel industry show as great superiority in competing capacity as did our wooden-ship builder at the zenith of his prosperity. It was not the American wage scale that arrested construction for or operation in our merchant marine, nor is this wage scale the obstacle to the restoration of that marine.

The great agency of the decline and the obstacle to the recovery is the feudalisms of our navigation code. The United States is the only maritime nation in the world that clings to this medieval system of restriction. Every other nation allows the citizen or subject to procure a ship wherever the best bargain offers and put the ship under its register and its flag. In this country the code was born of a sordid coalition. It is the bad progeny of blind cupidity and a troubled time. The slave trade has gone. Slavery itself disappeared a half century ago. Vast progress has been made in the physical sciences and mechanic arts. Steam and electricity have well-nigh abolished time and space from human calculations and brought the nations of the earth face to face. The barbarisms of our navigation code remain to remind us of ancient follies and a darker age, and of how effective they are to plague us in the present crisis in our foreign trade.

Of course there have been several humane police regulations engrafted on this body of laws which no one would seriously change. There is room for the exertion of the great economic power of this Republic within the jurisdictional limit of its waters to raise the standard in ocean commerce and render the life of the sailor more tolerable. But the immediate task confronting us is to so liberalize the code as to open the way to replenish our merchant marine. It is an evidence of the strong sea instinct surviving in this country that millions of dollars' worth of American capital is to-day invested in deep-sea marine, though the ships, being denied American registry, are flying foreign flags. It is to be hoped these vessels and many others may be brought under American registry. The deep-sea shipyard has nothing to lose by this legislation, and, I venture to say, much to gain. Certain it is that if this bill results in the revival of our merchant marine, the shipyard will be the gainer. Wherever built or from whomever purchased, the United States becomes the home of the ship. Our seacoast shipyards will become the beneficiaries of the repair demands. The item of repairs is more profitable than original construction. With the revival and growth of deep-sea marine, original construction for this service will follow.

Mr. President, I have made no pretense at a general discussion of the subject of our merchant marine. It has been my purpose to confine my remarks to the narrow compass of the effect on that merchant marine of those few lines in our navigation code which the pending bill is designed to repeal. However meager may be its relaxation of the harsh provisions of the code, the bill is a move of enlightened policy and promises a better day for both our ocean merchant marine and our shipbuilding for that marine.

During the delivery of Mr. SHIVELY's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. SHIVELY's speech,

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words regarding the amendment which I offered yesterday, and which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to provide for the purchase or for the construction in private shipyards or in the shipyards of the United States of 30 vessels suitable for the Navy as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, colliers, scouts, dispatch boats, and so forth, useful in time of war—in fact, absolutely indispensable in time of war—in aid of the fighting ships, and to be used in times of peace in the promotion of commerce and in the carrying of the mails.

The amendment provides for an appropriation of $30,000,000, of which amount $6,000,000 is to be spent annually during the next five years in the construction or purchase of these ships. I am inclined to think that it would be advisable to make this whole sum immediately available for this purpose, as there is a great emergency upon us and a demand for transportation unequaled perhaps in our history. The facilities for transportation are paralyzed by reason of the fact that the great maritime nations of the world are now engaged in war with each other, and that war means either the destruction of much of their merchant marine now utilized by us or its withdrawal from commerce for the uses of war.

Mr. President, this amendment is on the lines of a bill which I introduced some seven or eight years ago when the Republican Party was in power and when it was urging a measure of subsidy intended to promote our merchant marine. The proposal at that time, a modified proposal of a much larger scheme, contemplated the opening up, if my recollection is right, of seven or eight routes of commerce to the eastern and western coast of South America, the coast of Africa, and to Australia, and provided for a subsidy, running over a period of 10 years, aggregating about $30,000,000. As a substitute for that proposal I suggested that the United States, instead of subsidizing the construction of ships by private owners and spending during a period of 10 years about $30,000,000 for that service, should itself construct the necessary ships for these new routes of commerce; that it could construct them as a part of the auxiliary navy, so absolutely essential to a well-proportioned navy and without which in case of war our fighting ships would be derelict upon the ocean.

I insisted that we could sustain this measure merely as a matter of national defense, and that we could make these ships compensatory and even remunerative to the United States during periods of peace by providing that they should be used in the peaceful pursuits of commerce under lease to shipping companies, and stipulations regarding the maintenance of a naval reserve as a part of their force, so that they would constitute a training school for the reinforcement of the fighting ships.

The dominant party, intent upon subsidy, rejected that proposal, and their proposal was finally defeated by a narrow margin, so that we have been unable to increase our merchant marine either by subsidy or by the construction of a part of it as an auxiliary navy.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to meet the present emergency, which is a most serious one, one of the most serious with which the United States has ever been confronted in its commerce, by admitting foreign ships to American registry, and that will doubtless be accompanied by some provision that at least a majority of the ownership of such ships shall be in American citizens. Foreign nations engaged in war with each other would doubtless resent a movement which would be a mere cloak for the protection of the investment of a belligerent in the merchant marine of a neutral, and which would make the United States serviceable in saving the marine of one belligerent from the armed forces of another belligerent. They will doubtless demand that there shall be something in the transfer of the registry and something genuine in the ownership and control of these ships by American citizens and American corporations, or we will be involved in far-reaching complications abroad on this subject.

I believe, Mr. President, that the process of transfer from foreign to American registry will be a slow one; first, because the country has been for some time in a depressed industrial condition, which has been aggravated by the disarrangement of the commerce of the world. Capital, always timid, is particularly timid at such times, and I fear that American citizens will not meet this emergency with the promptitude and courage that is required. I believe that this is the time above all others for the Government, in the pursuit of a strictly governmental purpose of national defense and in the construction of an auxiliary navy that will make our fighting ships a well-proportioned force for national defense, to accompany that national purpose with action which will meet the present emergency.

I can imagine nothing that would give greater immediate confidence to the business and the commerce of the country than to know that the Secretary of the Navy was authorized now to purchase 30 ships of 10,000 tons capacity, which he could get for about $1,000,000 each—if my recollection is right—and I believe that the ships if secured immediately would reestablish the currents of trade and of commerce between this country and foreign countries.

Whilst my amendment gives the Secretary of the Navy power to purchase or to secure the building of these ships, I think it would be advisable to add to the amendment a provision such as was contained in the original bill which I presented some years ago; that is to say, a provision constituting the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General a board for the purpose of shaping the administration of these ships in times of peace for purposes of commerce and the carrying of the mails. Such a board would be useful. The large experience of the Secretary of Commerce and the Postmaster General and their respective forces in the matter of the transportation of mails and the carriage of goods would be of service to the Secretary of the Navy, not only in the work of administration of these vessels in time of peace, but in the work of so constructing the vessels as to enable them to meet the demands of both war and peace.

I hope the chairman of the committee may find it expedient to accept this amendment.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the thoughts advanced by the Senator from Nevada and shall most cordially support such an amendment. It was encompassed very largely, I feel, by the concurrent resolution I offered day before yesterday anticipating the same result.

That the need exists there is no question or doubt in my mind. I believe it would be the most popular measure to-day before the people.

On the line of the thoughts advanced by the Senator, I have in my hand a clipping I took from the New York American of yesterday, the headlines of which are as follows:

Two billions of foreign trade await business awakening of United States—Opportunity, not of a lifetime, but of a century, is now this country's—Powerful commercial fleet needed to handle the business that will soon be ours—Great impending naval battle is bound to open the ocean.

There is no doubt about the exigency in which we are placed. The process of inviting some foreign vessel, foreign-owned, foreign-built, and foreign-manned, under some special favor of ours, to come and take up this commerce is only a makeshift; and, more than that, I feel that it is a crime.

This is the opportunity of a century. We have been anticipating and hoping and praying for an American merchant marine, and I believe this is the opportunity. I believe the step proposed by the Senator from Nevada will do very much in that direction. I trust the amendment may receive the attention that I believe it merits at this particular time, and I trust it may be adopted.

As to the proposition to grant American register under the provisions contained in the committee bill and the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, I fear that too many European craft will come over here, avail themselves of the opportunity to get an American register, sail under the American flag for six months or a year or as long as this horrid exigency shall last, and then retransfer and go back again. If the men on the other side, under the proposed bill, desire to come to this country and engage in ocean commerce from our ports and this land of plenty, I do not want to have them do so only to fill a gap for the little while the war may last, or for the long time the war may last. I desire that when they take out an American register there shall be some provision in the bond that shall prohibit them from retransfer for a period of at least 10 years, and then only with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I had thought to insert in the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, on page 7, at the end of section 4, the following:

But in no case shall any ship which has been granted an American register retransfer such register or relinquish the same for a period of 10 years from the date of the register granted by the United States, and then only by and with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I want something in this crisis and this opportunity that shall not be temporary, but that shall look to building up and holding a merchant marine of our own. Let it come now in this hour of need and necessity. I trust that it may have the support of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I earnestly favor this emergency legislation. There is a demand that we should have ships to take the place of the ships that have been withdrawn from our foreign commerce. The great business needs of this country demand it. It is urgent. We should not delay in enacting this legislation.

The committee have prepared legislation that will take care of our foreign trade and over-seas trade, which now has fallen down on account of a lack of transportation. The committee were wise in doing this. I commend them for the quick and efficient legislation they have reported.

In order that this legislation may be quickly passed and relief given to our stagnation in business, it seems to me the wise course to pursue is not to amend this bill. We have been here for nearly a week discussing a change of the laws pertaining to ships engaged in our coastwise trade. It seems to me that is unwise. This is emergency legislation. As for myself, I shall vote for this measure to give prompt, quick, and efficient relief. The other questions that have been precipitated into this debate can well wait until they arise later.

Consequently I rise simply to state how I shall vote. I shall vote against the amendments to the bill, except the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], which is an act of charity, an act of mercy and of relief by the Red Cross to all parts of the world engaged at present in war. I think it would be unwise to amend this bill otherwise at this time. I think it would result in delay. I think it would result in having our harbors still filled up with our wheat, corn, oats, cotton, and tobacco, which need transportation and an opportunity to get to the foreign markets.

With this view I shall vote for the bill so wisely reported by the committee, but shall vote against amendments, as I am satisfied that they would result in delay of the relief we need now—at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but before doing that I wish to put in the RECORD a document.

On yesterday I asserted that any American citizen was at liberty to purchase a foreign-built ship anywhere in the world where he could buy one, and if the transaction was a bona fide one he was entitled to have the flag of the United States hoisted over the vessel, and that gave him the right to the protection of this Government in his property in the vessel. I further stated that that vessel could trade in any port in the world except in the ports of our own country. In all of those statements, which were challenged by some Senators, I was absolutely correct in my statement of the law. In giving the reasons why the vessels could not trade in American ports I was somewhat inaccurate, having misunderstood a statement made by the Commissioner of Navigation before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

I was correct in the statement that it could not trade in an American port, but I was not correct in the reason which I gave for it. The real reason why it can not trade in an American port is because, under the law which has obtained in this country for nearly 100 years, such a vessel as that entering any American port with merchandise is subject to seizure and its cargo to confiscation. If it enters in ballast, or with only passengers on board, it is subject to a very heavy discriminatory duty.

Mr. President, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks made on yesterday, the regulations promulgated by the Department of State for the guidance of American consuls abroad with reference to the transfer to the citizens of this country of foreign-built vessels. These regulations embrace all the questions which I discussed yesterday. These regulations inform the consuls that an American citizen has a right to buy a vessel abroad, and that he has a right to fly the American flag over that vessel. They require the consul in such a case to make an investigation, with a view to seeing whether the transaction was a bona fide one, whether the purchase money has been actually paid, whether the title to the ship has passed, and, in case he finds that it has, to give it a proper certificate. The regulations are also directed to our collectors of customs, and advise them that in case such a ship flying the American flag enters an American port, under certain provisions of the law which are cited in this article, the cargo and the ship are subject to forfeiture if it enters with a cargo, or if it enters in ballast or with passengers alone that the collector shall apply the differential tonnage duties provided in the law cited in these instructions. These are the instructions that are regularly issued to all the consuls of the United States abroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

United States Consular Regulations, 1896.

[Page 132.]

ARTICLE XX.

AMERICAN OR FOREIGN BUILT VESSELS TRANSFERRED ABROAD TO CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

341. Right to acquire property in foreign ships: The right of citizens of the United States to acquire property in foreign ships has been held to be a natural right independent of statutory law, and such property is as much entitled to protection by the United States as any other property of a citizen of the United States.

342. Treasury regulations—sea letters: The existing general regulations of the Treasury Department under the customs and navigation laws (Customs Regulations, 1892) recognize the right of property in vessels of this character, and declare them to be entitled to the protection of the authorities and to the flag of the United States, although no register, enrollment, license, or other marine document prescribed by the laws of the United States can lawfully be issued to such vessels, whether they are American or foreign built. The former practice of issuing sea letters in the case of the purchase abroad of American or foreign vessels by citizens of the United States is no longer authorized. Nevertheless, though the issuing of sea letters to such ships is not now authorized, yet there would seem to be no good reason upon the face of our present legislation why the Department of State should not resume the practice in case the United States should be a neutral in a war between maritime powers, if it should deem such letters more protective in their character than consular or customs certificates of sale.

343. Record of bill of sale, certificate, etc.: In view of existing regulations, and to enable the owners of a vessel so situated to protect their rights, if molested or questioned, a consular officer, though forbidden by law to grant any marine document or certificate of ownership, may lawfully make record of the bill of sale in his office, authenticate its execution, and deliver to the purchaser a certificate to that effect; certifying, also, that the owner is a citizen of the United States. Before granting such a certificate the consular officer will require tonnage of the vessel to be duly ascertained in pursuance of law and insert the same in the description of the vessel in his certificate. (Form No. 35.) These facts thus authenticated, if the transfer is in good faith, entitle the vessel to protection as the lawful property of a citizen of the United States; and the authentication of the bill of sale and of citizenship will be prima facie proof of such good faith.

344. Consul's responsibility: The authority of a consular officer to authenticate the transfer of a foreign vessel is wide in its effects and imposes great responsibility in making him, in the first instance at least, the sole judge of the good faith of the transaction. The question of the honesty and good faith of such a sale rises into the gravest importance in the event of a war between two or more powers in which the Government of the United States is a neutral. In such a war experience justifies the expectation that the citizens or subjects of one or more of the belligerents will seek to protect their shipping by transfer to a neutral flag. In some instances this may honestly be done, but the sales of the vessels of belligerents in apprehension of or in time of war are always and properly liable to suspicion, and they justify the strictest inquiry on the part of the belligerent, who may thereby have been defrauded of his right to capture the enemy's property. The acceptance of the pretended ownership of a vessel under these circumstances may be very profitable; and the temptation to abuse his trust in such a case to which a consular officer is subjected may be too great for persons of ordinary integrity, discernment, and firmness to withstand. Instances are not wanting in which citizens of the United States who were wholly incapable from their previous well-known condition and pursuits of making such a purchase, have appeared as owners under sales of this character and have sought for them the protection of the Government.

345. Careful investigation enjoined: It is the duty of a consular officer to use all available means, especially during the existence of a war to which this Government is not a party, to satisfy himself that this sale of a vessel is made in good faith, and without a fraudulent intent. A considerable discretion and responsibility rests upon him in the determination of the good faith of such transactions. It is not to be concluded that all such sales, even in time of peace, are honest and free from collusion or fraud. It is the duty of the consular officer to notice all circumstances that throw doubt on the good faith of the transaction, or point to its fictitious character, and, if he is satisfied in this respect, to refuse to grant his certificate. On the other hand, he is not permitted to regard the mere fact of the sale of a vessel to a citizen of the United States as any evidence of fraud. The presumption must be otherwise, and, in the absence of any indication of dishonesty, a sale in the regular way, with the usual business formalities, is to be regarded as made in good faith.

346. Certificate, when to be issued: When a consular officer shall have satisfied himself, after the investigation with which he is charged, that the sale of a vessel is not fictitious, and is made in good faith, and that the purchaser is a citizen of the United States, it is his duty, when requested, to record the bill of sale in the consulate, and to deliver the original to the purchaser with his certificate annexed thereto, according to Form No. 35. A copy of the bill of sale, together with any other papers belonging to the transfer, and of the consular certificate should be sent without delay to the Department of State with a report of the facts and circumstances of the transaction.

347. Right to fly the flag: The privilege of carrying the flag of the United States is under the regulation of Congress, and it may have been the intention of that body that it should be used only by a regularly documented vessel. No such intention, however, is found in any statute. And as a citizen is not prohibited from purchasing and employing abroad a foreign ship, it is regarded as reasonable and proper that he should be permitted to fly the flag of his country as an indication of ownership, and for the due protection of his property. The practice of carrying the flag by such vessels is now established. The right to do so will not be questioned, and it is probable that it will be respected by the courts.

348. Disabilities of foreign-built vessels: It should be understood that foreign-built vessels not registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States, although wholly owned by citizens thereof, can not legally import goods, wares, or merchandise from foreign ports, and are not allowed in the coasting trade. (R. S., secs. 2497, 4311.)

349. Forfeiture and tonnage dues: On arrival from a foreign port undocumented foreign-built vessels, if laden with goods, wares, or merchandise, may, with their cargoes, be subject to forfeiture (R. S., sec. 2497); see tariff act of 1894, section 15 (1913, sec. 4, see sub. 2). If in ballast only, or with passengers without cargo, they will be subject to a discriminating tonnage duty. (R. S., sec. 4219; 19 Stat. L., 250.) When in foreign ports they are also subject to tonnage and other consular fees, from which regularly documented vessels are exempt. For instructions respecting the shipment and discharge and relief of seamen on vessels of this character, and the collection of extra wages, consular officers are referred to the several articles on these subjects.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] will not be adopted. In the first place, since 1846, I think, the provision which the amendment of the Senator from Delaware would modify with reference to the right of an American corporation to obtain American registry for a vessel owned by it has been a part of our law. During that whole time, if a vessel entitled to registry under the laws of the United States was owned by a corporation authorized either by the State or by the United States without any reference to the nationality of the stockholders of the corporation, it has been entitled to registry under our law. The only exception to that, so far as I know, is under the act of 1892, known as the subsidy act, by which we provided, under certain conditions and circumstances, that a vessel complying with certain requirements would be entitled to draw certain mail compensation, but would be subject, at the discretion of the Government, in case of war, to be requisitioned and converted into a war vessel or a cruiser, as the case might be. On account of those obligations which the vessel assumed toward the Government, and on account of the special privileges which the Government accorded to the vessel, the owners there were required to be American citizens, whether it was a corporation or whether it was an individual. So far as other vessels are concerned, however, I think there is no exception to the rule which has obtained in this country that a corporation is entitled to registry of its vessel if the vessel itself is entitled to registry, without reference to whether the stockholders are foreign or American. As a matter of fact, I do not suppose there is any instance in this country where a large majority of the stockholders of these corporations have not been American citizens, and I do not suppose there will be hereafter.

This amendment changes that law. That is the law of the Panama Canal act. That is the general law of the Government. Now, when we are passing an emergency measure for the purpose of enlarging the opportunity for American registry of vessels, enlarging the number of vessels that may be employed in our foreign commerce, and enlarging the opportunity for securing, through the process of admitting to registration foreign ships, adequate transportation to meet a great emergency, why should we restrict the conditions under which vessels may be brought under American registry and may be employed to relieve the necessities of the present situation?

I went to the Commissioner of Navigation this morning and made inquiry with reference to the effect of this amendment, if adopted. While he could not advise me positively, he said it was possible, if this provision was passed, that the ships of the American-Hawaiian Line, which are now flying the American flag, might be required to surrender their American registry, because it is possible that more than 10 per cent of the stock of that corporation is owned by foreigners. It is an American corporation and its vessels are flying the American flag. It may be, as I say, that more than 10 per cent of the stock of that company, with its great fleet of ships that we expect in this exigency to call into operation to serve the pressing needs of the country, is held by foreigners, and that the ships will be required to give up their American registry. I do not know how that is. The Commissioner of Navigation could not advise me about it. He had not the information.

Mr. President, the United Fruit Co. has a fleet of between 25 and 30 vessels, I think. The United Fruit Co. is an American corporation, but its ships are under the British flag. It is hoped that when this bill is passed, if there are no restrictive provisions that will prevent it, this fleet will be brought under the American flag, and will be entitled to the protection, in the sea conditions that we have now, of a neutral flag, so that the vessels may serve the purpose of carrying our surplus crops to Europe without incurring the danger and the peril of being seized by one of the belligerents. I think probably the bulk of the stock of this corporation is owned by American citizens. That is the opinion of the Commissioner of Navigation, because the chief owners are known by him to be Americans; but it may be, and probably is true, that some of the stock is held by foreigners. It may be that more than 10 per cent of the stock is held by foreigners. If so, then not a single one of these splendid vessels, the owners of which have already indicated their purpose, if they are properly protected upon the high seas, to come to the assistance of the farmers and the manufacturers of this country in this emergency, can do so. It may be that they will be excluded from taking the benefits of this act and being allowed to fly a neutral flag, instead of having to fly the flag of a belligerent, subject of course to seizure and capture upon the high seas by any of the other belligerents.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am afraid the Senator from North Carolina has not been impressed by the amendment I have offered sufficiently to glance over it as yet, because the amendment expressly provides that where the stockholders of any corporation have an interest in the ships which are to be brought in for American registry only a majority of the stock of such a corporation need be owned by American citizens.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has changed it from 90 per cent to a majority?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Oh, no; the Senator is entirely mistaken. I will ask that the Secretary may read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of American citizens, whether of individuals or of corporations, the majority of whose stock is owned by citizens of the United States, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships so acquired to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district, and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel built in the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States, unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that very clearly requires that at least 50 per cent of the stock of the corporation purchasing the vessel and proposing to operate the vessel must be owned by American citizens.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Of course; that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. I supposed it was 90 per cent; but I see it is 50 per cent instead of 90 per cent. But, Mr. President, that might as well unduly and unnecessarily interfere with and restrict the emergency measure and remedial measure that we are trying to provide here. Certainly it restricts it in a way that we have never heretofore felt called upon to restrict the rights of registry by American corporations. When we are trying to enlarge these rights, when we are trying to get more ships to come under American registry, I can not see why we should change our laws that have been in effect more than half a century, that were reaffirmed by the Congress of the United States within the last two years when it passed the Panama Canal act, and prescribe this limitation upon the power of an American corporation to purchase a foreign-built ship. I can see no necessity for it, Mr. President, and I think it would greatly reduce and curtail the benefits that are likely to accrue to the country in this situation from the passage of this bill. Not only might we exclude from registry the vessels that I have spoken about—those of the United Fruit Co. and those of the American-Hawaiian Co.—but there are a number of other lines that are now being run—one known as the New York & Pacific Steamship Co., with seven splendid ships owned by an American corporation but flying the Belgian flag. It is possible that, while those ships are owned by an American corporation, more than the percentage of stock permissible under the amendment of the Senator from Delaware may be owned by foreigners. Then, there is the Red Star Line. The Red Star Line has five ships of very considerable size, aggregating 42,000 net tons. They are owned by an American corporation, but they are operated under the British flag.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina has stated more than once that this is an emergency measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, then, is not its operation limited? It seems to be a permanent measure. There is no time limit in which the President can exercise this most extraordinary power. It is objected that if we are to give the President the authority to practically rewrite our shipping laws it ought to be limited to a period of disturbance. Suppose that six months hence the war is over; the President still has the power that is here conferred upon him. I should like to hear the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina upon that point.

Mr. SIMMONS. The power of the President with reference to suspension refers to other sections of the bill, and not to this particular section.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know; but the Senator has said that it is an emergency measure. Does the Senator think that we ought to confer this vast power or discretion upon the President permanently?

Mr. SIMMONS. The power that I am discussing now, with reference to the American registry of foreign-built vessels, the President is given no discretionary power with reference to it at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that will become a part of the permanent law of the land just as the Panama Canal act, which allows the purchase by American citizens of foreign-built vessels and entitles them to registry unless they are over five years of age. That is a permanent enactment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand all that.

Mr. SIMMONS. This section is simply to remove that limitation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SIMMONS. When that limitation is removed it becomes a part of the permanent law of the land——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. As well as the Panama Canal act. That is now unamended a part of the permanent law.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely why I think the Senator from North Carolina is illogical. Sections 2 and 3 confer somewhat extraordinary power upon the President, I think, to suspend certain portions of our law. Section 1 does not. Section 1 changes permanently our statute. If we change permanently our statute under a stress of circumstances why should we not write it as it ought to be?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the emergency I referred to as existing in that case is this: We are changing it with the hope and expectation that it will operate as a great inducement to capitalists in this country to buy vessels and bring them under American registry; that it will offer an inducement to corporations created by laws of this country who now own vessels flying a foreign flag to bring them under American registry. We want to get as many as possible of these vessels abroad under American registry to meet the present situation.

That being so, being anxious to get as many of these vessels that are now owned and operated by American corporations and are flying foreign flags to come in as it is possible for us to do, in order to meet the emergency the point I am making is that we ought not to make it more difficult than the present law makes it for them to come in, because if we do then the inducement we offer will not be of avail and the probability of their coming in to meet the emergency will be diminished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see the force of what is stated by the Senator from North Carolina, but it seems to me that the situation ought to make us a little more careful than we have ordinarily been. I have no objection to those ships which have heretofore been purchased by American citizens or built by American citizens or American corporations coming in under the laws of the United States and taking an American registry, but, with regard to ships that are to be purchased in the future by Americans or an American corporation, in view of the present situation we ought to be extremely careful. The Senator from North Carolina must feel sure that no American will invest one dollar of his money in the purchase of a ship that is to be used simply in an emergency. He will not invest his money knowing that after the war is over, or even before, the President may remove all the protection or the advantage which is now proposed to be conferred.

If we were to make them a part of the permanent law, then we might offer some inducement to Americans to invest money in ships, but I fear there will not be a single ship bought hereafter by American capital, and that all we will do, save to allow those ships already owned to come here—and that I would be quite willing to do without any further condition—will be to open the door for fraud, to open the door for a transfer nominally, a pretended transfer of a foreign ship to American ownership, and incur the hazard of the displeasure of the foreign power whose subjects formerly owned the ship. Heretofore we have needed no great precaution, because American registry was a burden instead of an advantage. No shipowner would take an American registry if he were not compelled to take it. But now the situation is changed temporarily, and it is a great advantage to sail under the flag of a neutral power, and therefore there will be vastly increased motive on the part of shipowners everywhere to abandon their present allegiance and seek the protection of American registry.

The Senator from North Carolina knows that if we do not guard that situation carefully we are likely to give offense and to become involved in a grave controversy from which we ought to remove ourselves as far as possible.

I think that in such respect the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware furnishes the protection, the safeguard that we ought to impose, for if no ship can be bought in this emergency save by an American citizen, and with his own capital, and if by a corporation, then by a capital the greater part of which was furnished by Americans, we will not offer this temptation for a foreign ship to merely nominally transfer ownership to American hands and then seek a neutral registry.

I think that ought to be taken into consideration, because there is no relief that we can give to the people of this country that will compensate for the risk of embroiling the Nation with the powers which are now at war. The situation is temporary at best. England is still mistress of the seas. The English ships will ply their trade between the coast of America and the coast of Europe. Her ships will carry half the trade of the world. French ships would be free to cross the Atlantic Ocean; Italian ships will be free, we hope; Norwegian ships will be free; and if the paths across the Atlantic and measurably across the Pacific are kept open and safe the exigency which now confronts us will soon pass away, even if we did not acquire a single additional ship.

I am in favor, as I have been for a long while, of the Government acquiring ships that are necessary to meet emergencies of this kind. When the ship subsidy bill of four years ago was before the Senate I offered an amendment to it or a substitute for it authorizing the Government to build a fleet of 50 ships, as I remember the number, suitable for the purposes of the Navy when the Navy was at war and adequate for commerce when the Nation is at peace.

In my judgment that is the only way in which we will ever be able to supply the American people with the instrumentalities for foreign commerce unless we place such a burden upon foreign ships as will drive them from our ports. If we pursued the policy of taxing the cargoes of foreign ships that come into our ports 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or any other adequate percentage we could in that way drive foreign trade into American ships; but I am not prepared to say that even if we were to abrogate all the treaties that we have with foreign countries which bind us to refrain from a course of that sort it would be wise to adopt the course. I fear that our entanglements with foreign nations would be increased, and we might not be able to preserve that good will which now happily distinguishes us from nearly every other nation in the world.

But aside from that, recurring to the immediate emergency, what we want, as the Senator from North Carolina says, is more ships free to engage in this commerce. We can get more ships in three ways. We can offer sufficient inducement to ships now owned by Americans to take an American registry, and thus be protected by our power. I think that is feasible, and I think it is wise, even though they have heretofore sought the advantages of a foreign flag. We can also open the door for a fraudulent transfer, a nominal transfer, to American ownership. That does not involve the investment of American money, but it simply involves the protection of an American name. I do not believe in encouraging that way of adding to our merchant marine.

The third way, but which will, in my opinion, prove entirely illusory, is an actual investment of money upon the part of American citizens in order to buy these ships. If I believed that there was capital that would invest itself in any such hazardous enterprise that is certain to become unremunerative the very moment the remaining nations of the world employ their shipping as they have heretofore employed it, I might favor the plan, but I have not heard a single Senator assert that, in his opinion, American capital could be enlisted in that way, under a protection of that sort.

See the hazard that the American investor must undertake. He buys a foreign ship. Just now and so long as the President of the United States sees fit to relieve the American ship from the obligation to employ American officers—watch officers—and pay them American wages, and so long as he relieves this ship from the burden of complying with our standards of seaworthiness, of sanitation, of safety, so long the ship may be operated profitably, possibly; but the very moment the emergency passes the American can no more operate that ship with profit than he has been able to operate it in times past, and the investment becomes a complete loss.

What is the use of deceiving ourselves with a pretense of that character? We become, I think, an object of derision throughout the whole thinking world when we propose to increase our American ships through the enlistment of American capital unless we accompany the bill with some assurance that the conditions under which the ships could be operated profitably will be permanent—will be continued after the emergency that now has arisen disappears.

I say, therefore, that in my opinion the danger of becoming entangled with foreign powers in the fraudulent transfer of ownership vastly overweighs the advantages that we would secure by allowing these ships to come in without the safeguard proposed by the Senator from Delaware. I may say that the first paragraph of his amendment seeks to include the same result that is sought to be reached in the amendment that I proposed. The only essential difference is that in his amendment the transaction is to be reviewed and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

In mine it was to be determined or to be passed upon by the Secretary of State. I still prefer my own view; but I am so anxious that there shall be reasonably fair protection against the consequences of transactions of this sort that I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, believing that it will do something toward reducing or lessening the perils of indiscriminate transfers in order to get the security for the time being of the American flag.

Before I take my seat I desire to say that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is not an emergency measure, I agree, but it is a wise measure. It is exactly what, if I may be permitted to say so, I proposed in an amendment to the subsidy bill four or five years ago. I have never heard yet one word of argument against it. The Navy needs the ships. Without them, it is powerless to do the thing for which we built it. If the Government were to add to its Navy all the ships, in their general character merchant ships, that would be necessary to accompany the fighting vessels and make them efficient in time of war we would have at this moment at our command all the transportation that the business of this country needs in order to relieve it of the extraordinary situation with which we are confronted. If we had done this thing years and years ago we would not now suffer the humiliation through which we are passing. And besides that we would have had a Navy which the powers of the earth would know was able to move without the help of other nations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to know that the Senator indicates his approval of the amendment which I have offered. I recall that years ago when his party was presenting the ship-subsidy measure he urged a proposal of this kind—the creation of an auxiliary Navy the vessels of which could be used in times of peace commercially.

I am a little in doubt about this amendment myself. I wish to make it very much broader, and I should like the views of the Senator regarding it. The amendment which I have offered appropriates $30,000,000, but provides that only $6,000,000 of it shall be available for each year for the next five years, either for the construction or the purchase of ships to be used in this auxiliary Navy. Does not the Senator think that the emergency is such now as to warrant the immediate utilization of that entire appropriation just as we appropriated $50,000,000 at the commencement of the Cuban war and put its expenditure practically in the discretion of President McKinley. Does the Senator not think that that sum, or even perhaps a larger sum, could be advantageously spent immediately in securing the ships necessary to make our Navy a well-proportioned Navy and at the same time enable the Government of the United States to meet this emergency demand for transportation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not see how the plan would meet the present emergency, for I had it in my mind that the Government should build these ships, and of course they could not be built in time to transport the products of this country to any foreign shore within the next year or two.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say that while the original bill which I presented years ago provided for the construction of these ships in American shipyards, yet the amendment which I have offered provides either for the construction or the purchase, and, of course, the Senator will understand that the purchase would meet the emergency.

Mr. CUMMINS. Although the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] doubts my loyalty to the merchant marine, I must say that if the Government were authorized to build the ships it ought to have as supplemental to its fighting ships, I would like to see them built in the yards of the United States and with American labor.

I am perfectly willing that the American people as a whole shall bear the additional cost of building ships at home rather than buying them abroad. I believe it is a wise public policy, and it leads me to make a suggestion with regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from New Hampshire recalled a little while ago.

I believe in the doctrine of protection. I believe in it profoundly, and I have made it the standard of my public life. I do not believe, however, in protecting one industry in this country at the expense of all others. The bill that was passed in 1913 revising the tariff law of the United States put 60 per cent and a little more, as I remember it, of the products of my State, and generally of the West, upon the free list, and with regard to them we are compelled to compete, and we are now competing with the whole world without any restriction whatsoever.

The doctrine of protection in order to be fair must be general. When it becomes partial, it becomes unjust, and I am not willing to subject the people of the country generally to the burden of the protection of one industry when those people must with regard to their own productions compete with the whole world.

That is the reason, or the chief reason, why I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I will not, however, enter upon a general discussion of that subject, but it is manifestly unfair to protect by absolute prohibition of importation the shipyards of the United States and leave our other markets open to the inroads of the products of every nation upon earth. In that suggestion the Senator from New Hampshire will find the chief reason for the vote to which he refers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the reason why——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not at all question the Senator's vote. I simply put in the RECORD the recorded vote as it appears in the proceedings of this body, and I had no intention of putting any Senator in a wrong position. I presume the Senator has not changed his view. I have no reason to believe that he has, but if the Senator will permit me, let me ask him this question: He says that he is against protecting any particular industry when certain of the products of his own State and of his own section of the country are on the free list.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not say that, quite. I said that protection ought to be general in order to be just.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, the Senator would not argue we ought to put a duty on every commodity that we import?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because we could not do that; but I should like to suggest to the Senator that I think his argument, carried to its ultimate conclusion, would be that because the products of the Middle West are not properly protected, therefore he would not agree to the protection that is accorded to the varied interests of the United States as they appear in the tariff law we have on the books now.

Mr. CUMMINS. My view is that there ought to be upon everything that is produced in the United States a duty that would equalize the difference which exists in the conditions of its production.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator and I are in absolute accord on that proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Whenever that doctrine is abandoned as the economic policy of the country to preserve the protection upon some domestic production and leave it upon others it is unjust. It results in an unfair and intolerable distribution of wealth; and for that policy I can not stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, that brings us back to the primary discussion of the proper basis upon which a tariff law ought to be framed. I agree with the Senator in the suggestion he made a moment ago, and I simply want to add that the one conspicuous industry in the United States that has been always kept on the free list and is now on the free list is the shipping industry of the United States which is engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish to read a telegram I have this moment received from Camden, N. J. It is as follows:

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
Washington, D. C.:

We regard the Jones amendment to H. R. 18202, designed to admit foreign shipping to trade between Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States, as likely to work disaster to American shipyards, and we therefore strongly oppose same.

NEW YORK SHIPBUILDING CO.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not rise to speak upon the coastwise policy of the country, nor did I rise to discuss the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I understood that amendment to be—and I still understand it to be—a proposal that foreign-built ships which shall be registered under the laws of the United States, thus becoming American ships, shall be admitted to the trade between the two coasts. So interpreted, I am for it, because I believe that whenever we are willing to admit a ship to American protection and American registry we ought to admit it to every American port for every American purpose.

I am not saying whether it is wise to admit the older foreign-built ships to American registry. I have already expressed my views with regard to them. I fear that what we are doing as an expedient to meet an emergency is a thing that will result in no benefit to American shippers, but which will arise to plague us in our relations with foreign countries. If I could be assured that there was any American who was ready with his money to invest in a foreign-built ship under these conditions, my view of it might be different; but I have heard no one who even ventured to predict that there would be the investment of a single dollar in foreign-built ships under the conditions of this bill; and I wish heartily that the bill were confined to ships that are now owned by Americans or by American corporations, for I do think that with respect to them the bill will furnish some relief in a condition which is as extraordinary as I believe it will be brief.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has made an earnest plea that this bill be not amended in any way; that it shall remain just as it has come from the committee; but, after the arguments are disposed of, I would suggest to the Senator that at least we ought to amend the title, and the proper amendment to the title would be, "A bill for the relief of the United Fruit Co. and the Standard Oil Co." So far as has been shown up to the present time, theirs are the only two lines of ships that would come under this bill and would receive American registry.

We all understand very well that ships flying a belligerent flag do not feel extremely easy under the present conditions, and the ships of those companies owned by Americans and American corporations would undoubtedly avail themselves of the privilege of becoming exempt from seizure upon the seas. They would immediately take an American registry during the present period, and so long as the war continued, of course, they would avail themselves of that protection; but after the war, which may last for three months or may last for six months, is over, what will those ships then do? Will they continue to fly the American flag or will they immediately be transferred to foreign registry and a new British or German or Norwegian flag hoisted in place of the American flag?

The Senator from North Carolina has been challenged in several instances to name any other ship outside of those owned by these companies which would probably be purchased by American investors. I have not heard of a single answer to that question, and why? If the Senator from North Carolina under the present conditions felt that he could with profit buy a foreign-built ship to engage in foreign commerce under American registry, the very first question that he would ask himself would be, "What will I do with this ship after the exigency has passed and things have become normal between the great nations of the world? I can not operate it under American registry and under our laws in competition with the foreign-built vessels operated under foreign laws. I can not compete with them; I have not been able to compete with them in the past and I shall not be able to compete with them in the future, as I must be compelled to do if I own my vessel. What will I do with it? I shall either have to sell it to some foreign company or else will have to lay it aside."

What objection can there be to a provision that any one of these vessels which thus obtains American registry may, after the close of the war, be allowed to engage either in the foreign trade or in the coastwise trade? They would not engage in the foreign trade, because they could not afford to do so; but if you will say to the American citizen, "After you have registered this vessel for the benefit of American commerce you at least can use it in the coastwise trade," he might consider that, with the Panama Canal to be open in a short time, there will be a demand for an additional number of vessels for the coastwise trade.

With a little modification of the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] which would give that authority, and with a further modification that would leave out entirely the provision as to the amount of stock that might be held by foreigners, we could give an opportunity to all of the vessels of the two great companies to which I have referred to come under American registry and at the same time give an opportunity to the average American investor to buy foreign-built ships, as he will probably be willing to do if he feels that he can have any field for its operation in the future.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has said that after this emergency has passed foreign-built vessels purchased by American citizens would not be able to compete with ships of other nations, and that they then would have to go out of business or go under another flag. I do not know whether or not the Senator is correct in saying that they can not compete.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have not been able to compete in the past. What assurance have we that under the same conditions they will be able to compete in the future?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator overlooks the fact that now for the first time we are permitting the purchase of foreign-built vessels; that is, we were doing it for the first time when we passed the Panama Canal act and placed limitations upon such purchases. We are proposing now to remove those guaranties; so that the old argument that ships may be constructed very much cheaper abroad than they could here, that the additional cost of the ship to the American would burden him and make it impossible for him to compete, is removed if this act is passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is removed, anyway. It has been removed for some years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. No; it has been removed only as to a limited number of vessels, those not five years of age. That was done by the Panama Canal act passed about two years ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. But not a vessel has been purchased under that act.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is very true. But, Mr. President, let us go a little further. That difficulty as to competition is removed. The American can get his ship built as cheaply as a foreigner can get it built or can buy it.

The only other impediment is, first, the difference in the cost of operation. Under the present law an American shipowner can hire his crew entirely from other nationals than those of this country; that is, his crew may be entirely composed of foreigners. Under the present law watch officers must be Americans, but this bill authorizes the President to suspend that requirement for such time as he may deem necessary; but after the President's authority to suspend that requirement is removed, the owner of a vessel will have to select his watch officers from American citizens. That might possibly impose some additional expense, because it is very well understood that our watch officers are probably better paid than are the watch officers of foreign countries.

Mr. McCUMBER. But right here let me ask the Senator if he supposes that that condition will continue after the war—that we may then have our vessels manned by foreigners?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just said that after the emergency passes the watch officers would have to be American citizens.

Mr. McCUMBER. And a majority of the seamen, too?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; the law does not require the majority of the seamen, as I now understand it, to be Americans.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it does.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not, but I am not sure about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It requires a certain proportion to be so, and that proportion would have to be maintained.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does on those steamships that operate under the act of 1892, but it does not upon other ships. Upon other ships the watch and the crew may both be foreigners. I think I can not be mistaken about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably that is correct, but as a matter of fact there are very few such ships.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that the difference as to wages would be only as between the wages that the American would have to pay the watch officers and the wages that the foreigner would have to pay the watch officers. It is said that the other countries pay subsidies. Under the act of 1892, any one of these ships, if of the first class, can become a mail carrier and get a subsidy from this Government of $4 a mile one way. If it is a second-class ship—and there are only second-class ships, I believe, now engaged in our trade with South America, with Central America, and, I believe, also with the Orient—it can also get a mail contract under the old subsidy act at the rate of $2 a mile, so that there would be a large opportunity for such vessels to become mail-carriers; in fact, all the vessels in our South American trade and our Oriental trade would have that opportunity offered to them, and, as mail carriers, they would get this subsidy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, now let us look at the matter——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will allow me to finish, I can not see the force of the argument that, under these conditions, with no difference, as I see it, except the difference in the salaries of the watch officers, competition would be impossible, seeing that in our industries in this country, while it is alleged that we pay 50 per cent more wages than some of the European countries, we not only compete with them but we go into their very markets and supply their home customers.

Mr. McCUMBER. The very best evidence, Mr. President, of whether we will be able to compete is the fact that we have not dared to compete or attempted to compete, although we have now had a law for several years upon our statute books which allows American citizens to purchase any ship not more than 5 years old built anywhere in the world and give it American registry. The fact that our citizens have not purchased a single ship, although they can purchase them under the same conditions as the citizens of any other nation, is rather positive proof that the operating expenses under our requirements are so great that we can not compete. Therefore it resolves itself down simply to a question of whether our navigation laws are such as will enable American vessels to compete with foreign vessels. If American vessels are not able to compete with other vessels engaged in the foreign trade, then any vessel that would be purchased under this bill would be practically useless at the end of the war, unless it could be used in some other way. I am assuming, of course, that the rules with reference to the number of crew, proportion of American citizens in the crew, and other requirements after the close of the war will be practically the same as they are to-day.

I want to find a way to keep these vessels under the American flag. Of course the vessels owned by the Standard Oil Co. and the vessels owned by the United Fruit Co. when the present emergency is over will be put again under foreign flags and proceed in their own line of work, but we would like to get a few vessels to remain permanently under the American flag, and we at least would extend an invitation that might be heeded if we would say to American capitalists, "Any ship which you purchase under the provisions of this law may hereafter be used in the coastwise trade by complying with the conditions and the laws relating to that trade"; in other words, that it may be used in the coastwise trade if the owner feels that he is incapable of competing in the foreign trade.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SAULSBURY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that, although vessels may not have been purchased under the existing law heretofore, because they would be brought into competition with and might not be able to meet the competition of foreign vessels, still is it not the theory of this bill that to buy foreign-built ships because what was formerly foreign competition may be removed, and we may not have the use of the foreign ships? I assume that if, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, the vessels of Great Britain and Norway, and possibly Italy and other foreign countries, may be at liberty to carry our products, then the very emergency that is contemplated by this bill will not arise.

Mr. McCUMBER. To some extent it will arise, because the greater proportion of the world's carrying trade will be in the same hands it was before. The greater proportion of the carrying trade has been in the hands of British vessels, which, of course, will be subject to seizure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if this bill should pass, and if American citizens should purchase German vessels, is it the understanding of the Senator that those German vessels can ply safely under the American flag between this country and Germany?

Mr. McCUMBER. If purchased in good faith, I certainly do contend that they can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, what militates against that view, in my opinion, is that the commerce of Germany will be almost entirely cut off, and if Great Britain retains the control of the seas and can protect her vast tonnage of ocean carriers in transporting the products of this country abroad, those vessels will carry our products to Great Britain; they will not be transported to Germany or to belligerent nations in opposition to the interests of Great Britain. Nor do I think that American vessels would succeed in doing that in view of the conditions that obtain in central Europe at this time. I am looking to see the vast amount of exports from this country, even if Americans do purchase vessels, taken to Great Britain. Unless Great Britain can maintain command of the seas so as to protect her own tonnage between this country and hers, then she will not be able to protect ours either.

In answer to what the Senator has said about the desirability of foreign-built vessels purchased for this emergency being given the right to enter our coastwise trade and remain there after the war closes, it would seem to me that that would be utterly in contravention of the doctrine which at least the Republicans hold and which has been stated by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from New Hampshire. If the present emergency—the necessity of supplying transportation facilities temporarily until the accustomed ships can be relied upon to resume their vocation in that line—is to be taken advantage of to stock up the demand of American citizens for vessels to engage in the coastwise trade, it seems that it will put our shipyards out of business for years to come.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not see that it will seriously affect our shipyards. I think the shipyards get hysterical every time there is the slightest danger of a ship being registered in this country without being built in one of their yards. I do not suppose that a great navy and a great fleet of merchant ships are going to be obtained under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they are not, Mr. President, there is no earthly use of passing the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. My candid opinion is, if the Senator please, that as the bill now stands there will not be one single ship purchased, but that ships now owned by American companies and flying a foreign flag will come under the provisions of this bill for self-protection. That is about all the bill will accomplish. Senators are contending, however, that this bill is drawn with the idea that American citizens are going to purchase and bring under American registry other foreign-built vessels outside of those owned by American companies.

No American citizen is going to purchase a vessel built in foreign shipyards unless after he has purchased it he can use it in the foreign trade or in the coastwise trade, if he sees fit, just so long as he desires. In other words, he is not going to buy for an emergency that may last only from three to six months.

Now, I want to say just a word to the Senator from Delaware in reference to his amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to that, if the Senator is right that nothing but the Standard Oil tank ships constructed for the transportation of oil and the United Fruit Co.'s fruit vessels equipped with cold-storage facilities for perishable cargoes are to be transferred to the American flag, does he think, in view of the peculiar construction of these vessels, even if they were willing to abstain from their existing business, that they would furnish any measure of relief in the transportation of the farm products of America to Europe?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes, Mr. President; I think grain, cotton, and many other commodities could be carried in these ships with very little changes.

Now, I ask the attention of the Senator from Delaware in reference to his amendment which proposes to add a new section to the bill to be known as section 3. That amendment provides:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of citizens, whether individuals or corporations, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships so acquired to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district, and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector—

And so forth.

The only criticism that I have heard directed toward that particular amendment has been in reference to the provision that not less than 90 per cent of the capital of the vessels shall be the property of American investors. As has been suggested, this would cut out many of the vessels of the two particular lines that would undoubtedly take advantage of this proposed law. As this is to be a temporary measure, and as we want to get the ships, why should we make that limitation at the present time? Why could we not properly strike out the provision as to not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested being held by American citizens, so that it would read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury on being satisfied that any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of citizens of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When I attempted a few moments ago to correct a manifest misapprehension on the part of the Senator from North Dakota I was unable to do so, but as he addresses a direct inquiry to me now I presume I may.

The reason for the amendment is simply and solely this: That there shall be practically conclusive proof that these ships which we admit to our registry, and which sail under our flag, are the bona fide property of our own citizens. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent such ships sailing our flag from being seized by the first belligerent cruiser that wishes to seize them, and being taken by such a cruiser into a prize court, where they will undoubtedly be condemned as lawful prize unless there is sufficient proof that they are the property of American citizens. That is the whole and sole object of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, if the Senator will allow me, the Senator will see that by his amendment he requires, first, that they shall be bona fide purchases, and then, in addition to their being bona fide purchases, that at least 90 per cent of the stock must be held by American citizens. Therefore a transfer might be absolutely bona fide, and yet only 80 per cent of the stock might be owned by American citizens, or any other percentage. It seems to me that if we require that they shall be bona fide American ships, and that the transfer shall be in good faith, we might leave the question of the evidential facts to establish that matter in the discretion of the Secretary, and thereby secure what we want to secure—the transfer of these particular lines to American registry; because that is all, I believe, that we will get under this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota unfortunately has not been present when, several times, I have tried to make statements to the Senate which I thought pertinent to this amendment, and have tried to confine myself to that only. I have stated that I was informed by reputable and representative members of the Washington bar that they have been authorized to say to me that if this amendment and the other amendment which I propose shall be adopted there will be registered under the American flag a substantial number of ships now sailing under foreign flags.

The misapprehension which I desire to correct, as shown by the statement of the Senator a few minutes ago, is this: He and each one of the Members who have addressed the Senate who have not happened to be present when I have been trying to impress the merits of these amendments upon the Senate have insisted that the vessels which will be registered here will go into foreign registry immediately upon the termination of the war. Now, I have provided for that; and if the Senator will do me the honor to read the amendment which immediately follows this, which I shall immediately offer after this is voted upon, he will see that I have provided for that by saying that no transfer of such vessels shall be permitted which will in any way affect the right of the United States to take over such vessels, if it so desires, under the provisions of the old act which was passed in 1892, concerning the two steamships which were then admitted to American registry under certain other conditions.

The object of these two amendments is, first, to make sure that a ship flying our flag shall not be seized because of fraud in its transfer. The second is that when transferred to our flag and registered as a vessel of the United States, it may not be transferred away to the flag of a foreign power immediately upon the conclusion of hostilities.

If the Senator will do me the honor to read the amendments proposed, he will see that that is the intention of both of them, and no other.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have read the amendments; and I will say to the Senator that, while objection was made to that portion of the amendment by the Senator from North Carolina, I myself did not consider it very serious, but for an entirely different reason. I believe these ships, under the present conditions, desire an American registry, and I believe they will have very little difficulty in getting the stock transferred to American citizens in order that they may have American registry, even though the Senator should put the proportion at 95 or 98 per cent. I believe they will find a way to secure an American registry for self-protection. The Senator's amendment also provides, however, that—

Each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States, unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

I have not myself seen the occasion for the restriction. As indicated in what I first said when I rose, it seems to me that we ought to give the broadest opportunity to use these vessels in the coastwise trade anywhere in the United States, so that there will be an inducement on the part of the person desiring to purchase a foreign craft, and an assurance that he will have some business for that craft to do after the war has closed and normal conditions again obtain.

It would seem to me to be better, in order to secure the result which I hope we would have—namely, a permanency in the transfer of the flag—if that were amended so as to read:

Each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, and may engage in either foreign or coastwise trade upon complying with the laws and regulations relating to the vessels engaged in such trade.

Of course an amendment of that kind might have to be worded a little differently so that it would apply after the close of the present condition. I shall vote for the Senator's amendment even as it is; but I believe that it would result better, and that we would be more likely to get some other vessels than those belonging to the United Fruit Co. and the Standard Oil Co., if we should allow the owner of the vessel to use it just the same as though it had been built in our own yards.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of the Senator's suggested amendment would be to permit these vessels to engage in coastwise traffic, whether it was intercoastal or not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, they could transport freight from New York to New Orleans or to any intermediate point?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. It would give us just so many more vessels in the trade.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see any reason why that should not be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nor I, either.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] limits the vessels to intercoastal traffic; that is, to traffic between points on the Pacific Ocean and points on the Atlantic.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not so sure but that that field may be pretty well filled by this time; and if it should so happen that there was not the demand that we might expect as between the intercoastal points, then at least they might be used at other points in the coastwise trade.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, owing to the fact that I am compelled to leave the city to-morrow I take this opportunity of referring to an amendment which I have previously introduced to the interstate-commerce law, and which has been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is substantially the same as an amendment which I have proposed to House bill 16586, which is a bill to amend the twentieth section of the interstate-commerce law.

The amendment which I propose is to come in on line 9, after the word "act" and before the word "and," on the first page of that bill. It will make the first part of that section read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, all corporations, joint-stock associations, and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock organized to carry on business for profit engaged, or which may hereafter be engaged, in the transmission of electricity for power, lighting, heating, or any other purposes, in any manner whatsoever, from one State or Territory in the United States or the District of Columbia to any State or Territory of the United States or District of Columbia, all of which corporations and associations are hereby constituted and made common carriers and shall come under the terms of and be subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act; to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information.

I have read the first clause of that act as my amendment will change it.

It has been given out by the party in power in this Government that its main tenets are: That that party is opposed, first, to all monopolies; second, that restraint of trade must not be permitted; third, that competition must be fostered and encouraged; fourth, that persons of small means must be protected against those who are charged to be the possessors of predatory wealth.

The section of the law to regulate commerce which the amendment I have proposed seeks to better is aimed at those associations or corporations which, in the main, are possessed of great resources and are engaged in large business.

It is intended to bring their methods and dealings to the light of day and let the world see them and understand them, be they good or bad.

It is intended that others shall know with whom they are dealing and what they are to expect in their dealings with them.

It is intended that they shall be able to know enough about those associations and corporations to put them upon their guard, and to enable them to protect and defend themselves against any propensity of such associations or corporations with whom they may have business relations to absorb or destroy them.

That section as it now stands in the law to regulate commerce, or as it is proposed to be amended by the report of the committee in the bill they have laid before the Senate, does not embrace in terms or make it free from doubt all those who ought to be embraced in its provisions or who may be embraced in its provisions.

It is not certain who are all the parties embraced in the term "common carrier." There is a general understanding that many kinds of business and many parties are included therein; but it has not been declared in unmistakable terms, either by a law or judicial decision, that those who transmit electricity to be used for power purposes or for heating and lighting purposes are to be considered as common carriers.

It has been determined and declared by law that telegraph, telephone, and cable companies engaged in sending messages from one State, Territory, or District of the United States to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or a foreign country, shall be considered and held to be common carriers within the meaning of that act; also, that persons engaged in the transmission of oil or other commodity with pipe lines, or partly by pipe lines and partly by railroad, or partly by pipe lines and partly by water, shall be considered and held to be common carriers within the meaning and purpose of that act.

It seems that the framers of that act and the various amendments and of the amendment embraced in the provisions of House bill 16586, reported to this body by the Interstate Commerce Commission, have overlooked the fact that there is another species of business which is engaged in transmission of electrical current for the purposes of operating power plants, and for heating and light purposes, the owners and operators of which business should be brought within the terms and provisions of the act to regulate commerce. They are acquiring and absorbing the electrical power throughout the entire Union. No other business in the United States is progressing and forging ahead so rapidly as that. What it will accomplish in the future is beyond the conception of man. Its advancement in the last 20 years has been unprecedented. Its scope of business has been enlarged to embrace every section of this Union. There are many different persons and corporations engaged in that business, but it is fast being concentrated into one or two great corporations or associations. Throughout the United States there are water powers of great capacity capable of being used at the smallest expense for generating electricity and transmitting it to be used for all industrial and domestic purposes. In the mountain regions of the United States, especially in the Rocky Mountains, there are waterfalls of greater or less volume and greater or less drop from their head to the bottom. These are capable of producing electrical power and at the same time not interfere seriously with the use of the water for agricultural and domestic purposes, as it has been used before the introduction of electricity in the manner as it is now extensively being used.

There are companies and associations backed up by immense capital, one among them being the General Electric Co., engaged in the manufacture of electricity and transmitting it for use over lines from one State to the other. These companies and particularly the General Electric Co. in the United States, like an octopus, have been reaching out with many arms and gathering into their folds the various water powers and the various appliances by means of which electricity is manufactured or generated and transmitted. They are fast consolidating and drifting into the condition of an absolute monopoly.

The pioneers who have gone to the West to open up and improve and develop that country have acquired the sites of many water powers, some quite small and some larger. Their means are limited. Their resources are few. They may be able to build dams and reservoirs and collect the water and prepare the power, and yet many of them are unable. In fact most of them are unable, financially, to put in a sufficient plant or adequate lines to transmit the electricity which the power they have conserved and built up might transmit. The western country is dependent very much upon the development of this kind of power, as well as upon electricity for the purposes of heating and lighting. If it is placed in the hands of a monopoly, such as it soon will be, if neglected, it will all be absorbed by the General Electric Co. and its associates in a comparatively short time, and progress, development, and advancement of that portion of the United States will be stunted and to a marked degree paralyzed. It will be held back. The immense resources of these mountains will remain unexplored and unopened. The gold and silver and other metals which lie buried therein will not be brought out for the world's use for ages and ages.

To-day the operations of the General Electric Co. are being felt all through the Rocky Mountain region. That portion of the country is being held back by the absorption of those resources by that company or others in combination and association with it. It does not do all of its business in a single name. It has acquired control of various companies and corporations which control portions of the water power of that section of our land and is fast concentrating them all under one general supervision and management, all under one general system of control, so that there is practically no competition. There is practically no remedy for the owner of such power who only possesses moderate means to develop the same and put it into use, except that they do exactly as was compelled to be done by the Standard Oil Co., which compelled the producers of all oil from wells to sell the same to it, to be conducted through its pipe lines to the refineries and markets, an act which the Supreme Court has very lately condemned and declared that that company had by that means become a common carrier and subject to the act to regulate commerce. The General Electric Co. and its associations or combinations are fast acquiring a similar control to that which has been acquired by the Standard Oil Co.

If as it is claimed by many, particularly the party in power, that the bill in question, House bill 16586, has a tendency to check monopolies and to encourage competition, certainly the Committee on Interstate Commerce should have no trouble in adopting the amendment which I have proposed and bring the parties manufacturing electrical current and transmitting it from one State to the other under the purview of the act to regulate commerce. There is no reason why those interested in that kind of business should not have the same safeguards and protections as those who are interested in producing and transmitting oil, or interested in any other character or kind of business which has to be done through the means of a common carrier or through the agencies of a common carrier.

I call the attention of the Interstate Commerce Committee particularly to the amendment which I have proposed, and ask them by the time this bill shall be brought on for debate and determination to take it into consideration and incorporate it in the bill in substance as I have suggested it, or in some other way equally or more feasible. I hope they will see their way clear to do this. If we intend to regulate common carriers, there is no reason why we should not regulate them all alike. Our laws should be uniform and take hold of all persons similarly situated in the same manner and to the same effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Mexico before he takes his seat. The argument just made is unanswerable, I think. I only desire to say that it seems to me that the amendment which he proposes, instead of being an amendment to section 20, ought to be an amendment to section 1 of the interstate-commerce law, which undertakes to define the common carriers that come within the provisions of the act. The Senator knows that that section has been very much enlarged since it was originally passed in 1887, and I think the amendment ought to be to section 1.

Mr. CATRON. If the Senator will examine the amendment I have proposed he will see that it practically brings itself in under that section, because it declares this company to be a common carrier and subject to the terms and provisions of the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; but——

Mr. CATRON. And I did not put it as an amendment to section 1, because section 1 is not incorporated in the act which I am amending. It commences with section 20. I tried to make my amendment broad enough and pointed enough to bring it under the provisions of section 1 as well as under the provisions of section 20. However, that is a proposition which is submitted to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and they can make it that broad if they desire.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is where it should be, for purposes of convenience.

Mr. CATRON. I agree with the Senator that that would be the better place to have put it.

Mr. CUMMINS. When one takes up the interstate-commerce law he begins at once to read what instrumentalities are made common carriers under the act; and gradually that has been expanded until it takes in, as I say, a great deal more than was originally covered.

Mr. CATRON. I agree with the Senator on that, and I recognize the propriety of amending that section in the way I have suggested. I proposed it here, because that section is not amended in this bill, and I thought I would make it so that it would apply to that section as well as to the whole bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can very easily say that section 1 is amended in accordance with the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. CATRON. The Interstate Commerce Committee is asked to look into it, and that could be very well done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee. He does not seem to be in the Chamber at present.

While the Senator from New York is being found, I will call attention to one point that I think is important. If I read the proposed amendments correctly, taking the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, it would allow foreign-built vessels with foreign officers, not complying with our inspection laws, to load at Puget Sound with a cargo for San Francisco, load there with another cargo through the Panama Canal for Galveston or New Orleans, and load there with another cargo for Philadelphia or New York or Boston. Now, it occurs to me that every foreign-built ship admitted under our flag in the lax way provided in this bill would be sure to take advantage of such an opportunity to invade American trade instead of taking the hazards of carrying American wheat and cotton, with the war danger, to points in Europe. The purpose of this bill—to provide ships in an emergency for our export commerce—would be practically nullified by the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware; and it would be almost, if not altogether, nullified by the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. O'GORMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New York has returned, I see. Will the Senator permit me to make this observation to him? As the Senator has observed, this side of the Chamber is considerably wrecked, so far as attendance is concerned. The two Senators from Massachusetts are away, the junior Senator having been called away this afternoon. I have just been communicated with from Boston, over the long-distance telephone, by men of consequence there, who say that they are considerably disturbed over this situation, and that they are going to have a conference on Monday, composed of all classes of their people, to discuss the matter; and that they would very much like, if it could be brought about, to have this bill go over until Tuesday.

I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he will not agree, provided the Senate will agree to it, to have this bill go over until 2 o'clock on Tuesday, and then take the same procedure that was taken on the trade commission bill, with 10-minute speeches, and vote on the amendments and final passage of the bill at 6 o'clock on Tuesday? I assure the Senator that this is not trivial. It is the request of men whose wishes, if possible, ought to be complied with.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am very reluctant, of course, not to yield to any suggestion coming from the Senator from New Hampshire. The truth is, however, that more than 48 hours ago—two days ago—the junior Senator from Massachusetts requested that the consideration of certain phases of this legislation be withheld, or that a determination regarding them be deferred, until he received the details of objections that were coming to him from Boston. The matter was held for some hours to accommodate him in that respect, and I think he received a telegram containing such objections as his constituents in Boston cared to convey to him.

Would it meet the views the Senator has in mind to have the merits of these suggestions considered in conference, and in that way let us proceed with the passage of the bill and take up those considerations when we confer with the representatives of the House? There is a pressing need for immediate legislation on this subject. The Chamber of Commerce of New York, a very large and influential body, as the Senator knows, passed resolutions yesterday dwelling on the urgency of this legislation. They want boats and they want them as quickly as they can get them.

It was stated a few moments ago by the Senator from North Dakota that if this bill passes about the only vessels that would avail themselves of its provisions would be the Standard Oil boats and the boats of a fruit company.

I can assure the Senator that there are other ships prepared to take advantage of this law as soon as it is passed. There are five boats of the so-called Red Star Line plying between New York and Philadelphia and Antwerp, probably belonging to an American corporation but now flying the Belgian flag. They are prepared just as soon as this five-year limitation is removed to sail under the American flag.

I know of another company having four boats owned by an American corporation. Two of them are under five years, two others were built more than five years, but they want the four boats to fly under one flag, and if this five years' limitation is removed they will promptly, with their four boats, avail themselves of this provision. The firm of William R. Grace & Co., acting under the name of some corporation—I think it is the Atlantic & Pacific Steamship Co.—have some 8 or 10 or 12 boats. The corporation is an American corporation and these boats are all flying the British flag. They are prepared to fly the American flag as soon as this bill is passed.

The immediate suggestion I wish to urge upon the Senator from New Hampshire, having in mind the request that he has made, is that we proceed and pass the bill. The bill, if passed, will differ very much from the House bill and will require a conference, at which time the views of the people from Boston can be considered. Will that meet the situation?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been a Member of this body too long to stake very much on a conference committee. I have had too much experience in that line. Yet I appreciate the courteous suggestion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. POMERENE. Would the Senator have any objection to stating the nature of the objections that are raised?

Mr. GALLINGER. The objection is to the coastwise provision. I think if that did not become a part of the law there would be no serious apprehension, and that, I apprehend, is the objection on the part of the people of Boston.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator really think, after the very full and more or less exhaustive discussion of all the aspects of this situation in which the various Senators indulged, we will know more about the situation by holding the matter over in order to ascertain the views of citizens in different parts of the country?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am of opinion that we probably would not be greatly influenced by what might be said or done, and yet this is only asking practically for two days' delay. It is not a very unusual request.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In an emergency such as this is—and it must be recognized as an emergency—two days' delay might have serious consequences. I hope the Senator upon reflection will see that no interest will suffer by allowing the bill to proceed to a vote to-night. I have so much respect for the Senator from New Hampshire that I know no view can come from the citizens of Boston or any other city that has not been advanced by him with great earnestness and impressiveness during this debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. My own attitude, as far as the bill is concerned, is that I want to vote for the original bill. Of course I do not for a moment imagine that my vote is going to determine the fate of the bill anyway, but I would not vote for it with the coastwise provision attached to it; and I had hoped that, recognizing this emergency, the Senator from New York would adhere to the original bill, not necessarily as it came from the House, but simply the proposition that we should endeavor to get ships for our foreign trade.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will say to the Senator that the committee has not announced its views as a committee regarding the merits of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but I notice that the Senator from New York, with a good deal of alacrity, indorsed it the other day.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I was so impressed with the merits of the proposition as presented by the Senator from Washington that I took the liberty of stating that I viewed his proposal favorably, speaking only for myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have made the request, and, of course, that is all I can do. I want to say now in just 10 words, more or less, that I believe this coastwise provision in the bill will absolutely nullify the purpose of the original act.

Mr. President, when a foreign ship can be put in the trade between Puget Sound and Maine, transferring its cargo at three or four different points, for Heaven's sake why should that ship want to go in the foreign trade and take the dangers that will encounter it on the high seas? You will not get ships in the foreign trade if this coastwise provision is in the law. You will get ships in the coastwise trade, and it will give no relief to certain sections of the country, so far as their products are concerned; but it will be, in my opinion, an absolute nullity, so far as adding to our foreign fleet is concerned.

That is my judgment, and that is an added reason why I wish that the bill might be stripped of that complication and that we might vote on the original proposition.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator, and also call the attention of the Senator from New York to this point. I do not understand the proposition, apparently, as to where this emergency exists. I have understood that this was an emergency with reference to the foreign trade of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what they say.

Mr. FALL. If there is an emergency with reference to the coastwise trade, it is perfectly proper, possibly, to deal with it at this time in connection with the bill generally; but if the emergency is with reference to the foreign trade, then why inject the coastwise proposition into it? Thinking of it as I do, I am thoroughly in favor of the passage of the original bill or the bill as it came from the committee, but I am very doubtful about the effect of the enactment of the proposed amendment with reference to the coastwise trade. It may, if embodied in the bill, affect my vote, and doubtless it will do so.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, before proceeding to a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware I desire to say just a word. I shall not discuss the subject at length, because I do not want to protract the debate, but it is my judgment that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware be adopted every good purpose intended to flow from the passage of this legislation will be destroyed. At the present time, without amending the law, a vessel not more than 5 years old and flying a foreign flag may be registered and permitted to fly the American flag if the vessel is owned by an American corporation, provided the officers and directors of the American corporation are citizens of the country. Under that law, which is the existing law, I can not conceive of a case where 95 per cent of the stock of the corporation might be held by a foreigner. All the stock might be held by a foreigner except the few shares that might be necessary to qualify the officers.

That is the existing law, but we find that that law is insufficient for our present purposes and we are attempting now to liberalize the law. How does the Senator from Delaware propose to liberalize it? By imposing a condition that at least 51 per cent of the stock of the American corporation must be in the hands of American citizens.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have the floor. I simply want to make one further suggestion to the Senator from New York. I understand the other House will take an adjournment this evening until Tuesday next. So if my original request should be acceded to it certainly would not make more than one day's delay in the final consideration of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I leave the matter, having performed my duty.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If a corporation was organized for the purpose of claiming the privileges of the American law of registry, and, say, 95 per cent of its stock was owned by France or by French citizens, and the vessel was flying the American flag, does not the Senator from New York feel that we might become seriously involved with Germany or with Austria under those conditions?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Not at all. We do not intend by this remedial legislation to aid citizens of this country who are willing to resort to subterfuge and evasion of our laws.

Mr. POMERENE. No; but, Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. We are only offering protection so far as we may to citizens of our country who in good faith buy a foreign ship without the intent or design or purpose of evading the consequences of the war.

Mr. POMERENE. No; Mr. President, that is not the point I had in mind. My thought is that it would enable the French citizen owning this stock under the protection of the American flag to evade the laws of the sea during a time of war.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; in the case the Senator supposes if 95 per cent, 97 per cent, or a very large percentage of the stock were held by citizens of France, it would go very far toward justifying a finding by the prize court that the transfer of the ship or of the flag was not done in good faith, and the purchasers of the ship and those who sail the ship would take the consequences of their own conduct.

Mr. POMERENE. And in the meanwhile the vessel would be flying our flag and our flag would be subject to insult.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It would not be subject to insult where the persons using the ship were consciously evading the law.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. Take the present state of the law with the five-year limitation, which was incorporated in the Panama Canal, could not the very point which has been made by the Senator from Ohio be made against the present law?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly. I tried to suggest that a moment ago.

Mr. SHIVELY. I do not know whether 5 per cent or 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the stock of the American Mercantile Marine Co. belongs to citizens of the United States at all; it may be not over 5 per cent; yet they have ships flying the American flag; and foreigners might make the point that that is a subterfuge.

Mr. POMERENE. But, if I may be permitted, it is true it is possible for vessels that are more than 5 years old to evade the provisions in the way indicated, but now we are seeking to strike out the five-year provision and in my judgment we are increasing the opportunities for the evasion of these laws.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Wherever the evasion takes place the consequences of the evasion will fall upon the individuals who are guilty of that conduct, and it will not involve the Government; it will not constitute an insult to our flag. I think our Government would be quite content to see any ship captured and condemned in a prize court when the United States Government was deceived by some of its citizens acting in cooperation with foreigners in some purpose to evade our laws and violate the rules of neutrality.

Mr. POMERENE. But if one of these vessels is flying the American flag, and it should be approached by a belligerent and they should demand a surrender, it gives every excuse to the owners of that vessel to demand the protection of the American arm.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The only protection the American Government is called upon to give in a case such as the Senator suggests is to see that the owner of that vessel receives a fair trial. If he buys his ship since hostilities began, the presumption is against him that he bought it for the purpose of evading the consequences of the law. The burden is on him of overcoming that presumption, if he can, by satisfactory proof, showing that he purchased it in good faith, and that it was a bona fide transaction and was not designed for the purpose of escaping the consequences of the war. If he fails in establishing those requirements, he will take the consequences, and his ship will be condemned and confiscated.

Mr. POMERENE. If 95 per cent of the stock in a given vessel is now owned by French citizens, does it not just continue, in fact, as a French vessel, even though it be under an American corporation?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not quite catch the point of the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. POMERENE. My point is that if we have a vessel now flying the American flag, and we will say by way of illustration that 95 per cent of the vessel is owned by French citizens, suppose they desire an American register and they incorporate under the New Jersey law and continue to own 95 per cent of the stock in the new corporation after the formal transfer has been made, what advantage is American shipping to have from such a situation?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It may have no particular advantage. Surely it would be no particular detriment. If that particular ship, in the circumstances described by the Senator, should be seized by an enemy of the belligerent that sold the ship, and if the prize court condemned the transaction as a mere subterfuge. I think all the facts as related by the Senator from Ohio would seem to justify such a decision.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me that it would have this disadvantage, that it enables the owners to adopt a mere ruse for the protection of our flag.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New York evidently has not in mind the point that troubles me. Under the law as it is a vessel that is owned abroad entirely, if it be in the name of an American corporation, is entitled to American registry. It is a very bad law, but that is neither here nor there. There has been no danger from the law up to this time. Why? Because we require that the watch officers shall be Americans. We require that the survey and inspection and all other precautions shall be taken under American rule.

Therefore, there was no inducement whatever for a foreign-owned ship, even though there had been interposed the figment of an American corporation, to take an American register; but now we propose to continue that law which permits an American corporation, owned entirely by foreigners, to secure the benefit of the protection of American registry and at the same time, in the presence of the war, we propose to give the President the power to suspend or set aside the only protection we have or that our flag has, namely, the interposition of American commanding officers and American survey and inspection.

I do not know, of course, how a foreign power would look at that act of legislation; but if some other country were to do the same thing when the American nation was at war, I should look upon it as an exceedingly unfriendly act; I should look upon it as an indefensible act; for it is not merely intended to continue the privilege of foreigners to own a corporation which has registered a ship under our law, but we propose also to confer upon that ship the privilege of being officered and manned entirely by foreigners.

Can not the Senator from New York see that if we enact legislation of this sort, and a transfer is made, with the entire officers, under our law, which does not require one penny of interest upon the part of American citizens, and then waive or suspend those provisions of the law which did require the ship to become in some part and to some extent American—does he not see that a foreign nation might well say, "We look upon a transfer of that sort as hostile, as unfriendly; we look upon the suspension of those safeguards and those characteristics which make the ship American instead of foreign as evidence of ill will toward us?" I feel, Mr. President, that we are doing a very unwise thing.

I make this suggestion to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator allow an answer to his first suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised at the Senator's statement that if the same thing which we propose doing were done by a foreign power he would regard it as an unfriendly act. There is nothing to justify that view.

There are three things that we propose doing by this law: The first, and the most important one, is to allow property conceded to be property of American citizens to fly the American flag.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therein I disagree with the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is the most important of the three. The next is to allow American citizens to purchase from neutral powers ships which we so badly need. No man can find any fault with that, and no man can find any fault with the first proposal.

It is true that it will also be possible under this bill as proposed, if it be enacted into law, for an American citizen to buy a vessel from a belligerent and have the foreign flag lowered and the American flag substituted for it. If he does that while the war is in progress, if he makes a purchase under those circumstances, he is taking the risk of his ship being captured by an enemy of the belligerent from whom he purchases it. That is the risk that the individual takes, and it does not concern the Government.

Now, getting back to the first proposition, which, as I say, is a most important one, we need more ships. We are confronted with a crisis where the products of our fields and of our factories are being piled up, with values declining because of our want of facilities for foreign transportation to the markets where those products would be purchased and used. We find, because of more or less unfavorable navigation laws, that there is a fleet of merchantmen flying foreign flags to-day owned by American citizens. We want to facilitate the transfer of that fleet of merchantmen to the American service. Who can find fault with allowing American citizens to use the flag of their own country?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think no one can find any fault with that; but I desire now to analyze the proposition made by the Senator from New York. Suppose that a ship lies in New York Harbor, owned by a corporation organized under the laws of Germany or of England, it matters not which, and it dares not venture out upon the ocean. We desire to use it for the purpose of transporting our products abroad. Under our law, as it now is and has been for a long while, as I have discovered, there could be in the course of a few hours a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey. The foreign corporation could transfer to an American corporation the ship, and the foreign stockholders could take share for share, just as they hold their interest in the foreign corporation, shares of the American corporation. Assuming that they put in Americans without any interest whatever, save a nominal one, as a majority of the officers and a majority of the directors, that corporation would be entitled under our law to register the ship and to obtain all the protection that our register can confer.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator has not completed the situation, if I may be pardoned for saying so.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have not yet completed it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I was going to say that before registry is granted the representative of the Treasury Department—the collector of the port—will inquire into the bona fides of that transaction.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is absolutely bona fides; there is no color about it; the transfer is made in exact accordance with our law. Our law does not require any American interest in the ship; it simply requires that the corporation shall be organized under the laws of the United States or under the laws of one of the States; and the case that I put would be beyond inquiry. There could be no objection to it, either by the collector or the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else, for it would be done exactly as we had provided in our law for the doing of those things.

I pursue that case a little further: The ship takes an American registry; goes out upon the seas. It could not be condemned at any prize court in the world if our law withstood the test of scrutiny. If our law which permits a vessel under those circumstances to take an American registry is sound and valid, there could be no inquiry into it, because there would be no bad faith; it would be done for the obvious purpose of giving that ship the registry to which she is entitled.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong in some of his premises. He does not see the distinction for the moment between the domestic law, which is our statute, and the requirements of international law, which is binding upon the citizens of all nations of the world.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean to say that he intends to preserve a law in our country, knowing that if it is obeyed literally and a ship is seized the law may be disregarded under international understanding and the ship be condemned nevertheless?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; I have not said that.

Mr. CUMMINS. That seems to be the conclusion.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will make plain what I wish to say and what I think I did say: A statute passed by Congress is the domestic law of the country; it operates between the Government and its citizens, but any action under it must harmonize with the principles of international law. I can well conceive a case where a ship is purchased even while the war is on and the purchase be upheld and the principles of international law not be offended. It will not offend the principles of neutrality if the purchase, as a matter of fact, is a bona fide purchase, not made—and that is the test—not made with the design to evade the consequences of the pending war. If in a given case before a prize court the prize court determines that the transaction in question was a bona fide one, that the transfer was not made for the purpose of escaping the consequences of the war, the seizure will be set aside; but, on the other hand, if the court finds, as it will undoubtedly in many of these cases, if there be purchasers of ships from belligerents while the war is pending, that the transfer was nothing more than a subterfuge to escape the consequences of the war, then they will hold that the transaction was not a bona fide sale, and they will condemn and confiscate the property.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am utterly unable to see that distinction. If we have a law which is being honestly and faithfully enforced, but nevertheless subjects those who take a position under it to the judgment of a prize court, so that our people can not do the very thing which our laws contemplate may be done——

Mr. O'GORMAN. In good faith.

Mr. CUMMINS. In good faith, of course. In perfect good faith; there is no bad faith about that; they come to the conclusion that they would rather organize an American corporation because they want an American registry. Now, if we want to avoid the consequences that have been pointed out, we ought to say that, as to transactions occurring during the European war, anyhow, when there is peril upon every side of us, there ought to be an actual investment of American capital in each ship. In that way we will present the foreign nations with evidence of our good faith; but there is nobody who pretends to say that one dollar of American capital will be invested in the future in these ships, upon the reliance that the suspension of our navigation laws will continue indefinitely. No one in his senses will claim that an American capitalist will invest his money under any such condition. If you were to change the law permanently in accordance with the authority that you give the President to change it temporarily, we might have some hope of securing American capital to invest in ships for the foreign trade, but there is no such purpose.

I now renew my suggestion: There are some of us who fear that the transactions which are capable of being carried out under our law will offend the powers who are at war, and there are some of us who believe that the peril of that offense is more to be dreaded than any advantage that we can get in the future through the transfer of ships to American registry.

The Senator from New York has not indicated that there is any chance of buying ships that are now really owned abroad; we all know there is no such chance, and why not limit the provisions of this to ships now owned by Americans or American corporations? No foreign nation could justly complain if we take off some of the burdens of our navigation laws with regard to ships that our people under our laws already own, even though they be now sailing under some foreign registry. The people of this country would acquire all of the advantages that it is even suggested they can acquire if that limitation were inserted, and then all this difficulty would disappear.

I do not say that the amendment of the Senator from Washington necessarily would be abandoned, nor do I have the authority to speak for the Senator from Delaware; but, so far as I am concerned, having offered an amendment along the same line, if the power of the President to suspend our navigation laws is limited to ships that are already owned by American citizens or American corporations, so that they can fly the flag of their own country upon their own ships, there can be no reasonable objection to the measure, and inasmuch as that would obviate the peril, or at least minimize the peril, or the danger that I have in mind and accomplish the purpose the Senator from New York has in mind, in perfectly good faith I make that suggestion to him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa. Much has been said about the predicament in which these people would be placed who purchased foreign ships and took out registry under this act if the suspension were subsequently canceled. Is it the understanding of the Senator that a ship taking registry under the provisions of this act would lose her character as an American ship and her registry would be unavailing to her if subsequently the order were recalled?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not given much thought to that particular question, but my impression is that if a foreign ship should be bought by an American citizen or by an American corporation and should take an American registry, and the President, having suspended that part of the law which he is given the authority to suspend here, should revoke the suspension, thereafter the ship would be burdened with the conditions of all our navigation laws.

Mr. WALSH. But those conditions are conditions precedent to registry, and that has already gone by.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not only conditions precedent to registry, but they are conditions precedent, I fancy, to a right to retain the protection of the registry.

Mr. WALSH. I have not been able so to read the law; and so I was quite unable to understand why the Senator should say that it was an act practically of idiocy for anyone to take advantage of the law, seeing that he would lose it as soon as the order was recalled.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the law is so phrased as to make it perfectly certain that a ship once under our registry and entitled to sail with foreign officers and foreign crew without American inspection or survey shall always be immune from our laws in those respects, some of the reasons I have given for believing that no American would invest his capital in these ships would disappear.

Mr. WALSH. I am not prepared to express an opinion about the suspension in relation to the nationality of the officers, but I can not conceive that the benefit accruing to one who complies with the requirements of the law and then obtains American registry for his ship would be lost afterwards because the order was subsequently recalled.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose there is no vested right in a certificate of registry. I assume that the jurisdiction of the United States continues and that it can impose just such conditions as it pleases with regard to the operation of the ship.

I might ask the Senator from New York what he thinks with regard to the question propounded by the Senator from Montana?

I will put it concretely. Suppose that the law is passed, and that an American buys a ship officered and manned entirely with foreigners and not complying with our laws or rules with respect to survey and inspection. The emergency disappears, and the President recalls his proclamation, so that the law as it now is continues to be the law of the land. Could that ship indefinitely continue in operation, with foreign officers and crew, and without being subject to our laws as to sanitation, survey, and inspection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the Senator from New York answers the question I should like to say that it is not exactly the one I propounded to the Senator. I did not ask him about the nationality of the officers, nor the matter of survey. I propounded to him the question simply as to the registry; and I should like to have the Senator from New York, when he answers that question, likewise answer whether he does not think that if that were the effect of the law the President of the United States, in recalling the order, would attach to it a condition to the effect that it should not be operative as against those who had purchased on the strength and on the faith of the order; and whether it would not be a breach of faith upon the part of our Government that we ought not to anticipate that the order would be recalled without such a condition?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think the Senator from Montana suggests the true solution of the question, because, in a measure, these requirements are precedents to registration. My own judgment is that the requirement with regard to the watch officers being American citizens under the language of the statute, which is not now before me, is continuous; and if at any time, with respect to that phase of the navigation law, the President were to recall his suspension, those requirements would become operative at once, unless the President did what the Senator from Montana suggests he would do, and which in justice and fairness he ought to do under those circumstances, and permitted vessels that secured registry under the exemption of this act to continue to man their vessels as they had been manned when the registry was granted, bearing in mind always that this provision with regard to the suspension of the requirement touching the watch officers is dependent upon the number of available persons for that employment being insufficient. I think when the time came that we had as many American citizens qualified for that service as were needed, neither the President nor the Congress, within their several jurisdictions, would allow any ship flying the American flag to be maned by foreign watch officers.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York why this provision is inserted in the committee bill in reference to the purchase by corporations of foreign-built ships:

> The president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States.

Was there any object in requiring the president and managing directors of the American corporation to be citizens of the United States?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nevada that that is the precise language adopted in the Panama Canal act of two years ago. We are simply repeating it in this act. At that time it was proposed to modify the law somewhat, in order to help build up a merchant marine in this country and to meet the demand of the Panama Canal trade, and for the first time there was a provision inserted in our laws permitting a foreign-built ship to receive an American registry, provided the ship was owned by a citizen of the United States or by an American corporation. Having in mind the possibility of an American corporation being formed with foreigners having a substantial interest in it, those who framed that bill at that time—two years ago—thought enough was done in that direction by requiring that all officers of the corporation organized in the United States should be American citizens.

Mr. PITTMAN. And the Senator has the same purpose in this bill?

Mr. O'GORMAN. We are simply repeating the same thought; yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. With a desire to accomplish the same purpose?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it not true that if directors of that character were elected by foreigners who owned practically all of the stock, they would be simply dummy directors subject to the will and control of the foreign stockholders?

Mr. O'GORMAN. You can conceive of such a case. I do not know whether any such case exists, ever has existed, or ever will exist, but I can conceive the possibility of such a situation arising in a given case.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it not probable that American directors who owned only nominal stock, the rest of the stock being owned by foreigners, would, from the necessity of the case, be dummies?

Mr. O'GORMAN. They might or might not be. I remember recently, in some investigation affecting one of the large railroads in the Southern States, a very large railroad, where the president and all the the directors each had but a few shares of stock. No one would accuse those officers of being mere dummies, much as the public was surprised by the fact that the responsible officers individually had such a small holding in their own corporation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, while I do not desire to accuse anyone of being a dummy, nevertheless, as we understand that word, a director who is acting not by reason of his interest in a corporation, but in the interest of some other stockholder of a corporation, is a dummy. If this provision of the bill was intended as a protection by the Senator, it is an admission that protection is needed in such a case; and if protection is needed in such a case, it can not be had through the president and board of directors unless a majority of the stockholders are American citizens who are in sympathy with an American board of directors.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator know of any statute in any State in the Union that requires that a majority of the stock in a corporation should be held by citizens of the United States?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I do not; and yet I have often thought that the misuse of the corporation laws of the various States could be materially remedied if we would stop these vagrant corporations organizing in one State and doing no business at all there, but doing business entirely in another State.

In this particular it does seem that if this committee believes that these corporations should be managed by American citizens, there should be a power in the corporation which would insure that management at all times.

Under the present condition an American president and an American board of directors could be elected to-day, and, under the laws of nearly all the States in the country, could be removed the day after the registration was obtained and another board of directors put in. There is no question but that they would be dummy directors if control was owned in some foreign country, and there is no doubt that that provision could be made use of to perpetrate a subterfuge.

The Senator goes so far in his bill as to state that these vessels must be owned wholly by an individual or by a partnership. That is done, evidently, in recognition of the international law with regard to purchasing vessels of a belligerent; and yet the Senator is not willing——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Let me say to the Senator that if he were familiar with the language of the Panama Canal act of 1912 he would know that the precise language that found its appearance for the first time in that act is retained in this bill, and at that time there was no thought of belligerency or purchase from citizens of a belligerent nation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly at that time it was sufficient, but at the present time we are faced with belligerency, and it does not offer any protection to have a president and a board of directors managing a corporation when they are subject to the control of a board of stockholders who are citizens of a belligerent country. It does seem that the Senator should be willing to insure that at least the managing board of that corporation would be American citizens who were interested in maintaining and upholding the laws of the United States. The Senator states that if a prize court should determine that a vessel had obtained its registration and that the sale had been made for the purpose of evading the exigencies of war, such a vessel would be treated as a prize of war, and that that question does not concern the United States Government, but simply concerns the shipowner who buys that ship. I can not look at the matter in that way. I think it does concern the United States Government to whom it shall lend its flag. I think it does concern the United States Government when it induces the people of this country to ship their produce abroad on a vessel which we can determine before it is shipped would be condemned as a prize of war in case it were seized by a vessel of one of the belligerents. Those are material matters; and if a prize court should hold that it was a subterfuge and should hold that all the privileges and benefits of ownership still inured to the same foreign corporation that pretended to sell the ship, if a prize court should hold that the foreign corporation in selling to the American corporation received no consideration for it and that the sale was void, then it would go as a prize of war.

In this case, when the proper officers examine into this transfer, if they find that the transfer is simply for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of avoiding the exigencies of war, it is the duty of some power in this country to say, "We will not recognize that kind of a sale, and we will not let you use the American flag; we will not permit you to jeopardize our Government and its citizens." That is all this amendment amounts to. It does not place any greater restrictions on corporations in this bill, in my opinion, than are placed on individuals. It does not place any greater restriction than the Senator's own bill purports to place, unless he wants to agree that his bill does cover a subterfuge purposely.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator mean to imply that a committee of the Senate has framed a bill designed to cover a subterfuge?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I do not; and that is exactly the reason why I am trying to correct this language. I said, unless the Senator wanted to agree to that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I suggest that the Senator might correct the language he employed a moment ago, which, in view of his assurance that he had no such intention, was a very infelicitous employment of phraseology.

Mr. PITTMAN. I regret that the Senator was not listening to me instead of reading correspondence from New York at the time I addressed him. Had he listened to my whole remarks, he would have found out that I gave him credit for trying to do the best he could for this whole Government.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am not going to get into a controversy with the distinguished Senator from Nevada. As a matter of fact, I was reading a communication handed to me by one of the officers of the Senate a moment ago, but at the same time I heard everything the Senator said.

Mr. PITTMAN. I regret that I made a mistake in regard to the Senator's New York constituency; but I am in earnest with regard to this provision. My opinion probably will have no weight with the Senator from New York, and I should be expecting too much if I did expect it; but I am compelled to vote on this bill, and whether the Senator's committee intended by the language used to cover a subterfuge or not, which I do not believe they did, it is capable, as he admits, of covering a subterfuge. I shall never silently vote for any bill that permits such a subterfuge. I want to say now that there is no one in this body who knows more about fictions in corporations than does the Senator from New York. He knows absolutely that under this bill the change of ownership could only be a fiction. He knows that if a majority of the stock was not bona fide owned by citizens of the United States it would not be a bona fide transaction as far as belligerent nations are concerned. There is no Senator on this floor who understands better than does the Senator from New York that the very reason why they are fighting this amendment is so that our flag and our register may be given to a ship in which all the benefits and all the privileges of the absolute control are still in the hands of the foreigners, and belligerents at that, and such condition of affairs is dangerous to the peace of our country and the welfare of its citizens and should not be given opportunity for existence.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I may be absent at the time the bill is voted upon. I desire to introduce an amendment giving the right to the American Red Cross to charter a ship, in a slightly amended form, adding the clause, "And in the operation of any such ship the President is authorized to suspend the laws requiring American officers, if such officers are not readily available," so as to make the amendment read:

SEC. —. That, with the consent of the President and during the continuance of hostilities in Europe, any ship chartered by the American Red Cross for relief purposes shall be admitted to American registry under the provisions of this act and shall be entitled to carry the American flag. And in the operation of any such ship the President is authorized to suspend the laws requiring American officers, if such officers are not readily available.

Will the Senator from New York consent that this amendment be immediately taken up and passed upon now?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have no objection at all. I think it is a very meritorious amendment, and it ought to be incorporated into the bill.

Mr. BURTON. I ask for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire to address the Senate upon the bill, but I have a number of telegrams expressing the necessity for the passage of the measure which I send to the desk, and instead of having them read I ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he has any confident expectations of disposing of the bill this afternoon. I ask the question for the reason that it is very important that we should have an executive session, and if the matter is to go over, as is intimated to me, probably until Tuesday, I would be very glad if the Senator would consent to make any arrangement he can for its final disposition.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not know of any other Senator who desires to speak on this amendment.

Mr. JONES. While I will not desire to speak to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, I will probably desire to speak on my amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. How long, may I ask the Senator from Missouri, will the executive session last?

Mr. STONE. If we go into executive session I should think we would not be able to come back into legislative session this afternoon, unless we propose to stay to-night later than usual.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What time does the Senator from Washington think he will require on his amendment?

Mr. JONES. I will not speak more than 10 minutes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We ought to be able to vote, then, in 15 minutes.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware a question about his amendment.

Mr. STONE. While I am as anxious as any Senator to pass the bill to-night, I was asking the judgment of the Senator in charge of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. So far as I understand, the only Senator who desires to speak is the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and he states that he probably will not occupy over 10 minutes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is another amendment which I proposed on which I think I can say everything I care to say in five minutes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would make a total of 15 minutes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think it will occupy more than five minutes as far as I am concerned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to have about five minutes on the amendment which I proposed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is only 20 minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. If I understand the Senator from New York correctly, he is not disposed to yield for an executive session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am quite sure the Senator from Missouri will agree with me that if we can get this legislation out of the way in from 20 to 30 minutes we will employ our time to advantage in doing so, even though we might sit after 6 o'clock for the executive session.

Mr. STONE. I was going to inquire if there would be any objection on the part of any Senator after this bill is completed, if it is completed to-day, to take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday morning, with the understanding that the Senate will go into executive session at once to take up the matters the Committee on Foreign Relations has to present. I have reference to the treaties.

Mr. KERN entered the Chamber.

Mr. STONE. I sent for the Senator from Indiana. I was asking whether there would be any objection to the Senate recessing until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that there may be no misunderstanding as to my position, I do not propose to occupy any further time in debate; but several Senators have left the Chamber necessarily within the last hour, and have said to me that they did not want a vote on these amendments this afternoon, and they hoped they would not be voted on, unless there was a quorum of the Senate present. I shall see that in that regard their wishes are complied with. I do not know but that there is a quorum here. I shall ask that there shall be one.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator object to my request?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection at all to the Senator's request.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask, under the circumstances, that we proceed with the regular order and take up the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. STONE. Before that is done, if the Senator will pardon me, I make a request for unanimous consent.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Then the roll must be called.

Mr. STONE. I am just reminded that it will be necessary to call for a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not on such a request.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not necessary to call for a quorum on a unanimous-consent agreement to meet at a certain hour on Monday.

Mr. STONE. If the Chair is of that opinion, I will ask unanimous consent that when the Senate takes a recess or concludes its business the recess be taken until 11 o'clock on Monday next, and that upon reassembling the Senate will resolve itself into executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. STONE. What was the announcement of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last announcement of the Chair was that the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. STONE. No; as to the suggestion for a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. At what time do we recess?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Whenever the Senate does recess.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the request is a little weak unless it fixes a time at which we shall take the recess. I hardly know how it will be intended.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can say we will recess at 6 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware a question about his amendment. I see it provides that after the foreign-built ship is registered it shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States except to engage in the coastwise trade from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Does the Senator understand that the provision of the bill that it shall have all the rights and privileges of vessels of the United States gives it the right of a vessel engaged or that can engage in the coastwise trade?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not, Mr. President, under this amendment, because it expressly provides that the vessel shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal, meaning by that coast-to-coast trade.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator understand that the language of his amendment, if this exception were omitted, would give these vessels all the privileges of the coastwise trade?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I frankly confess that I am unable to answer the Senator with such specific definiteness as I would like to do. I am not technically aware of the difference between a vessel of the United States registered for foreign trade and one which is solely engaged in the coastwise trade.

Mr. JONES. I will ask the Senator, then, whether it was his intention to give them those rights?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not for employment in the coastwise trade.

Mr. JONES. That is the reason why the Senator put in this exception?

Mr. SAULSBURY. My intention was to admit them to what might be considered ordinary coastwise trade and not to allow them to go beyond; because I appreciate, if the Senator will permit me, that that is a very large question, which requires very great care and consideration before we change our navigation laws.

Mr. JONES. Is the Senator of opinion that the language used here would give these vessels the right to engage in the coastwise trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. JONES. I do have a doubt of it. If there is not any doubt about it, I understand it will cover my amendment in that particular and probably in other particulars. But what occurred to me was that this amendment provides for the registry of these vessels. I understand vessels are registered for the foreign trade and enrolled for the coastwise trade. When you provide for the registry of these vessels and then give them the rights and privileges of vessels of the United States I have no doubt that they would be given the rights of registered vessels of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will permit me, I am perfectly willing to accept an amendment phrased in this way, which will undoubtedly do what he desires, beginning in line 15, to read: "Except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States, but may engage in a voyage which requires its passage through the Panama Canal."

Is the Senator entirely satisfied with that or anything equivalent to that? That seems to me to be specific.

Mr. JONES. I was going to suggest to the Senator that in line 15, after the word "of," to insert the words "built in." Then, with his exception, it would cover it. In other words, let it read: "It shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of vessels built in the United States, except that it shall not"——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will be entirely satisfied to accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, strike out the word "of" where it occurs the second time, after the word "vessel," and insert the words "built in," so as to read "of a vessel built in the United States."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Delaware modifies the amendment as indicated it will accomplish exactly what the Senator from Washington attempted to accomplish by his separate amendment, as I read it.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware, inasmuch as his amendment makes a separate section of the bill, if he thinks that the provision of section 4132 of the United States Statutes, which is now amended in the bill, can be construed in connection with his proposed amendment without conflict?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me draw the attenion of the Senator to the point to which I refer specifically. Section 4132 provides that seagoing vessels may be registered when they are wholly owned by citizens or by corporations of the United States, and the Senator's amendment provides that they may be registered if not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in the steamship is the bona fide property of citizens or of the corporation. Now, which would control?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should say that the 90 per cent would control, as it was a later section in the act, and that the courts would construe the 90 per cent probably to mean that corporations might own anything up to the 90 per cent, provided that a majority of the holding company belonged to the citizens of the United States. That would be my impression.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me, Mr. President, that section 4132 ought to be amended so as to show exactly what the ownership was.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that might be done very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it would be much better if it were done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I suggest if this amendment should carry we could immediately make that 90 per cent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the object of this legislation, as the Senator from New York suggested, is to open the gates to liberalize the statute, what is the object in narrowing and contracting it by limiting the number of vessels that may be acquired in the way proposed by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The only object, I may say, Mr. President, that I have in offering this amendment is to provide in this time of war, when we are almost the only neutral in the whole world among the powers of the first class, that we shall, before we send vessels out under our flag to raise questions with belligerents and have our shipping seized, be sure that we are justified in saying that those vessels shall carry our flag and are entitled to the protection which their nationality should throw around them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That does not answer the inquiry I have in my mind. It may be I did not make it plain to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then, I do not understand the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As the statute now stands, such a vessel, in order to be brought under the American flag, has to be wholly owned by citizens of the United States or by corporations of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator heard the remarks of the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Or if he had heard the remarks which I made previously on this amendment, he would have known that I instanced a supposable case—that the German ship, for example, now in a harbor in the State of Maine, the Kronprinzessen Cecilia, might immediately be transferred to a Maine corporation, which, so far as American ownership was concerned, might be almost entirely fictitious, simply having enough stock transferred to American citizens to enable a corporation to be formed, but the boat itself belonging to an American corporation. It could then be registered under our laws, and immediately sail out from Bar Harbor under the American flag. I do not think we would be justified in permitting any such subterfuge or fraud as that upon the belligerents.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, if it is supposable that the German owners of that ship would trustee the directorship, what is to prevent them from trusteeing the stock ownership of the ship? If they can trust the board of directors with the direction or the actual control of the company, what is to prevent them from trusting them with the physical possession and ownership, under an implied trust agreement, of the stock? I do not see that the amendment helps any in that respect.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the wording of the amendment will answer that. Before the ship can obtain American registry the Secretary of the Treasury must be satisfied that 90 per cent of the capital invested in the ship is the bona fide property of citizens of the United States.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; but it is not very easily ascertained whether or not a stock transfer is bona fide. The mere fact that the stock is transferred on the books of the company is all that the Secretary of the Treasury can inquire into; and it seems to me that the provisions made in the original bill calling upon the Secretary of the Navy and various other maritime officers to assure themselves of the bona fides of the transaction contain every safeguard that the Senator's amendment contains.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if the Senator please, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury are not connected with any investigation under our present laws.

Under this bill, without amendment, the only act which is required to be done to give a ship American registry under such circumstances is a mere ministerial act; the recording of the bill of sale by the collector of a port entitles a ship to registry. There is no care exercised; nobody considers any question as to the true ownership of the vessel; and my amendment has been drafted to avoid the embarrassment which this country would surely suffer in case—although I do not think such a thing would happen—the Government were called upon to defend its flag when it covered a fraudulent purpose. It is to avoid just such questions as that that the approval of the transfer by the Secretary of the Treasury is first required before any collector can record the bill of sale.

The additional safeguard is required under the subsequent amendment that I have presented that after a vessel takes American registry, before it can relieve itself of its American registry the Secretary of the Treasury must again consent and approve of any transfer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say about that, Mr. President, that while I appreciate the object of it, and I think it is commendable, so far as it might control the bona fides of the transaction, I think in practical operation it would be likely to interfere greatly with the acquisition by the people of this country of any foreign-built steamships, because it provides:

SEC. 4. That no sale or transfer of any steamship, or of any share or interest therein, or of any shares of capital stock of any corporation owning the same, granted registry under the terms of this act, shall be valid or of any force or effect, or anywhere be admitted as evidence of the sale or transfer thereof, or anywhere recorded, unless the same shall be first consented to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

If there is a foreign corporation or there are foreign citizens owning a foreign ship, and we are negotiating for her abroad, I think it would be very difficult perhaps and might upset the transaction if they have got to come back to this country and explain it to the Secretary of the Treasury and get his consent to it before they can consummate the sale, and unless they do get his consent it is not valid, neither could the ship be registered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think we are descending into rather minute details in discussing a question of that kind in an emergency measure. Undoubtedly it would be very easy under all the circumstances to convince the Secretary of the Treasury of the bona fides of the transaction, if it were bona fide. If it were not, of course, it could not be consummated; but the object of the second amendment which I have, and with which I propose to follow the pending amendment, is to enable those seeking American registry under this bill to show that they are willing to remain as registered American vessels and not enable them immediately, if peace should come about—which I hope will be very soon and which is not likely, as anyone can see—to return to their former allegiance. My desire is to preserve for a reasonable time, and I hope for all time, these boats as American boats.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, why might it not be well to fix a definite period during which a ship should retain its American registry? It seems to me that would be a way out of the difficulty. The thought has occurred to me, as I suggested in my previous remarks, to follow up the amendment on page 7, after section 4, with this language:

But in no case shall any ship which has been granted an American registry retransfer such registry for a period—

I have fixed 10 years, but that may be too long; but say—for a period of five years from the date of the registry so granted by the United States, and then only with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not want people on the other side of the ocean to use this proposed legislation as a convenience for themselves, when they can not sail their own craft for money-making, to come over here and shelter themselves under our registry just so long as it is convenient, and as soon as the trouble has died out on the other side merely bid us adieu, and that be all, and we get nothing out of it. I feel that if we permit a vessel to sail under the American flag, it being admitted to American registry, that such a system should be at least a small aid in the final establishment of a permanent merchant marine here.

I have suggested a 10-year limitation. Perhaps that may be thought too long. It may be that no owner of a foreign vessel would want to commit himself to so long a period; but, at least, if they are going to come here to get a fair profit, why should we not fix the time and say we "put it in the bond; we will guarantee American registry and protection under our flag; but you must guarantee to us that you will not transfer your property as soon as the trouble has disappeared, but will maintain it here for five years." I offer what I have read as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I suggest that that amendment would come properly in the next amendment which I intend to offer?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well. I will withhold the amendment for the present.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, may we now have a vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in fulfillment of a promise I made to certain Senators, one of whom belongs to the other side of the Chamber, I make the suggestion that there is no quorum of the Senate present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Page	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones	Perkins	Stone
Bryan	Kenyon	Pittman	Swanson
Catron	Kern	Pomerene	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lane	Ransdell	Thompson
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Reed	Thornton
Culberson	Lewis	Saulsbury	Tillman
Cummins	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	White.
Gallinger	Newlands	Shively
Gronna	O'Gorman	Simmons
Hughes	Overman	Smith, Ga.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am requested to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is unavoidably absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on account of official business. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. BRISTOW entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. MYERS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] desired the announcement made that he is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

I will also announce that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is absent because of a death in his family. He is paired with my colleague [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. STERLING entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, I ask that we now vote on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of confusion about this amendment and the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I wish it might be stated as it is now presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as it now stands.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill a new section, to stand as section 4 and to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of American citizens, whether of individuals or of corporations the majority of whose stock is owned by citizens of the United States, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships so acquired to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel built in the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the words "so acquired," in line 9, should be stricken out. They referred to something in a prior section which is not included.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Delaware modifies the amendment by striking out the words "so acquired" in line 9.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to withdraw the amendment previously introduced by me regarding the auxiliary navy, and to substitute an amendment which leaves out the provision in regard to the $30,000,000 and the six annual installments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question at present is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am asking a vote on that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Am I not in order?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator's amendment can be offered later.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to know whether or not I am in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Nevada was about to propose an amendment to the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Until the pending amendment, presented by the Senator from Delaware, is disposed of no further amendments are in order unless they are amendments to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the proviso which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the amendment the following:

Provided, That when a foreign vessel shall be admitted to registry under the provisions of this act a bond of $10 per registered ton shall be required as a guaranty that the vessel shall remain under the American flag for a period of at least five years: Provided further, That masters and officers of such ships, if not already American citizens, shall swear out a declaration of intention to become American citizens.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire before we vote on that amendment. What does he mean by the phrase "when a foreign vessel shall be admitted to registry"? Is there any provision here for the admission of foreign ships to American registry?

Mr. GALLINGER. "Foreign-built ships" would be better. I will ask the Secretary to change it to read "foreign-built ships."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it seems to me that amendment ought to be divided. I do not think I can vote for one part of it, although I should be very glad to support the other part. The provision as to declaring an intention to become American citizens I will support. That relating to the vessels remaining under the flag for five years I can not support, because this is an emergency measure, and that would cut out the emergency feature of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will modify the amendment by offering the first part as an amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, the following:

Provided, That when a foreign-built vessel shall be admitted to registry under the provisions of this act a bond of $10 per registered ton shall be required as a guaranty that the vessel shall remain under the American flag for a period of at least five years.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think an amendment of that kind would be simply overloading this amendment, and it has nothing to do with the real object of the amendment. I therefore move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator had better have a direct vote taken on it. Nothing would be gained by that procedure. I am not going to debate it at all, and I do not believe anybody else will.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am perfectly willing to have a direct vote. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I offered an amendment which was very similar in purport. I desire to withdraw my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I offer the other clause with the word "Provided" inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That masters and officers of such ships, if not already American citizens, shall swear out a declaration of intention to become American citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those in favor of the amendment will please rise. [A pause.] Those opposed to the amendment will rise. [A pause.] The noes have it, and the amendment to the amendment is rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask what the vote is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifteen ayes and 26 noes.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no quorum present, but I will not make that point. I really think we ought to have a fuller attendance of Senators to pass this bill, and it is rather a reproach that we have not, but I am not going to obstruct it. If the Senate, in its wisdom, thinks this amendment ought not to go in the bill, I must content myself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I did not vote either way, because I have a pair, and I felt I was bound on a division just as though it were a record vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to be known as section 4 of the bill. I will simply say that this is an amendment requiring that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the larger part of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship applying for American registry is the bona fide property of a citizen of the United States. I also strike out the words "unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal." In other words, this will not affect the coastwise trade at all and will allow foreign-built ships to be registered and fly the American flag, providing the larger part of the stock of the company owning the ships is held by American citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 4 and to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury on being satisfied that the larger part of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of citizens, whether individuals or corporations, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships purchased to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I say a word before a vote is taken on this amendment? I want to state my impression as to what will be the ruling of a prize court regarding this much debated and discussed question.

I believe that if an American corporation purchases a ship from a belligerent and places upon it the American flag, and it appears in the event of capture at sea that foreigners who are nationals of the enemy hold 40 per cent or 50 per cent or 10 per cent or 90 per cent of the stock, a prize court will condemn the interest of the foreigners in the property, and that if the American citizens own only 5 per cent or 10 per cent or 20 per cent, as the case may be, the interest of the Americans in the vessel will be respected, while the interest of the subjects of the enemy will be condemned. If that view be the correct one—and, after some reflection, I think it is—there is no need for this amendment or the other suggestions upon which we have already voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to offer the second amendment, which I will send to the desk to be read.

If I may say a word in regard to it, this amendment simply provides that when a foreign-built steamship is registered it may not be taken out of our jurisdiction by a transfer of the ship or any interest in it without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and gives the Government of the United States the right to take over the vessel for its own use at any time it sees fit. It is exactly the same provision which was included in the act of 1892, when the first two steamers of the American Line were purchased abroad and two others built, and they now constitute the four ships flying the American flag as the American Line.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the amendment gives the Secretary authority to transfer the vessels from the foreign to the domestic trade?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It does not. It has no effect on that at all.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I have just a word to say with respect to that amendment. It is wholly restrictive, and to a certain extent defeats the purpose of this emergency legislation, which is designed to increase our merchant marine. The adoption of this amendment would discourage the owners of vessels placing their vessels under the American flag.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill a new section, to stand as section 4, and to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no sale or transfer of any steamship, or of any share or interest therein, or of any shares of capital stock of any corporation owning the same, granted registry under the terms of this act, shall be valid or of any force or effect, or anywhere be admitted as evidence of the sale or transfer thereof, or anywhere recorded, unless the same shall be first consented to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and no sale or transfer even when valid and properly recorded shall relieve any vendee or transferee thereof from the conditional holding under this act; and at any time and from time to time after such grant of registry as herein provided, any steamships so registered may be taken by the United States as provided in section 4 of an act entitled "An act to encourage American shipbuilding," approved May 10, 1892, and used for any purpose for which other vessels of the United States may be lawfully used.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who was necessarily called away from the city, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 9, after the word "authorized," it is proposed to insert the words "until but not after the 1st day of January, 1916," so that, if amended, it will read:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized, until but not after the 1st day of January, 1916, whenever he shall find that the number of available persons qualified under now existing laws and regulations of the United States to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act is insufficient, to suspend by order—

And so forth.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, there does not seem to be any need at this time for that specific limitation in the statute. This is an emergency piece of legislation. We are conferring certain powers upon the President which we believe will be wisely exercised. They will be exercised only while there is need to suspend these various provisions of our navigation laws. When the period of hostilities abroad is over, the Congress in due time will probably either repeal or amend the statute which we are now attempting to pass.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from New York whether the phraseology of the bill as last perfected by the committee does not authorize the President to take this action only where there are not American citizens available for the service?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Kansas correctly states the bill in that respect.

Mr. BRISTOW. And the President has no authority unless Americans can not be obtained?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. In behalf of the same Senator, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], I submit the following proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 17, after the words "United States," insert the following:

Provided, however, That the master and a majority of such officers of such vessels shall be citizens of the United States.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire to offer again the amendment with reference to an auxiliary navy, striking out that provision which provides for the expenditure of the $30,000,000 in installments running over five years, and providing that the sum of $30,000,000 shall be available immediately for use in this emergency. I should like to have the amendment as changed read, and also a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to purchase or to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the United States or in the navy yards, or both, of 30 vessels suitable for use by the Navy either as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, fuel ships, dispatch boats, ammunition vessels, hospital ships, submarine and destroyer tenders, supply ships, cruisers, and scouts, or for use on such commercial or Navy mail lines as the Secretary of the Navy may now or hereafter be authorized by law to establish: Provided, That the cost in the aggregate of the aforementioned vessels shall not exceed $30,000,000: Provided further, That the sum of $30,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise obligated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator be satisfied to have the letter printed in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I prefer to have it read. It is a part of the presentation of this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we would like to hear it read. It is only a $30,000,000 proposition.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 7, 1914.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have given careful consideration to your letter of this date, inviting a suggestion in form of an amendment to the Panama Canal act covering the ground which you have heretofore embraced in a proposed legislative program.

It appears that a slight change in the wording of the bill (S. 3721) introduced by you December 10, 1909, and somewhat modified so that the vessels mentioned therein may be utilized in case the Weeks bill, establishing one or more Navy mail lines becomes law, would fit conditions and supply the needs of the Navy.

The suggested amendment to the Panama Canal act is attached hereto. You will note that the number of vessels to be purchased or contracted for is limited to six a year, which would require five years to obtain the total of 30. This provision would enable the department to replace old naval vessels as they become worn out in the service of the mail, passenger, and freight lines which the Weeks bill proposes to establish.

I am informed that the Naval Committee of the House will consider the Weeks bill on Tuesday next.

Assuring you of my appreciation of the interest you have taken and are now taking in this important matter, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state with reference to this communication that I have since had a conversation over the telephone with the Secretary of the Navy, and he agrees with me that the emergency is such as to make it advisable that this entire $30,000,000 should be put immediately at the disposal of the Navy Department with a view to meeting the demands for ships for transportation, so I have amended the amendment which I previously offered to that effect. The Senate is doubtless aware that the Weeks bill passed a few days ago provided for mail lines to be conducted by the Navy Department and put at the command of the Navy Department for that purpose a number of ships that are now in the Navy. This is simply an enlargement of that auxiliary navy which is to be used temporarily in times of peace for commercial purposes.

I think it is of the highest importance that there should be some legislation upon this subject at this time. All the measures with reference to coaxing foreign vessels into American registry by taking away the restrictions of our registry laws may fail or be inadequate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with great reluctance but only owing to the stress of circumstances do I resort to a point of order regarding the proposed amendment that it involves an appropriation and can not be considered as a part of this bill. It was not estimated for by the department.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment is germane and it is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut in a moment.

If the amendment is adopted now this bill will be considered in the House in connection with the Weeks bill, which is before the Naval Affairs Committee of that body and which comes up for consideration next Tuesday. It seems to me that here is an opportunity to meet an emergency such as we met during Mr. McKinley's administration, when we unreservedly put into his hands $50,000,000 to meet the exigencies of the situation growing out of the impending war with Cuba. This is a situation much more serious than that in that it possibly means the prostration of over-sea carriage. Congress is about to adjourn, and unless the restrictions upon transportation imposed by belligerency are removed we may have a most serious condition in the business and commerce of this country. It seems to me that a large fund should be put in the control of the administration with as large a discretion as possible to meet this great emergency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator tell us approximately when Congress is to adjourn?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is beyond my imagination.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has used a phrase in explanation of his amendment which I should like to have him explain. If I understood him correctly he said that these boats are for temporary use. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I mean so far as they are to be used for commercial purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And then what?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The use is a temporary one, for we hope this war will be a temporary war; that it will not last over a long period; and that it will not prostrate our foreign commerce. And as Congress is at present expected to meet that emergency, in that sense it is temporary; but in the larger sense this appropriation is not temporary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then what?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It creates a permanent auxiliary navy. It supplies ships to the Navy that the Navy needs. It supplies colliers, transports, scouts, dispatch boats, and other vessels without which our fighting ships will be derelict in the ocean and absolutely helpless in case of war. We have no merchant marine upon which we can call for transports and colliers and scouts. We have fighting ships without the supporting ships. We are practically an army without a commissary.

These ships are absolutely necessary, as was demonstrated in the trip of our naval squadron around the world, when we were subjected to the humiliation of calling upon foreign nations to supply us with the ships that were necessary to supply and support that great squadron. We were unable to furnish them ourselves. Here is an opportunity to make our Navy a well-proportioned, well-equipped Navy, composed not simply of fighting ships, as at present is substantially the case, but also of the supporting ships, such as transports, colliers, dispatch boats, and scouts, necessary to support the fighting ships, and at the same time to provide 30 vessels of about 10,000 tons capacity, which can supply the place of these ships that are now driven out of commerce by the extraordinary war in which the principal carrier and maritime nations of the world are involved.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course it is always possible to buy 30 vessels for a million dollars apiece if you have the money. A year ago I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, calling for information as to the proportion and balance of the Navy and as to its efficiency in that respect. I have heard nothing more from it, and I did not expect to, but if the Navy is unbalanced and disproportioned and is too heavy in the battleship line and there are not sufficient accessories, that is the business of the Navy Department and the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a legitimate consideration for the naval appropriation bill. I have always favored a most liberal appropriation for that. I think our Navy needs quite as much a rearrangement and reapportionment, in view of making it effective as a whole, as it does in new units. I agree with the Senator from Nevada about that, though I am not expert in that line of business, and that is the reason why I called for information from the department, but did not get it.

Mr. President, I am one of those who think it is wise not to lose one's head or be stampeded by shrill sounds of voices against emergencies. There may be an emergency in the transportation business by sea by which we market our products abroad and there may not. There may have been one for four or five days now and it may be entirely relieved within a week.

Before I would lightly take out $30,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States and cast it into this project I would be inclined to wait a week, and I do not think Congress is going to leave before that time, and see if the control of the sea is obtained by a power which can protect its ocean-borne commerce so that no emergency develops at all.

I do not advocate this amendment at this time. My own judgment is that it was quite a sufficient experiment when we passed the Weeks bill, if that was the bill which provided for the Government to go into commercial business in connection with the mail and use its naval vessels for those purposes.

Mr. President, if the Government of the United States is going into the commercial business with foreign nations all the talk about a merchant marine as we have heretofore known it and meant it is the merest idle talk. Nobody will ever build a vessel to compete with the United States Government in the commercial business. If the Government engages in that line of business, to act as a commercial prospector for good, profitable lines of commerce with foreign nations, and then as soon as an American intimates his willingness to occupy the field the Government is going to withdraw from it, that is an exceedingly curious line of governmental activity, it seems to me.

Of course, I do not think it is necessary to speak at length on this amendment. I have no idea it will be adopted upon the bill at this time. I simply did not want to get stampeded myself and I did not want anybody else to.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question? The amendment proposed by the Senator I understand appropriates $30,000,000 to be expended how?

Mr. NEWLANDS. For supporting ships to the fighting ships in our Navy.

Mr. STONE. In one year or a series of years?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The money will be available immediately to be used in the discretion of the Government.

Mr. STONE. It is estimated that $30,000,000 will be sufficient to purchase 30 good, seaworthy ships of considerable tonnage.

I have felt, Mr. President, that there was at least a great deal of merit in the suggestion. I have not the profoundest faith that the bill now before the Senate which we are presumably about to vote upon will accomplish any adequate relief to the congested commercial condition which it is said exists. How great that congestion is, or how it may be augmented in the immediate future, is necessarily more or less a subject of conjecture.

But I doubt very much, Mr. President, whether any great number of ships will be offered to American citizens, and still more doubt whether American citizens would be willing to invest their capital in foreign ships, especially ships now owned by citizens or subjects of belligerent countries, under the provisions of the bill. Of course, I hope that enough will be offered and enough purchased to relieve the exigency of the hour; but if that should not occur, as I fear it will not occur, then the difficulties confronting us remain. A citizen of the United States may not be willing to invest his money in foreign-built ships and foreign-owned ships under the provisions of the pending bill, but the Government of the United States might be willing to invest its money in the purchase of commercial ships. Far more is it probable that the Government would obtain 30 ships under this appropriation than that half that number will be bought by American citizens and put into over-seas traffic under the provisions of this measure.

Mr. President, suppose the Government does purchase these ships, will it have made a mistake? Has the public suffered or benefited by the purchase? If the Government does in a comparatively short time during the continuance of the stupendous struggle now being waged throughout Europe purchase 30 commercial ships for naval use, to be made a part of the naval force of this country, the ships could be utilized at once in carrying passengers and freights from any part of the United States to any foreign port in the world.

There would be certainly less objection to the utilization of commercial ships owned by the Government as an auxiliary to the armored Navy of the Government than to employ warships themselves in commercial uses; and afterwards, when the wars raging in Europe are at an end, the Government would still own these ships. Is it a bad thing for the Government to be in the ownership and possession of an auxiliary navy of that kind? It is always at our command to meet any kind of an emergency, not only such an emergency as confronts us now, but such as might confront us in the future, more directly and intimately concerning the welfare and the very life of the Republic itself.

I am not opposed to an auxiliary navy of this kind at any time; and it seems to me that there was never a time in our history when we had greater need of it than now. I will not say "never a time in our history," for there have been other times. There was in the War with Spain a time when we needed vessels of this character so badly that a large appropriation was made to hire them for our use. Occasions of that kind may arise at any time, and the occasion may be far more pregnant of peril to us than the one which confronted us during the War with Spain.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am disposed to support this amendment by my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I share with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] his great respect for the merits of the proposal contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, but it is no necessary part of this emergency legislation. It is believed that this act——

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. In the course of a colloquy between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from New York the Senator from New York intimated that conditions of international law were such that belligerents really could not safely transfer ships to citizens of this country.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is, a citizen of this country could not safely buy such ships.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Precisely; in other words, it is caveat emptor; the purchaser takes the chance in a prize court?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Under these circumstances, with all the world pretty much at war, where is the relief to come from under this proposal?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator mean by this bill, or is he directing his attention to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am referring to the main bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. There are three advantages offered by the main bill. The first is to facilitate the transfer of foreign-built ships now owned by American citizens to our merchant marine. There are now ships with a net tonnage of almost 250,000 tons flying a foreign flag but owned by American citizens. Many of those ships, perhaps the greater number, are more than five years old. Under present law we can not transfer the property of American citizens to the flag of the United States where the property is more than five years old. We are endeavoring by this legislation to remove that limitation as to time and as to age.

The second advantage is that this legislation will permit an American citizen to buy a ship from the subject of any neutral country, such as Norway, Denmark, or Sweden, and perhaps Spain, if Spain has any vessel to sell, and any other nation that is now neutral.

With respect to the transfers under the first provision and under the second provision, there can be no question of international misunderstanding. Under the language of this bill it is possible that permission is granted, so far as our law is concerned, for an American citizen to buy a foreign-built ship wherever he can buy it; whether he can buy it under circumstances that will harmonize with neutrality laws is his responsibility. If, acting under our domestic laws, he buys a foreign ship from a belligerent under circumstances which offend the neutrality laws, it may be the subject of capture as soon as the enemy of that belligerent has the opportunity to take that ship off the high seas. Does that answer the question of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Partly, Mr. President; but I should like to have some idea of the amount of tonnage the Senator thinks would be added to the shipping of this country to give relief to the situation, and what proportion would come from these several sources?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is the opinion of the Commissioner of Navigation that increasing our merchant marine with ships contributing a net tonnage of almost 250,000 tons will make a substantial accession to our available shipping facilities, and will be a great help in the transportation of cotton, foodstuffs, and other products of this country now awaiting shipment abroad.

Returning for a moment, however, to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York says that this is an emergency bill, and I understand this amendment does not contribute to that result. I will ask the Senator if this amendment, although it proposes to purchase ships primarily for the purpose of strengthening our Navy, taken in connection with the Weeks bill, which we passed the other day, could not be used for the purpose of supplying the emergent need with which we are now confronted?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Of course everything will help, but if this bill shall realize the expectation of those who proposed it originally in the other House, and of the committee that has attempted to perfect it in the Senate, there will be no need for further emergency legislation. For that reason, Mr. President, I shall be compelled at this time to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New York that the Navy is in great need of auxiliaries. It is well known, and it is not disputed, that the efficiency of the Navy of this country is curtailed not less than 50 per cent because of a lack of colliers and supply ships. In time of war the American Navy, in large part, when not in home ports would be marooned, and we would have no fighting

Navy able to compete with any other nation in the world which make any pretense of being a naval power.

If the ships provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Nevada are purchased, they will answer a need which every Secretary of the Navy has called attention to and with which every naval officer and every seagoing man is familiar. At the present time we are confronted with a condition where the ships of those nations which ordinarily engage in transporting commerce are off of the sea; and what better investment could the people of this country make than to buy ships which they could temporarily use for the peaceful needs of this country in carrying to market its crops, which without transportation facilities in many cases will rot upon the ground, thus bringing poverty and distress upon the people who have sweated to raise them, and then afterwards, when that emergency ceases, turn them over to the Navy Department to be used in carrying supplies to the Navy? It is the wisest investment of public money that could possibly be made, in my opinion. It would be an expenditure which would not be questioned by any belligerent nation in the world.

If we did not actually need and were not short of vessels, it would be an entirely different question; but inasmuch as we are short of vessels which are required for the purposes of the Navy, and we are entirely without any merchant marine to carry our articles of produce to market when, in fact, we are under the humiliating experience of having to send a warship or a cruiser to Europe to bring back women and children and other citizens of this country who have been left stranded there far from our shores, it seems to me that there should be no question that this amendment should pass.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not believe it is wise to appropriate $30,000,000 for the purchase of vessels to be used by the National Government upon such a brief and hurried hearing as has been had. We had an experience of this character some years ago, when during the Spanish-American War we bought a number of vessels. At the close of the war those vessels were sold, but they brought only 25 cents on the dollar.

There was a thorough investigation as to whether the National Government should retain and use those vessels, just as it is proposed in this amendment to use the vessels proposed to be purchased; but after very mature deliberation the department reported against it. Those interested in the merchant marine and engaged in the commerce of the country stated that if we expected to build a merchant marine it was not fair for the Government to go into competition with private industry, and that we never would build a merchant marine if that were the case; and, as I have said, after mature deliberation, the Government concluded to sell the vessels, and they sold them at 25 cents on the dollar.

If we are going to frame a measure of this kind designed to be permanent, we ought to have fair deliberation upon it. Then it might be that some kind of a system could be evolved and carried into operation that would be a success; but, in view of the temporary character of the legislation proposed and because there is not sufficient time now carefully to consider the matter, it seems to me that we ought to vote against the amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to add a word or two to what I said a moment ago in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. The bill presented by the committee is designed to encourage private owners of ships to put them under the American flag and to enter the merchant marine of this country. If the amendment of the Senator from Nevada be adopted, it is going to completely defeat our main purpose, because if we try to hold out encouragement to private owners in one paragraph of the bill and in another paragraph authorize the Government to go into the same business as a competing factor, it is the most effectual suggestion yet made to destroy every salutary feature of this bill.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President I noticed this morning a statement that we are likely to have increased taxation in some form in the near future. Some of us are shuddering at that thought, but it is likely to come, and I think we had better not vote away $30,000,000 without holding our breath on this occasion, emergent as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks for the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of section 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to insert the following:

That the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the needs of domestic trade require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law confining the trade from points on the Atlantic coast to points on the Pacific coast and from points on the Pacific coast to points on the Atlantic coast to American-built ships, and permit foreign-built ships having an American register to engage in the trade between said points.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a few words——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. As I understand that amendment, it applies only to ships going from Atlantic ports to points on the Pacific, and vice versa.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator understand that under the terms of his amendment a ship can not go from one port to another on the Atlantic and do business between those two ports on its route to the Pacific side?

Mr. JONES. I think under the amendment the President could provide that a vessel going from a point on the Atlantic coast to a point on the Pacific coast might distribute its cargo at different points on the Atlantic, or vice versa.

Mr. REED. And also to take on cargo? I would somewhat doubt it, under the language of the amendment. I have not had time to examine it, and I thought the Senator could give us some light as to that.

Mr. JONES. That is my idea of it. I think if the amendment should go to conference, of course, the committee on conference could put the matter in such shape as to carry out the idea that, I think, is clearly expressed in the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I have not taken any of the time of the Senate to-day in discussing this matter, because the amendment has not been offered, although most of the debate really has been on the amendment.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, for reasons that are quite apparent, I move that the Senate take a recess until Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Why can we not take a vote on the amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Indiana withhold the motion for just a moment in order that I may introduce a bill?

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill providing for an auxiliary Navy, embracing the provisions of the amendment which I have already offered to the pending bill. I ask that the bill may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. O'GORMAN. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks permission, out of order, to introduce a bill providing for an auxiliary Navy, and to have it printed in the RECORD. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 6246) providing for the purchase or construction of auxiliary ships for the Navy and for their use on commercial or Navy mail lines authorized by law was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

A bill (S. 6246) providing for the purchase or construction of auxiliary ships for the Navy and for their use on commercial or Navy mail lines authorized by law.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to purchase or to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the United States or in the navy yards, or both, of 30 vessels suitable for use by the Navy either as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, fuel ships, dispatch boats, ammunition vessels, hospital ships, submarine and destroyer tenders, supply ships, cruisers, and scouts, or for use on such commercial or Navy mail lines as the Secretary of the Navy may now or hereafter be authorized by law to establish: Provided, That the cost in the aggregate of the aforementioned vessels shall not exceed $30,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $30,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise obligated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion I made.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. JONES. Senators will get a vote on this amendment in a little while.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Washington only wants to occupy about 10 minutes.

Mr. JONES. I do not think I will take that much time, although I should like to have a roll call on this amendment, so far as that is concerned. I am not, however, going to take very much of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the matter.

I regret very much that my friend the Senator from New Hampshire is so bitterly opposed to this proposition, but I know that his opposition is based upon the sincerest motives and the most patriotic purposes. I know that there is no one who has taken a greater interest in an attempt to build up the merchant marine of this country than the Senator from New Hampshire; and however anyone may differ from him as to the method he advocates, nobody can question the sincerity of his purposes and the patriotic motives that prompt him in this work. He has given much of his time to this proposition and has manifested great interest in it—more, I think, than almost any other citizen of our country; at least more than any other Member of this body that I know. While, as I said, I regret his opposition to this amendment, I know that it is sincere and that it is patriotic. While I regret to differ from him with reference to the effect of it, I felt that I ought to say that much with reference to my views of his opposition. The Senator and I do not differ as to the importance and value of the coastwise laws, and I will uphold them as strenuously, though not so ably, as the Senator. I do not think this legislation will interfere with those laws. We can take this step without taking another if it would be injurious. What we do further will rest with Congress. Any future step will not be taken without careful deliberation, and we can safely leave its wisdom to be determined when the question arises. The step proposed now I believe to be wise, and no other step will be taken unless it seems wise.

Mr. President, I resent the suggestion that has been made in this debate by some that we of the Northwest are selfish and narrow and restricted in our views with reference to this amendment. I do not believe the people of any section of the country are broader in their conceptions of what should be done for the welfare of the whole country than the people of the Northwest. We have never confined our support of measures to those measures which are of special interest and special benefit to our section of the country. We feel that what benefits us benefits the entire country; and we are willing to support those measures which are of special benefit to particular sections of the country and not of special benefit to us, not because we hope by such support to get support for our propositions, but because we know that whatever benefits any particular section of the country is of general benefit to all the country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think it is fair to the men who have put their money into American ships at American prices in the coastwise trade to take advantage of this emergency in the foreign trade to throw upon their backs a lot of ships produced in a foreign market at half the capital which they have invested and put them in competition with them?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I was just coming to the emergency feature of this proposition. This bill is recognized as an emergency measure. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], in bringing this bill before the Senate the other day, said this:

> In a word, disaster is threatening the cotton and the agricultural interests of this country. Thousands of American citizens are abroad, unable to secure passage home. Disaster to the cotton and the agricultural interests is threatened because, although we have the most bountiful crops ever known in the history of the Government, we find ourselves without transportation facilities. The passage of this bill will go far toward remedying this very unfortunate situation.

There is the avowed purpose of this bill. I want to do anything I possibly can to help the cotton and the other agricultural interests of this country; but they are not the only interests in the country and they are not the only interests that are affected by the situation that confronts our people now. As I said in answer to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] this morning, our industries are affected by this very situation. It does not grow entirely out of the Panama Canal situation. The facts are these:

Many of the ships on our coast that formerly had been carrying our lumber under a foreign flag to foreign countries are now tied up, just exactly as they are tied up on the Atlantic coast. They are afraid to go out on the Pacific, for fear they will be captured by an enemy. What is the result? The result is that the lumber that heretofore we have been sending to the foreign markets is on our hands. We can not get it to foreign markets and we can not get it to our own markets. You people with cotton and wheat can get your cotton and wheat to the home market, but we can not get our lumber even to the home market. Of course we ship what we have been accustomed to ship heretofore on the trains inland; but that which we have been sending to the foreign market heretofore we can not now send to the foreign market, and we can not send it to the home market. That is the situation. That is the emergency. We have no ships we can use. Our lumber can not be marketed. Our mills are idle, our labor is unemployed, and bankruptcy and distress threaten our people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The ships that are tied up, afraid to go out, are ships under foreign flags, I suppose?

Mr. JONES. Under foreign flags; yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are there not enough ships in the coastwise trade of this country to carry the lumber?

Mr. JONES. They are not on the Pacific coast. They are not there. I have telegrams here, and I read telegrams the other day, stating that they are not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt they are not there now, but if a dearth in the lumber market should develop, does not the Senator think ships would go through the Panama Canal?

Mr. JONES. If it should develop it could not be satisfied without some way of getting the lumber to market.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wondered if the ships could not develop from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific.

Mr. JONES. They can not develop at this time. Why do you propose to pass this bill? For the relief of the Atlantic coast? The markets will develop, according to your theory, and that will let the ships develop. What is the use of passing this bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How long does it take for a ship to get from the Atlantic to the Pacific through the canal?

Mr. JONES. It will not take, of course, a great while when the canal is open; but they do not know what ships will come there, and we have no reason to suppose that the ships on the Atlantic coast are going to leave, under the present condition of things, and go to the Pacific to help us out—not at all.

I have here a telegram from George Milton Savage, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma, as follows:

> TACOMA, WASH., August 6, 1914.
> Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
> Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:
>
> Large quantity lumber waiting shipment from North Pacific ports. Make specialty; important adoption of measure permitting American registration ships of neutral powers for coast-to-coast trade during period of war. Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce cordially indorses plan as an emergency measure and urges prompt adoption.
> GEORGE MILTON SAVAGE, President.

This is from the West Coast Lumber Manufacturing Co., of Tacoma:

> TACOMA, WASH., August 6, 1914.
> Senator W. L. JONES,
> Washington, D. C.:
>
> Lumber industry being crippled by lack water transportation. Large orders on docks. No ships. Atlantic coast needing our lumber. Strongly urge foreign ships making our registry be allowed engage coastwise traffic. Anticipate necessity shipment to Atlantic coast and transshipment to foreign markets. Must have ships to accomplish.
> WEST COAST LUMBER MANUFACTURING CO.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator about that first telegram. Is the Senator willing to have the amendment limited to the war, so as to provide that these vessels shall be in the coastwise trade only during the war?

Mr. JONES. I am willing to leave it to the President of the United States, in his discretion, just as we have left the other parts of this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The telegram asks for the use of these ships in the coastwise trade during the war, while the emergency exists. I am willing to give them that myself.

Mr. JONES. That is what this one telegram asks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there any reason for doing anything more to relieve the war emergency than to provide that these vessels may engage in this trade during the war?

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, if a limitation were placed upon the other provisions in this bill about which the President has been given discretion, I would have no objection to placing a limitation upon this one. This is offered here as an emergency proposition, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The word "emergency" justifies everything.

Mr. JONES. This is from Bellingham:

> BELLINGHAM, WASH., August 6, 1914.
> Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
> Washington, D. C.:
>
> Special meeting of Bellingham Chamber of Commerce to-day passed resolutions unanimously indorsing Jones amendment to the shipping bill permitting foreign vessels to engage in commerce between Atlantic and Pacific ports. All American citizens realize that shipping facilities are paralyzed. Relief demanded, and necessary for our manufacturers.
>
> W. P. BROWN, President.

Then follows a telegram from the Commercial Club of Everett:

EVERETT, WASH., August 6, 1914.

Senator W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

We urge passage your amendment foreign bottoms Atlantic-Pacific trade.

EVERETT COMMERCIAL CLUB.

Then there are several other telegrams, which I ask may be placed in the RECORD, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

EVERETT, WASH., August 6, 1914.

Senator W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Imperative your amendment pass to hold prosperity in Pacific Northwest.

D. M. CLOUGH.

EVERETT, WASH., August 6.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

We hope you can secure the adoption of your amendment to bill granting American register to foreign bottoms to the effect that such ships can engage in domestic ocean-to-ocean traffic.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

SEATTLE, WASH., August 5, 1914.

Senator W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

The whole Pacific coast needs the use of foreign vessels to carry lumber and other products to the Atlantic coast through Panama Canal. There are not enough American ships to take care of this business. With our foreign trade cut off as conditions now exist our mills will have to close down unless we get this relief. I sincerely hope your amendment will carry.

WALLACE G. COLLINS,
President Pacific Fir Co.

SEATTLE, WASH., August 5, 1914.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The trustees of the Manufacturers' Association, at a special meeting, to-day, passed following resolution:

"Whereas the foreign business of the Puget Sound manufacturers is now paralyzed because of insufficient shipping facilities, owing to the fact that we are dependent upon foreign ships to carry our products, there being wholly inadequate American ships to care for the trade: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the officers of the Manufacturers' Association use their best efforts to influence Congress and the President to permit of an amendment to the Panama Canal act that will admit to registry in this country foreign ships, regardless of their age, to engage in carrying our products to foreign ports as well as carrying products between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of this country, but these ships not to be permitted to engage in local business between ports on either the Pacific or the Atlantic coasts. In order to take proper advantage of the Panama Canal, it is very necessary these ships be permitted to engage in commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. As there is an insufficient number of properly equipped American ships to economically handle this coast's products to the Atlantic coast, we will appreciate your assistance."

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF SEATTLE.

EVERETT, WASH., August 6, 1914.

WESLEY L. JONES, Washington, D. C.:

We are much interested in and heartily indorse your amendment permitting foreign-registered vessels to ply between our two oceans. We have spent our millions for a canal and want vessels to handle commerce under competitive conditions for the benefit of our people on both coasts and the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys.

PUGET SOUND LOGGERS' ASSOCIATION,
By J. E. GOWEN, Vice President.

I will insert a portion of a telegram from Mr. Skinner, who is thoroughly familiar with coast conditions:

Please consider the plight we are in now, due to the lack of transportation facilities between the two coasts. The American-Hawaiian Line has only offered a carrying capacity of about 75,000,000 feet annually, and that has been under option to one eastern wholesale lumber concern. Then Grace & Co. have four vessels with total lumber capacity, excluding all other freight, of about same amount, but they have no freight capacity for sale, as they deal in lumber and use their tonnage to buy as cheaply as they can here and make the most they can from this monopoly. Boston & Atlantic Line have two boats which may be ready for service some time in the future. They will carry about 35,000,000 feet annually. The balance of available American tonnage is practically nil, and needs no serious consideration to make our point more apparent. The total capacity American tonnage capable of intercoastal traffic would only equal about the annual output of Bloedels and by mills, and the whole lumber industry on this coast is and will be especially, without free tolls, left in this anomalous and ridiculous vicissitude. If the President's fear of a shipping monopoly was ever realized, we confront it now. We absolutely must have either freedom of foreign vessels between two coasts, as illustrated for years by Government coal charters, or prompt addition to tonnage under American registry, to have canal more beneficial than harmful to this coast. Trans-Pacific tonnage will be taken direct through canal and we will be left with no adequate facilities whatever to transport the traffic that should be fostered between the two coasts. A most important consideration also in present emergency that demands passage proposed law is that the Government may need vessels for coal and transports between two coasts. Any qualification of the bill excluding use of all vessels in the intercoastal trade can only favor few selfish interests mentioned and should receive no serious consideration whatever in view of the unknown and enormous advantage accruing to the entire Nation. If all vessels under our flag can ply in intercoastal trade, although the few American vessel owners now assert they will not divert their vessels to trans-Atlantic trade, human nature warrants the assumption that the profits offered for these neutral vessels may be irresistible. There seems no justification to exclude vessels from intercoastal trade and every conceivable economic and strategic reason for granting all vessels under American registry this freedom.

Now, Mr. President, I know that the Senate is anxious to vote on this matter. The importance to us of this legislation is my only excuse for taking this much of your time. It means just as much to our people on the Pacific coast as this legislation means to you people in the cotton and the wheat sections of the country. We ask from you the same consideration that we are willing to give to you in this legislation.

I trust the amendment I have offered will be accepted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for a division.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that the call for a division comes too late.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a request pending.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that the call for a division came too late.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been a point of order made, which the Chair is considering and about to rule upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. The yeas and nays were called for, and the Chair ruled that a sufficient number had not seconded the request. I immediately asked for a division. I do not know of anything in our rules that would prohibit that. It would be extraordinary if there were anything of the kind.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that there is nothing in the rules that authorizes calling for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is in general parliamentary law. It never was questioned on the face of the earth.

Mr. JONES. That ruling was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is impressed with this view, and is going to rule in this way; of course, an appeal can be taken.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the only purpose of a division is to satisfy the presiding officer as to whether or not his ruling is right. The question of the yeas and nays is an entirely different question.

The Chair will ask all those who are in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Washington to rise. [A pause.] Those who are opposed will rise. [A pause.] The ruling of the Chair was undoubtedly correct. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to correct the wording of section 2, I move that the word "Whenever" be inserted on the eighth line, page 4, after the numeral "2."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 8, before the word "The," the first word in the line, it is proposed to insert the word "Whenever" and to change the capital "T" to a small letter "t."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On lines 8 and 9, page 4, I move to strike out "is hereby authorized, whenever he."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, lines 8 and 9, it is proposed to strike out the words "is hereby authorized, whenever he."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And I move to insert, after the word "insufficient," on line 13, page 4, the words "he is authorized."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "insufficient" and the comma on line 13, page 4, it is proposed to insert the words "he is authorized."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. I reserve the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and ask for a separate vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire is not aware of the fact that this is a complete substitute for the bill. It comes into the Senate as an entire amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will waive my point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, are amendments in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; amendments are in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in lieu of section 4 of the bill. I wish to say that the amendment is the one on which there was such a meager vote in the Senate a while ago, with a rather close margin; and on it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of American citizens, whether of individuals or of corporations of which the majority of capital stock is owned by citizens of the United States, shall direct that the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships purchased be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of vessels built in the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lewis	Pomerene	Stone
Bryan	Martine, N. J.	Ransdell	Swanson
Chamberlain	Myers	Reed	Thomas
Gallinger	Newlands	Saulsbury	Thompson
Hughes	O'Gorman	Shafroth	Thornton
Johnson	Overman	Sheppard	Tillman
Jones	Owen	Shively	Walsh
Kern	Page	Simmons	West
Lane	Perkins	Smith, Ga.	White
Lee, Md.	Pittman	Sterling

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it premature to move to instruct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it is premature. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instruction of the Senate and request the attendance of absent Senators. The order heretofore given has not been vacated.

After a little delay,

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, this is Saturday night. It is now 10 minutes after 7 o'clock. We have had a long day's session. We came close to the disposition of this important piece of legislation, but by the insistence of one of our Members calling for a yea-and-nay vote—or, rather, suggesting the absence of a quorum——

Mr. GALLINGER. Debate is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I was making the statement preparatory to a motion. The absence of a quorum was suggested. It seems extremely difficult at this time to get the requisite number. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, August 11, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 8, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bend low, our Father in heaven, and exercise Thy holy influence in the affairs of men and of nations. Strengthen the weak, cheer the faint-hearted, comfort the sorrowing, encourage every noble impulse, discourage every evil thought and ignoble desire. Harmonize all differences, bring order out of chaos, that the white banner of peace may float triumphantly throughout every land, that brotherly love may have its sway and Thy will be done, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF MRS. WILSON.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday morning the Chair appointed the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. HAWLEY, on the committee of 48 to attend the funeral of Mrs. Wilson. The Chair has just received a telegram from him saying that he has gone to Oregon and can not be here. The gentleman from Oregon, Mr. LAFFERTY, has not been here for two or three months, so the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. SINNOTT.

In appointing the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. MURDOCK, as the senior Member from the State of Kansas the Chair miscalculated the dates of his service, and now finds that his colleague, Mr. CAMPBELL, is the senior Member. The Chair therefore, at the suggestion of Mr. MURDOCK, appoints the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL, in place of the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. MURDOCK.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. MURDOCK, be added to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to add the name of Mr. MURDOCK to the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17042, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 17042, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 211 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he presented a list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the Murdock amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, after the word "law." insert the following: "Provided, That hereafter postmasters of the first, second, third, and fourth classes shall be selected from the classified list of postal employees, and all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act in so far as they affect this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. I believe that all postmasters should be under the civil service and should be taken out of politics, and that will be the practical effect of the adoption of this amendment. I believe that it should be possible for a young man in my town, after leaving the high school, to take an examination for a position in the Post Office Department, with the hope of securing a distinguished position in the service, a position that would give him ample salary and insure proper care for his old age.

The civil-service system is the child of Democracy. It is true it has been abused by the Republicans [laughter on the Republican side], but that is no reason why we should continue the abuse. Yesterday we adopted an amendment taking the assistant postmasters out from under civil-service regulations. That was a mistake, but the adoption of the Cullop amendment, which made the Postal Service of this country a political grab bag, was something more than a mistake; that was a crime. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The fortunate thing about it is that it is a crime that can not be "put across"—to use a popular expression—because, unless I mistake the intelligence of this House, when we go out of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union into the House we will strike that provision from the bill, and if it is not stricken from the bill by this House it will be dropped in the Senate, and if it is not dropped in the Senate—if by some political miracle it gets through both House of Congress—we have a man in the White House who will knock it into a cocked hat so fast it will take your breath away. [Applause.]

I do not like to see my party indulging in these petty political tricks. I like to see the Democratic Party stand up and do the big things in national life.

What good will it do the Democratic Party to dismiss the assistant postmasters in a few cities of the United States if thereby we lose the confidence of the intelligent, independent voters of this country?

You men who come from below Mason and Dixon's line do not know what it means to fight for Democracy in the North and the West. It is not sufficient there to say, "This is a Democratic ticket, and you should vote it because your father was a Democrat." Instead, we have to appeal to the intelligence of our constituents. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We have to show them that the Democratic Party stands for something entirely different from what the Republican Party stands for, and unless we can do that we can not get the support of those independent voters who are essential to Democratic success in the West and the North.

And it is just such things as this Cullop amendment that causes good men, and good women, too, throughout the North and West to say, "What is the use of quitting the Republican Party and going over to the Democratic Party? You are simply a crowd of spoilsmen who when you get control of national affairs forget the principles that are at stake, forget the fact that the Democratic Party gave us civil service, and endeavor to find jobs for job hunters."

Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will carry. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I take the closing sentence of the gentleman who has just left the floor and say that I trust that the Murdock amendment will not carry. If there ever was offered to this House an amendment that was thoroughly anti-Democratic, that is the amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I looked at that young man from Colorado in making his speech a moment ago, in which he expressed his utter want of confidence and profound contempt for the capacity of the people to control their own affairs, and wondered how in the name of goodness a Democratic constituency in the United States could indorse such sentiments. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He says he has to appeal to the people and to their common sense and intelligence to get here. It must have been a wonderful appeal that he made. He intimates men from the South do not have to do that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why, the gentleman as much as says if you come from south of Mason and Dixon's line you are living on prejudice and you do not live on reason and sense, and you do not have to appeal to your people. If the gentleman lived in my State he would reach quite a different conclusion.

A MEMBER. Especially if he was running for Congress.

Mr. MOON. Particularly if he had to run from a district that is Republican he would find that he would have to appeal, and I want to say for the Republicans in that section that when the appeal is made on broad principles of confidence in the people for the support and maintenance of constitutional government that they do often respond by voting for Democrats. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to this amendment. I can not conceive of anything that would be worse in its nature than the adoption of an amendment that provides that no man who is not in the classified civil service shall hold the office of postmaster or any other office in the Post Office Department of the United States. As I said yesterday, it would create a close governmental corporation through which the people could not break, an aristocratic official government, and a man might just as well tell me he is an angel as to tell me he is a Democrat, who believes in such a doctrine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment as a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional amendment the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act all first, second, third, or four class postmasterships shall be filled by appointment by the Postmaster General or the assistant postmaster, if there be one, or if there be none, then of some other person, to fill such vacancy until a postmaster shall have been selected and commissioned in the manner hereinafter provided: that is to say, the Civil Service Commission shall, as soon after said vacancy shall occur as possible, certify to the commissioners of the county or to the persons whose duty it is to prepare the ballots for general elections in the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office may be in which said vacancy shall occur, the names of three citizens of the city, town, borough, or township in which the post office is, qualified under the civil-service rules to be postmasters, and at the general election next succeeding thereafter the commissioners shall cause to be printed on the official ballot the names of the three persons so recommended by the Civil Service Commission who shall be, but not under any party designation, the candidates for the office of postmaster in such city, town, borough, or township, and the result of such election and the number of votes cast for each shall be certified to the Postmaster General for his information, and from the candidates so voted for he shall appoint one person as the postmaster of such post office for the term of four years.

"And all laws, rules, and regulations inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when I offered an amendment providing that the people to be served could elect their postmasters the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] made the point of order that it was unconstitutional, because under the Constitution it was not competent for Congress to provide for the election of a postmaster, and he was correct, because Congress can not take from the administration the right to appoint all officers given by the Constitution; and yet in almost the same breath he introduced an amendment yesterday which provided that the postmasters should appoint assistant postmasters. Now, that was in the face of the same constitutional objection which he urged against my amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HULINGS. Not just now, but presently.

My amendment makes it possible for the people who are to be served by the postmaster to suggest which one of a certain number of qualified persons may be appointed; it gives the people the right to declare whom they desire to be appointed, but it does not require the Postmaster General to appoint any of them; it does not limit the right of the Postmaster General to appoint whomever he chooses.

But I venture to say that there is no administration that will continue to make appointments of postmasters in the face of and in disregard of the public sentiment of the community which is to be served. Therefore the effect of this substitute would be that the Postmaster General would appoint qualified men who were favorably regarded in the district in which they were to serve. One thing, at least, it will do. It will lift out of the pool of party politics this great department of the Government. As it is now, you see "grave and reverend signiors" squabbling and fighting about postmasterships. The anterooms of Members of Congress are thronged with men scrambling for appointments to these offices, and if you should relieve Congressmen—and it would be a relief—of this duty, and place it entirely upon the Postmaster General, who would be informed, if not guided or controlled, by the recommendation coming from the people to be served, there is no doubt at all but you would raise the character of the service. One thing you will do, namely, you will take the appointment of these officers out of the hands of Congress; you will take it out of politics. Their recommendation will not be sought for. The only recommendation that will be sought for will be the recommendation of the people who are to be served by the postmaster. And another thing this amendment will do will be to very much disarm and weaken the hold of the political boss system in the country. The political boss makes these appointments, not particularly with a view of having the public well served, but in order to strengthen his personal machine. Place these appointments in the hands of the Postmaster General, informed and guided by the recommendation of the people to be served, and you will have cleaned out a dirty political pool; you will have relieved Congressmen and the President, who have more important duties, from the task of making these appointments, of which in the very nature of the case they can know very little, and the Postmaster General, to whom the appointing power is transferred, will be informed by the authentic recommendation of the people as to their wishes in the matter.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, has debate been exhausted on this amendment, or not?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been exhausted upon the amendment, but not upon the substitute.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the Cullop amendment, and I voted to strike out of the bill the section concerning assistant postmasters, and I shall vote for the Murdock amendment. While I know that no argument I may present will have any influence, I desire to state the reasons why I shall so vote. I believe in the merit system. I am opposed to the spoils system because the experience of this country has proved that it leads to inefficient, wasteful public service and tends to corrupt party politics. [Applause.] Therefore, it is for the public interest to extend and to improve the civil service. I believe in the long run it will be for the interest of politicians and party politics to cut out the spoils system entirely. I realize that there is a great deal of opposition to the civil service as it is at present enforced, and that that opposition has a basis. But the way to cure that is not to destroy the law but to change and improve it. The civil-service law should be extended to practically all people in the administrative departments of the Government, and, further than that, it should be unlawful for any Congressman or any Senator to make any recommendation about the appointment or transfer or promotion of any man in the classified service, leaving these promotions and appointments and transfers to be made upon the civil-service recommendations and the record of the men on their work. I believe the Civil Service Commission should certify a list to the department, made up not only by an examination of a man's educational ability—a literary examination—but an examination of his training and character; and when they certify a list to the department the department should have to take the man with the highest rating. I believe that is the way to reform the present civil-service law and take out from the law what we have now, this undercurrent and thread of political patronage and political pull.

I voted to strike out the section about assistant postmasters, although that section is put up to us here in the guise of the extension of civil service, because the debate disclosed clearly enough, and the facts also disclosed, that that amendment will not and is not intended to promote the public service. That is the only question that any man should consider, not "Are Republicans going out of office?" or "Are Democrats going into office?" but "Will the public get better service by the adoption of this amendment?" [Applause.] I do not believe they will get better service.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman from New Hampshire, who has, I think, very peculiar ideas on this question for a Democrat, that he need not trouble himself, I think, and this House need not trouble itself very much, on the question of the assistant postmasters. I believe that I speak with authority when I say that in six or eight months from to-day there will be no such thing in the United States as an assistant postmaster, under the law and power of regulation in the department and the determination of the department to economize by getting rid of certain classes of officials.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that—unless somebody else wants to speak now—the debate close in five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes of time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] want some time?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Very well, I will not make the motion now. I will say, before the gentleman begins, that I would be glad to have an agreement to close debate in 15 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Make it 20 minutes. I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. MOON. I can not agree to give all the time over there. I move that we close debate in 15 minutes on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to close all debate on the section and amendments thereto in 15 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 69.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution, which ought to be referred to occasionally and kept in mind all the time, provides that the President—shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The Constitution does not give the legislative branch any control over appointments, and until the last few years no one had supposed that Congress had any right by legislation to control the appointments. The civil-service law goes on the theory that the President is the appointing power, and not Congress. The civil-service law only provides the machinery which the President may put into operation. The civil-service law does not provide for the appointment of anyone in a specified manner, but authorizes the President to cover into the classified service and to provide for the appointment of such officials as he pleases by the aid of the machinery that is set up under the civil-service law. The President has the power to put into the classified service and provide for the appointment, through the Civil Service Commission, of any of the officials of the Government whose appointment is not expressly required to be confirmed by the Senate. He has the power to take out of the classified service any officials that he desires to.

Yet we are proposing to legislate here constantly providing for a method of appointment, providing who shall be in the classified service. The Executive in recent years has not quarreled with Congress over these legislative provisions, every one of which is probably unconstitutional. I think that the present President is to be trusted as to whether certain places shall be in the classified service or taken out of the classified service, or whether persons in the classified service shall or shall not be required to take certain examinations; and every vote which the Democratic side of the House casts seeking to take this power away from the President is a vote of lack of confidence in their President. The President himself, at the head of the administrative branch of the Government, does not dare to be responsible for the demoralization which would come by taking these places out of the classified service or making political appointments to the ordinary positions under the Government. But a Democratic majority in the House, with each Member seeking to avoid and avoiding personal responsibility, proposes to do an unconstitutional act and seeks to control the patronage under the Government, and show a lack of confidence in their President. For once I am in favor of upholding the hands of the President in this matter, which ought to be nonpartisan, nonpolitical, and purely in the interest of the proper administration of the branches of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MANN. I have not any time.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it is certainly to be regretted that a matter of such great importance as that which the House has under consideration now should be sprung upon it under circumstances when it can not receive the consideration that it merits. There is, Mr. Chairman, no other single administrative question about which the people of the country are so immediately interested as the selection of their postmasters. It comes nearer to them, it is of more immediate interest to them, than any other single administrative feature of the Government. I could not support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. He would put the selection of postmasters in the corporate limits of whatever city or town the post office happened to be situated. That would result in an unfair situation. I know of one case where, in a city of 5,000 people, perhaps, there are seven rural routes that serve 10,000 people, and yet under that system none of the people on the rural routes would have any voice in the selection of a postmaster. I know of another instance in which a small incorporated town of 300 people is the nucleus of three rural routes that serve perhaps four or five times that number of people, yet none of the people on the rural routes would have any voice in the selection of a postmaster.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not do so, I regret to say. I am not in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. Under it the voice of the people is not heard at all. No one who has an interest in the post office can be considered as to his desire. It is not alone that these men should be qualified for service as postmasters. It is also to be ascertained in some way whether or not their services will be acceptable to the people who will be served.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not yield, because I have not any time. These are questions that are to be considered when you come to vote upon these amendments. We can not at this time take these things into consideration. We can not fully discuss them. It may be that these suggestions that I make now are not well founded. But they are well founded, to my mind, and they ought to be seriously considered.

Mr. Chairman, these matters ought to be worked out carefully. The administration ought to work them out carefully and present them to the House. They ought not to be presented in this manner. All of these questions—these civil-service questions and these other matters that are injected in this bill—ought never to have been presented to this House in this bill. We ought to have had the right to consider, separate and apart from these other matters and as a distinct proposition by itself, the question of how much should be paid to the railways for the railway mail service, and we ought not to be compelled now to consider these extraneous questions.

I desire to say just one word regarding the civil service aspect of this case. It is true that the Republicans have stained their record with regard to the civil service. But I want to say to gentlemen on the other side that there has not been a departure from the merit system by any Republican administration in any act that has not brought regret to the hearts of the best members of that party and the best people of the United States, and as a question of party policy there has been no departure from the merit system by the Republican Party that has not injured and weakened it. And so it will be with you. You will not gain strength by the adoption of the spoils system. It will weaken you as individuals in the esteem of your constituencies. It will bring about animosities and controversies that will work your undoing, and the party itself will be weakened and not strengthened by the spoils system. It is inherently wrong and will injure and at last destroy the party that adopts and practices it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the civil-service law, generally applied. In this great Republic, where there are two or three or four hundred thousand people holding positions, a great many of them require special training and expert knowledge, and, knowing that from the nearly one hundred million of population a great swarm of applicants is always present, I can understand the virtue and the benefit of the merit system as applied to those places. But when we have civil service in name we ought to have it in fact. To the one best qualified, if you carry out the spirit of the civil-service law, the appointment should go; and when it comes to clerical work or to expert work, work requiring peculiar qualifications, we all agree that that is the fair and wise way to select persons to fill those positions.

But will any gentleman contend that the result of a mere mental examination determines with any degree of accuracy or is even persuasive that the man or woman who makes the best grade is therefore best qualified to perform the service? Do we not all know that frequently it happens that the greatest scoundrel in the country is one of the smartest men? Do we not know that sometimes those blessed with bright minds are cursed with bad characters? Do we not know that a man who can make a high grade along scholastic lines may himself be so polluted from head to foot as to be a stench in the nostrils of all good men? And yet you gentlemen would say we must have civil-service tests for fourth and third and second class postmasters. I am opposed to it. Gentlemen may talk themselves hoarse about the merit system. There is no merit in it as applied to these post offices, and you know it. Every one of you knows that you can go into a community and select a man whose personal character, integrity, sobriety, intelligence, and business qualifications thoroughly fit him to perform the duties of a fourth-class, third-class, or second-class postmaster. But the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who has to appeal to the intelligence of independents—my notion about it is that an independent is a man who usually votes the Republican ticket—says we must apply the test of mental qualifications. Mr. Chairman, I for one am willing to stand before this whole country, and particularly before my own district, and say I believe that each community can select a man in that community better qualified to give satisfactory service to those to be served than any Civil Service Commission, aided by Republican examiners, can do.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I have not time to yield unless the question is very short.

Mr. FALCONER. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pensylvania [Mr. HULINGS]?

Mr. RUCKER. No; I am not, because I say to you frankly that my district is a Democratic district, and for every post office in it I can find a Democrat who can give as good administration as any man ever gave, and I intend, if in my power, to put a Democrat in every office. I do not dodge. I tell you the facts. Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen are civil-service mad. You Republicans who have trampled on the spirit of civil-service law for 20 years now think it is popular to say to the great horde of thinking, struggling American citizens that only those who can make a grade shall be permitted to hold a Government position, but you are mistaken. Why, down here in some of these departments to-day you have to rub against and walk over half a dozen negroes to get into some of the departments of the Government. I say when you put messengers—big buck coons—on the civil-service list and bar a white boy, and bar the aspirations and hopes of the thousands and millions of boys in this country who are competent to do that service, you gentlemen are playing politics, and there is nothing else in it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FALCONER. I understood that we were to have 15 minutes after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had concluded.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was to close debate in 15 minutes.

Mr. FALCONER. I should like to ask if the gentleman from Illinois did not use five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. He used five minutes. The question is upon the substitute.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McCOY. I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

Mr. MOON. There has been debate enough on this section. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Division.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, let us have tellers and be done with it.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MOON and Mr. MURDOCK.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 93.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations, at any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public; and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend, page 5, by striking out, in line 1, the figure "6" and inserting the figure "5."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk began reading the next section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, that is an entirely different section. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] is entirely within his rights in moving to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. My amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, by striking out section 5, beginning with line 1 and ending with line 6.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to call attention to this section, which I believe has not been fully considered in the committee. I have read the hearings very carefully and could find no record of any discussion on this subject, and it apparently went through without regard to the possible effect——

Mr. MOON. I will state to the gentleman that the hearings do not always show the discussions in the committee. It is only some matter that we desire to have printed which is put in the hearings. There was a full discussion of every one of these sections.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I recognize the fact that sometimes some matter may be left out, but I noticed that this section was mentioned as passed in the hearing without consideration.

Mr. MOON. You will find several passed by and not reported in the hearings.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that this section in a railway mail pay bill may have momentous effects without being fully noted by the House in passing it. In response to great public sentiment, some two years ago action was taken by Congress providing against the operation of post offices on Sunday, and requiring that deliveries, and so forth, should be made only on week days. I fear that this section will entirely nullify that action.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is utterly mistaken. I can not conceive how it will affect that question.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the section provides that all laws in conflict with it are repealed.

Mr. MOON. That does not repeal a Sunday law, because no Sunday law is involved.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to section 283 of the postal laws and regulations, which provides that post offices of the first, second, and third classes shall not be open on Sunday for the purpose of delivering mail to the general public. That was a statute passed on August 24, 1912. This section, it seems to me, would repeal that statute, and also the regulations governing Sunday closing.

By a pretext of this kind, a section which is obscure and vague, it may be possible to completely nullify the will of the people as expressed in law. We all know of the expression of public opinion at the time that law was passed—the demand that the Sunday provision should be enacted by Congress. This section provides for opening offices under regulations of the Postmaster General, and repeals the statutes passed and regulations previously made. I believe it is worthy of consideration, especially since this matter is entirely outside of railway mail pay, and should not be considered in this measure. I believe no harm would be done the bill by striking out the section, which would avoid doubtful meaning and would completely obviate any possibility that the Sunday closing provisions would be nullified and repealed by this section as it stands in the bill. The action providing for Sunday closing was not an unconsidered, spasmodic measure of reform. It was the expression of the desires and aspirations of the people of America, who demanded that their Government should set an example in the realm of business. To repeal that action now, without full knowledge of the issue involved, would be resented, and properly so, by the people. I hope that Congress will embody its purpose to suffer no repeal of its former action by a clear-cut declaration in this section, if it does not desire to strike out the entire section.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman misapprehends the scope of the bill if he thinks that it was not intended for anything else than to settle the question of the railway mail pay. The railway mail pay is involved only in one section—section 13 of the bill. I presume, however, that my friend wanted to talk upon the question of abolishing the closing of the post offices on Sunday, and I am satisfied that he shall do so, but the discussion is altogether inappropriate to this section. This section does not undertake to do anything of the kind that he suggests. The very reading of it will show the absurdity of his discussion:

That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public, and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed.

It simply extends the power of the Postmaster General under these laws, particularly to the nonaccounting offices.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. What does the gentleman understand by "convenience of the public," and that all laws "are hereby repealed"?

Mr. MOON. That does not interfere with the Sunday law, as the gentleman seems to apprehend. There is no law upon that subject that is repealed at all. I do not think that the repeal would operate by implication. I think the gentleman is unduly alarmed upon the subject. There is no purpose to repeal the Sunday law. The main purpose of this is the establishment of nonaccounting offices.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania has in mind line 2 as applicable, in that it provides—

Under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe—and I presume the gentleman fears that the Postmaster General may be able to abrogate any law in effect as to Sunday closing.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no. He can establish the offices under rules and regulations, but he can not abrogate a law directing their being closed on Sunday.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Postmaster General and the department should decide that the convenience of the public required the opening of these offices on Sunday, would he not have the power to open them?

Mr. MOON. It may not be to the convenience of the public that they be open on Sunday. He can not violate law by regulation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But if it should appear so to him, would he not have the power to do so under this section?

Mr. MOON. I do not think this repeals that law. It is not upon that subject, and therefore it would not repeal it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It may not appear to be upon that subject, but that is what it does. The indefiniteness is the danger.

Mr. MOON. Under the gentleman's conclusion, it would operate to repeal every other law that is not upon the subject. A repealing clause has reference to the subject under consideration.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. This section provides:

That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public, and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed.

This has no reference to the time that these offices that may be established or that offices now established shall be kept open any day, whether week days or Sundays.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It gives absolute discretion to the Postmaster General to decide what is for the convenience of the public, and all laws inconsistent with his opinion are repealed. That is what I desire the gentleman to consider.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Suppose this law is passed and the Postmaster General really puts it into practice in the city of Chicago. For instance, suppose he does establish one of these outlying nonaccounting stations, and decides that for the convenience of the public in that particular part of Chicago mail shall be delivered at that office upon Sunday, and that the office shall be open, and that all laws in conflict with this proposition shall be repealed. Does not that do that?

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is carrying entirely too far any power that may be granted to the Postmaster General under this section.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think you can read that into that.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not think so. It never was the intention, and I do not think it bears out that construction.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think from a fair survey of that section that it would give the Postmaster General the power if he decided the convenience of the public would be served?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not, there being a general law upon the subject of what hours the public shall be served, which law would govern.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That law is repealed by this section.

Mr. FINLEY. No; I do not think so. I say to the gentleman that it would not, and that the rules and regulations that the Postmaster General might prescribe would be such rules and regulations relative to establishing a branch or a nonaccounting office or station for the transaction of such postal business, and in my judgment it would have no relation whatever to the hours during which the office should be kept open, when there is a general law on the subject covering that matter.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose there is a general law on this question. The object of this section is to place in the Postmaster General absolute power to prescribe any regulations and rules that he may so desire applicable to the opening of certain offices and the establishment of certain offices.

Mr. FINLEY. That may be established——

Mr. HOWARD. Just a moment. Now, then, after it does that it goes a step further and says that "all laws in conflict." In conflict with what; with the present law, with this particular law or any act of regulation which the Postmaster General may wish to prescribe. Now, then, if that does not give him the power to say this office may be open on Sunday I would like the gentleman to give some reason why it does not.

Mr. FINLEY. These are nonaccounting offices which he may establish, which under the present law is not permissible. In other words every post office under the present law must be an accounting office, and this is designed——

Mr. HOWARD. Substations, I presume.

Mr. FINLEY. And it is a very different proposition from the substations and are to some extent——

Mr. HOWARD. Branch post offices.

Mr. FINLEY. And the main or principal office may be the Chicago office, and the accounting would be at the main office which would be the Chicago office, so I do not think there is any serious question about the meaning of this.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FINLEY. I do.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to an amendment which would clearly express his declaration as to the meaning of this section? Suppose we had a proviso here——

Mr. FINLEY. That matter would not be left to me. I voted for the original law.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman would not oppose it?

Mr. FINLEY. No; I would not oppose, but as I say I voted for the original law and I stand by the original law, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MOON. I would say I would not object to that, but to my mind with all due respect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania it would seem foolish to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Just a minute. Listen to the statute. I know lawyers have different views in construing laws, but this says:

Hereafter the Postmaster General may establish—

What?

He may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

Now, that may be awkwardly expressed, but the whole intent and purpose was to establish these facilities for the benefit of the people. It has no application whatever to the time of opening and closing of the office.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I may be mistaken as to the purpose of this section, but I had supposed it was in order to permit a post office in a city to establish a branch outside of the city limits. We have a provision by a special act of Congress for the establishment of a branch office for the St. Louis office outside of St. Louis. We have another one for some city in Massachusetts. There is, for instance, around Chicago, where the city limits come right in the midst of a settled territory outside of the post offices where it might be more convenient for everybody to have one post office instead of a Chicago office on one side of the line and a special office on another side of the line, but I had supposed that the purpose of this was to permit the Post Office Department to allow the establishment of substations just as now there has been by law outside of city limits.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. While the question may not be pertinent to this section, I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes in the policy of the department in establishing substations in large department stores in cities?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do; where it is convenient.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman think there is a discrimination against the smaller dealer by allowing postal facilities to the large store, thereby depriving the small dealer of quite a share of business?

Mr. MANN. There should be no discrimination, but the Post Office Department ought to be run for the convenience of its patrons, and where it has the most benefit from it I would establish a post-office substation. In our town we do not have enough, but that has not anything to do with this thing.

Now, if, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this section if enacted would repeal the Sunday closing provision, it would repeal all laws on the subject of the post office, because we have various laws applying to post offices, and if this repeals everything that fixes a policy on the ground that it allows the Postmaster General to make the rules and regulations it would repeal everything. But I do not think it would be so construed. It would be construed as repealing so much of the law that now forbids establishing substations outside of the city where the post office is located.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. What is the gentleman's opinion as to the phrase there giving the Postmaster General power to suit the convenience of the public according to his own idea of the convenience of the public and repealing all laws in conflict with it?

Mr. MANN. It is the postal business that may be required for the convenience of the public He can establish substations where he thinks the Postal Service requires it for the convenience of the public; that is it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not think it would limit the Sunday closing hour, does he?

Mr. MANN. I think the Sunday closing law would apply just the same in any event. I do not think there is any question about that. Of course these substations are not governed by the Sunday closing law as the rule exists, unless they are regular postal stations, which would be the case for branch offices, and then they would be governed by the Sunday closing law. I think the only thing that this repeals is the law that now operates to establish these offices.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Well, that phrase "for the convenience of the public" is a very wide one.

Mr. MANN. That is where post offices are established. That is the authority he now has to establish a post office for the convenience of the public.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Under certain statutes passed and regulations which are in force?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, just one word.

The explanation of the gentleman from Illinois as to what this paragraph means is true, according to the statement made by Postmaster General Roper while before our committee. I was under the impression that what he said at that time was taken down in the hearings, although I have not read the hearings since then. I know he thoroughly discussed it, and we interrogated him to a considerable extent as to what was intended to be meant by this section of the bill. I was under the impression that it was very broad, and thought possibly it might contain in it some ulterior purpose which the committee did not know. Now, the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is directly and absolutely in line with what General Roper said he proposed to do with this paragraph—to establish postal stations outside of city limits of certain cities of the United States.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. BARTON. "Under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe," is the language of section 5, for the organization of these branch offices. And it also says "All laws in conflict herewith are repealed." Now, do you mean to say that the rules and regulations prescribed here are in conflict with the standing law if the law is not repealed?

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] answered that question, that the intention of this statute was to enlarge, or give the Post Office Department a larger power in establishing postal stations outside of the city limits, and that any law which heretofore might have been enforced restricting the power of the Postmaster General to establish certain postal stations outside of certain limits would be repealed.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. HOWARD. Under this section would the gentleman maintain that the Postmaster General would have the right to discontinue a post office, say within 6 miles of a large city, at a county seat, that now had a post office, and establish a substation?

Mr. COX. I do not know whether he would or not. He might have and he might not. Now that leads up to the second part.

Mr. HOWARD. That is what I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to say.

Mr. COX. That is the item I have in mind. As stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], all postmasters are required to report direct to the Post Office Department. Now, General Roper said in discussing this section of the bill that in many, many counties that might be called rural counties they have towns and cities of from 2,500 to 4,000 or 5,000 inhabitants, and if he were given authority and power to make one of the larger places in the county an accounting office, then the small post offices in the county could report to the larger office, and that they could call upon the larger place to send some one out at different times and inspect the books of the small offices, particularly the books of the fourth-class postmasters; and he said by that it would bring about two things, first, economy, and at the same time centralize and make much more effective the postal service in that particular community. I am sure from what the Postmaster General said to the committee that there is no attempt whatever to interfere with the Sunday closing, and it will never be so interpreted by the present administration. I believe that is his idea and his intention. To sum the matter up, it carries forward two items, one to give the post office power to enlarge the establishment of postal stations outside of the city. Now, that is one thing sought to be accomplished. Second, to give the Post Office Department power, more particularly in what are called "rural communities," to make some post office in that rural community an accounting office, and supervise, as it were, or more or less inspect, the smaller offices throughout the county, thereby making economy and bringing about more effective service.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Has the Postmaster General, under the present law, the right and the power to abolish a post office and make it a substation or branch office to another office that is established?

Mr. COX. I can not answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and perhaps I may be able to give the information which the gentleman from Colorado desires.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman the same question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will answer it in my time.

Mr. Chairman, under existing law, for nearly 20 years the Postmaster General has had authority to establish branch post offices within 5 miles of the boundary limits of the city having a post office to serve that locality, provided the office to be substituted by the branch office is located in a community of 1,500 or more population. The main purpose of this provision is to lift that limitation. With the extension of the suburbs of large cities and the growth of automobile service, the gentleman can readily understand that there are many suburban communities which are connected territorily with the principal city served by the main post office which is proposed to serve these suburbs. Now, the purpose of this provision, that "all laws in conflict herewith are repealed," refers to that law passed in 1896 which carries that limitation.

This proposed section also gives a further authority to the department to establish what is known as nonaccounting offices. My friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and other older members of the committee will remember when we had under consideration some four or five years ago the codification of the postal laws, it was then proposed, and the committee at that time, under the chairmanship of the much lamented, the late Jesse Overstreet, considered the question of establishment of nonaccounting offices. That was proposed to allow the substitution in country communities for small post offices of nonaccounting offices, and thereby relieve them of furnishing accounts direct to the Post Office Department in Washington, and which would obtain their supplies direct from some central post office in the county, relieving thereby the department officials here from the burden of going over the accounts, and in no wise interfering with the service that was rendered by these little offices in country communities.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STAFFORD. With pleasure.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The question I have in mind is this: Take, for instance, the town of Smithville, with a population of 10,000 or 15,000 people, and the town of Jonesville, 2 or 3 miles away, with a population of 400 or 500 people, and under the provisions of this section it would be possible for the Postmaster General to make the little town of Jonesville a substation of Smithville. In other words, it would be a branch of the Smithville office. Now, although the people of the smaller town have their little local identity and municipal government, and all of the machinery that constitutes a separate community, yet under the provisions of this section, would not they be tied up, as you might say, to the other city, with their branch or substation of the Smithville post office?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am frank to say to the gentleman that the scope of the language would vest that authority in the Postmaster General. But you can not conceive of the Postmaster General administering the service of this great business enterprise except as it is going to be for the convenience of the public generally.

Now, I have in mind an instance where a post office now established beyond the 5-mile boundary limit of my home city would be better served by having direct service from the main post office—Milwaukee—by automobile service or other character of service rather than by railroad communication and by having a separate post-office entity.

As to these nonaccounting offices for small country post offices where the receipts may be only $200 or $250 a year and less, it would relieve the fourth-class postmaster from reporting minutely and in detail their accounts. Under this system the postmaster would purchase the supply of stamps from the nearest large accounting post office. This section is for the improvement of the administration of the Postal Service, for economy in bookkeeping, and for better service for the patrons of the respective offices.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. GOULDEN. The greatest objection seems to be voiced by the Members on the floor to line 6. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion of that—"and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed." Why not strike that out entirely? What has that to do with the rest of the section?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me that when this was first incorporated as a part of another bill introduced by him there was not that omnibus clause, which is now found at the conclusion of this bill, repealing all laws inconsistent herewith. For my part I can not see any objection to striking that line from the bill.

Mr. MOON. It might render ineffective a whole act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to close debate on the section and amendments thereto.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment. I do not want to be precluded from offering it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: At the end of line 5, after the word "public," insert: "Provided, however, That no rule or regulation shall be prescribed to interfere with the closing of post offices on Sunday."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, at the end of line 5, after the word "public," by inserting: "Provided, however, That no rule or regulation shall be prescribed to interfere with the closing of post offices on Sunday."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOON. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 30.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. The Chair will count. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number have arisen. Tellers are refused.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A quorum is present; 99 and the Chair make a quorum.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the question of whether tellers shall be ordered be taken again.

Mr. MOON. What did the Chair say about a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced that there was a quorum present.

Mr. MOON. Let us proceed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Let us have vote by tellers.

Mr. MOON. We have had one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the vote on the question of ordering tellers be again taken. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. All in favor of taking by tellers the vote on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] will rise and stand until they are counted. But before that, without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is this: At the end of line 5, after the word "public," add "Provided, however, That no rule or regulation shall be prescribed to interfere with the closing of post offices on Sunday."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood that the amendment that was voted upon just previously and defeated was the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, that line 6, covering the words "and all laws in conflict herewith are repealed," be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. I ask for tellers.

Mr. HOWARD. I read this amendment, as I thought, audibly.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HOWARD and Mr. MOON to act as tellers.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be again read. We did not understand it; at least I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, at the end of line 5, add the following: "Provided, however, That no rule or regulation shall be prescribed to interfere with the closing of post offices on Sunday."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out section 5.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to prescribe regulations for the establishment and maintenance of a guaranty fund, to be derived from assessments levied against and collected from officers and employees of the Postal Service accountable for funds or property, with which to make good losses resulting from the failure of any officer or employee of the Postal Service to properly discharge his official duties, and for the indemnification of the Government and any person or persons sustaining such loss or losses by payments out of such fund; but nothing herein shall be construed as binding the Government or the Postmaster General to make any such payment or reimbursement: Provided, That the annual assessments of employees shall not be in excess of 75 per cent of the annual premiums or assessments they now pay for bonds furnished to the Government.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out the section just read on page 5, beginning with line 7 and ending with line 22.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee amendment be voted down. This provision ought to go into the law. The department is anxious that this matter be incorporated here. I have a communication from the department to that effect.

I want to say this, that it will save to the postal employees who are required to give bonds—and to give surety bonds as a rule—at least 25 per cent of the amount they are now paying, and unless this is done they will not be required to take out their bonds under this proposed provision of law.

Now, in Canada and in the Philippine Islands this innovation, so to speak, in the Government having a guaranty fund, the amount required now is less than half in the way of premium and payment for postal employees, and I believe by all civil employees required to give bond, than what was required before the passage of the law requiring the fund to be kept up and maintained.

A like condition also prevails in Canada, where it has been tried out in the postal service. I believe in Canada a fund has been accumulated, the interest on that fund being substantially sufficient to make the payment of all losses occasioned by the default of postal employees. The department is anxious to have this law passed, and while there is another bill on the calendar for this very purpose, I want to say to the membership of this House that there is very little chance, if any, of getting this legislation unless it is put in here. The department has communicated with me. I have the letter here before me, and I think there ought to be such a fund. More than that, under the present law and under the present practice in a great many instances the full amount of a loss is not recovered on these surety bonds. By the time you take into consideration the expense of collection, and the occasional failure of a surety company to make the payment, you will see that this legislation is wise, proper, and necessary.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this proposition contemplate that where a man steals from a postal service the loss to the service shall be made up by all the employees in the service?

Mr. FINLEY. It only means this——

Mr. MURDOCK. Does it mean that?

Mr. FINLEY. I will have to answer the question intelligently, if I can. It means that there are certain postal employees now required by law or by rules and regulations to give bond to the Government for the faithful performance of their duty, and to save the Government harmless in all financial transactions, and so on. Now, it will only apply to that class. It will not apply to a man who does not give any bond.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under present conditions certain employees in the Post Office Department give bond.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. If one of those employees steals from the service and is found guilty his bondsmen, usually a guaranty company, make up the loss to the Government.

Mr. FINLEY. When they are solvent they do, but when they happen to be insolvent they do not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the Government loses?

Mr. FINLEY. The Government loses.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the proposition involved in this paragraph is that where an employee steals from the service and is found guilty then all the employees of that class make up the loss by payment. Is that it?

Mr. FINLEY. They are required to pay a premium or a percentage, so to speak, a sum fixed by the department; but this sum can not exceed 75 per cent of the amount that they are now paying.

Mr. MURDOCK. What has the gentleman to say upon this proposition, that that arrangement would penalize the honest man to make up the default of the dishonest man?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, no. When a man goes to a surety company and buys a bond he pays that company the premium. Now, the money that he pays as a premium is gone from him forever.

Mr. MURDOCK. Gone from the individual.

Mr. FINLEY. Gone from the individual. So there can be only one answer to that. Whenever a man pays such a premium his money is gone. Now, where he is required to give a bond——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Where he is required to give this bond, of course he pays a premium to the surety company; but under this amendment, in place of doing that, he will pay into this fund, which will be kept by the Government and which will be kept invested, and he will pay a sum of money not exceeding three-fourths of the premium he is now paying. Experience and statistics bear out the proposition that this will be entirely sufficient and more than sufficient.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the origin of this proposition? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. FINLEY. It has been tried in the Canadian service and in the Philippine Islands, and has been found to be a great success.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has it been indorsed by any of the associations of post-office employees?

Mr. FINLEY. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do you know how they feel about it?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know how they feel about it, but I know that they will feel very well satisfied to be put under this provision of law, which will save at least 25 cents on every dollar that they are now paying to a surety company.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman know how much a letter carrier pays for the bond he gives?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know how much.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He pays 50 cents premium to the surety company.

Mr. FINLEY. Then he would not pay over 35 or 37½ cents on this proposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman mentioned companies failing. Does the gentleman know of any bonding company failing or that could not pay the Government?

Mr. FINLEY. Some of them have.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Can the gentleman name any?

Mr. FINLEY. I have not got them in my mind, but the gentleman must be aware of it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I am not aware of it.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman must be aware of the fact that many of them go out of business and many of them fail.

Mr. POU. Has the Government lost anything by reason of the failure of bonding companies?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; that is stated here in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. COX. Are not the bonding companies fighting this provision?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no question about that.

Mr. COX. To the very last ditch.

Mr. FINLEY. There is no question about that.

Mr. COX. Have they been around to interview the gentleman, to see how he stands?

Mr. FINLEY. No.

Mr. COX. They have been in my office.

Mr. FINLEY. I am glad I was out, if they were there to see me on this proposition. So the First Assistant Postmaster General, who has carefully worked out this proposition, is very much in favor of it. He is sure that it will be for the good of the service. It will save the Government losses now incurred, and will result in cheapening the surety bonds to the postal employees of the Government, and I do not see how anybody can oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, in adopting the amendment to section 5, proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], the majority did not at all accomplish what it desired to accomplish. The Howard proviso was proposed and adopted for the purpose of making the Sunday-closing law applicable to the branch offices, nonaccounting offices, and stations provided for in section 5, so that as under existing law the main office can not now be opened on Sunday; neither should any branch office, nonaccounting office, or station be opened on Sunday. But the proviso fails utterly to do this. If gentlemen will look at lines 3 and 4 of the section, it will be seen that they authorize the Postmaster General to establish "branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office." Observe the distinction between the "branch offices" and "stations" and "the post office." Now, the proviso just adopted follows after the word "public," in line 5, and simply provides that no "post office" shall be kept open on Sunday.

It is perfectly plain that the words "post office" in line 4 and in the proviso refer only to the main office. So that now, under section 5, the Postmaster General can establish any number of branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations, "of any post office," and then by the proviso we provide only that the "post office"—that is, the main office—shall not be kept open on Sunday.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the law now, is it not?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; that is the existing law. So that the proviso as adopted does not prohibit but will permit the opening of branches, nonaccounting offices, and stations on Sundays. There is no question about that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman's point is that if the word "such" had been included in there the amendment would have been effective?

Mr. COOPER. To carry out the intention of the majority it should read:

Provided, That no branch office, nonaccounting office, or station shall be open on Sunday.

But the proviso as adopted simply prohibits the main post office from being kept open on Sunday, and, therefore, under the ordinary rule of statutory interpretation, having said specifically and only that the "post office," the main office, shall not be open on Sunday, it clearly leaves the section as a whole open to the construction that the branches, nonaccounting offices, and stations may be kept open on Sunday.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman thinks that the amendment is harmless?

Mr. COOPER. It fails to accomplish what it was intended to accomplish. Moreover, the section provides that "all laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed," and it authorizes the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to establish branch offices, nonaccounting offices and stations, and so forth, "with such rules and regulations as he may prescribe," and so forth.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is of no effect?

Mr. COOPER. In effect it merely reenacts the existing law prohibiting the opening of "post offices" on Sundays. But it does not prohibit the opening of branch offices, nonaccounting offices, and stations of post offices on Sundays, and so entirely fails to carry out the intention of the gentleman from Georgia and of the majority which adopted it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. to strike out section 7.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FINLEY) there were—ayes 34, noes 4.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That so much of section 1 of the "act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 5, at the beginning of line 3, strike out the figure "8" and insert the figure "6."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. This proposition is to take off the restrictions from the Post Office Department so far as they relate to the forwarding of second-class mail by freight?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the provision under section 6 is to remove the prohibition contained in the appropriation act for the fiscal year of 1913, against extending or enlarging the departmental practice of sending second-class mail matter. The extension of this service to other sections of the country than those in which it is now in effect would result in a large saving in cost of railroad transportation, and the enactment of this provision is desirable. This method of transportation has been in operation since 1911 in the second and third contract sections and resulted in a saving of $1,491,013.85 in the fiscal year of 1913, and its extension to other sections would add largely to this annual saving.

Mr. MURDOCK. The origin of that practice was the removal of a certain part of second-class mail matter by the Postmaster General from the regular mail trains into freight trains without legislation on the part of Congress, was it not?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And subsequent to that order of the Postmaster General and the institution of that practice, either here or in the Senate, I have forgotten which, an amendment was offered which restricted the amount that he could send in that way.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. What was the amount of the restriction?

Mr. MOON. It was not in amount. The restriction was the weighing sections to which it could be sent, and it is now proposed to extend it to all of them.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this dates back to the first legislation Congress had upon the subject, after the order of the Postmaster General?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That if any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 6, strike out the figure "9" and insert the figure "7."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee in what respect this section changes the existing law, if any?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it now, under existing law the subcontractor has no lien upon the pay of the contractor for the payment of services performed in carrying the mail, and this will give that to him.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not have before me the codification of 1908, I think it was, but section 1299, which is, I think, the law on the subject, is almost identical in language with this provision, and the question in my mind is what effect the provision at the end of the bill with regard to the repeal would have upon this section 1299, as that is a rather broader section than the provision contained in the bill.

One question further: Is this section of the bill offered on the recommendation of the department?

Mr. MOON. It is the department's section to cover the various troubles where there is no lien in favor of the person who actually does the work.

Mr. MONDELL. It is designed to make the present law clearer?

Mr. MOON. To make the present law clearer and to see that the man who actually performs the service gets the pay.

Mr. MONDELL. A very proper provision; and I suppose the change is necessary by some ambiguity of the present statute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That temporary mail service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any bidder or contractor to perform the service awarded to him may be provided by the Postmaster General without advertisement, on such terms as he may deem reasonable, at the expense of any such failing bidder or contractor, and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend page 6, beginning of line 21, by striking out "10" and inserting "8."

The question was taken and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This section seems to be almost identical with section 1293 of the postal laws. Was the section in its present form suggested by the department?

Mr. MOON. It is one of two sections to cover the question we have just been discussing. It is that temporary mail service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any bidder or contractor to perform the service awarded to him may be provided by the Postmaster General without advertisement, and they thus can have the public service performed.

Mr. MONDELL. The present law, as the gentleman undoubtedly knows, is almost in the exact language of this provision.

Mr. MOON. What difference does the gentleman find from the present law and this?

Mr. MONDELL. I find very little difference and my query was——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman read the section?

Mr. MONDELL (reading):

That temporary mail service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any bidder or contractor to perform the service awarded under this act—

Meaning the act of July 26, 1892—

may be provided by the Postmaster General without advertisement, on such terms as he may deem reasonable, at the expense of any such failing bidder or contractor.

I think it is possible that the department in carrying out this old law may have found the words "under this act" a limitation.

Mr. MOON. I think that is probably the reason. That is the only material difference.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That whoever shall willfully injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box, pillar box, lock box, lock drawer, or other receptacle established or approved by the Postmaster General for the safe deposit of matter for the mail or for delivery, or any lock or similar device belonging or attached thereto, or any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail matter on any rural delivery route, star route, or other mail route, or shall break open the same; or shall willfully injure, deface, or destroy any mail matter deposited in any letter box, pillar box, lock box, lock drawer, or other receptacle established or approved by the Postmaster General for the safe deposit of matter for the mail or for delivery; or shall willfully take or steal such matter from or out of any such letter box, pillar box, lock box, lock drawer, or other receptacle; or shall willfully injure, deface, or destroy any mail matter deposited in any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail matter on any rural delivery route, star route, or other mail route, or shall willfully and maliciously assault any letter or mail carrier, knowing him to be such, while engaged on his route in the discharge of his duty as such carrier, or shall willfully aid or assist in any offense defined in this section, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, page 7, beginning of line 3, by striking out the figures "11" and inserting "9."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That all persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service in the Civil War, either in the Federal or Confederate Army, shall be exempt from any age limitation in the selection of fourth-class postmasters, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for a proper discharge of the duties of such office.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, page 8, beginning of line 3, by striking out the figures "12" and inserting "10."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In opposing this proposition embodied in this section so as to waive the age limit as to fourth-class postmasters so far as soldiers in the Confederate and Federal Armies are concerned, I wish to say that my motive is not the result of any antipathy or sectional feeling toward any person serving on the other side in the late unpleasantness. My thought is far from it, but we have here a provision directly violative of the Executive order of May 13, the Executive order of your own President, seeking at the direction of the present Postmaster General to protect the service from superannuated employees. This is merely a political sop at the sacrifice of the best interests of the Postal Service. Under existing regulations there is no limitation whatever on soldiers who served in the Confederate Army from serving as postmasters and under the order just referred to there is no age limit, regardless of whether they were civilians or whether they had had Army service so far as fourth-class offices that pay only $500 are concerned. But in those offices of the fourth class that pay more than $500 the Postmaster General and the present President recognize the need of having efficient service by having an age limitation. Now, I think that everyone——

Mr. MOON. Is it not lawful for the President at all times—can not he select what he wants to?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; you are directly violating the President's order in this particular.

Mr. MOON. We are simply waiving the age limit——

Mr. STAFFORD. President Wilson said in his order of May 13 there should be no age limit so far as postmasters are concerned receiving $500; that those receiving over $500 the age limit should be 65 years. What is proposed to be done here?

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman this question: They can not take the examination after 65 years, can they?

Mr. STAFFORD. They can as to offices paying less than $500; as to offices paying more than $500 there is an age limit of 65.

Mr. MOON. In fourth-class offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are two divisions of fourth-class offices under the Executive order, those paying $500 and less and those paying from $500 to $1,000.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman understands what I mean, fourth-class offices running to $1,000. You can examine for fourth-class offices under $1,000 under the present rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; as far as those offices that are less than $500 they are eligible regardless of the age limit.

Mr. MOON. But the gentleman does not get it through his head——

Mr. STAFFORD. Possibly I do not, but I am paying strict attention.

Mr. MOON. Offices that pay above $500——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means under the President's order.

Mr. MOON. Say that an office pays $500 to $1,000. Under the order of the department you can not examine a man for that office who is over 65 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. You can not.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman understands this is giving a preference to this class of men——

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Postmaster General, for a good reason and for the best interest of the Postal Service, said that in these important post offices of the fourth class—that is, with salaries running from $500 to $1,000—that the age limit should be 65 years.

You are opening the gates to those above 65, when they may be superannuated, to the sacrifice of the service. You are going against your own Postmaster General and your own President when he says it is necessary, for efficient service in the administration of these important fourth-class post offices, that the age limit should not be above 65.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will suggest that the gentleman from Wisconsin has not read the final two lines of the section, which say:

Provided, That they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for a proper discharge of the duties of such office.

If they are superannuated or incapacitated in any way, so that they do not possess the business ability to carry on the office, they can not be appointed. I will ask the gentleman if the service is not sufficiently protected by that provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, the Postmaster General, when he had this question under consideration, decided that the age of 65 years should be the limit, and that when persons reach 65 years of age they should not be eligible to perform the duties required of a fourth-class postmaster. The responsibilities and work in these higher fourth-class offices are considerable, and men should not be admitted to the service to undertake the work and learn the duties when they have reached 65 years of age.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman know that this exemption applies to only veterans of the Confederate and Federal Armies, and is the gentleman opposed, under the limitation there providing for incapacity, to excluding Federal veterans from holding these postmasters' places?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not apply only to the Confederate veterans. I did not rise with any motive to awaken any sectional bitterness. I am rising here to speak for the benefit of the service under the order issued by the President. That applies to the veterans of the North as well as to the veterans of the South.

Mr. RAGSDALE. You misunderstood me, evidently.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman's question to mean as to whether this only applied to Confederate veterans?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Oh, no; I did not ask any such thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. It applies to both.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It applies to both.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GOOD. After the word "service," in line 4, insert the words "of the United States" and strike out the words "either in the Federal or Confederate Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 8, in line 4, by inserting, after the word "service," the words "of the United States" and strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "either in the Federal or Confederate Army."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very unfortunate that a provision such as is here proposed should be even seriously thought of by the membership of this House. What is it? It is proposed that Confederate soldiers shall be exempted from the provisions of law fixing an age limit of persons eligible to appointment for fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman if I understood his amendment exactly? The purpose of your amendment is to leave in "Federal" and cut out "Confederate"?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely. It is the history, I think, without exception, of all previous Congresses for the last 40 years to give some preference to those men who in the hour of our country's peril went to the front to preserve the flag of this country.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. RUCKER. In the last Congress we showed our appreciation of those old soldiers by giving them $200,000,000 a year. Now, the gentleman is complaining about the man who fought valiantly, but not as to the one to whom we are paying $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. GOOD. No. We did not give them that much.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this provision reported by the great Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads places a premium upon the acts of those men who from '61 to '65 took up the cause of the Confederacy and fought to destroy this Union. The men in the North, as well as those in the South, who stayed at home and remained loyal and fought the battle of peace, and are now more than 65 years of age, can not go into this service. Under the age limit they are not eligible.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GOOD. Not just now. They can not enter the service at all. But this provision would let down the bars. This provision would place a premium upon disloyalty. There is a good reason why we should except from the provisions of certain laws men who fought to save their country. But can we give preferences to those who took up arms against the Union? I shall never vote to give a preference to any man or any class of men who take up arms against the country and give them recognition for disloyalty. And that is what this provision means.

I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, but that this whole section should be stricken out, and I will tell you why. So far as it is proposed to give relief to the Union soldiers, it will be but a minimum of advantage, for at the end of this month the examinations for fourth-class postmasters will have been concluded throughout the entire country. And so the only old soldier who would be benefited by this act would be persons who might subsequently take examinations in case of the death or the resignation of a fourth-class postmaster, where there were no persons on the civil-service list.

If the motion that I have made does not prevail, I shall make a motion to strike out the section. But at any rate it seems to me that Congress can not afford at this or any time to recognize and place upon the acts of rebellion of any people in this country the stamp of approval. That great conflict passed years ago. The smoke of it passed away before I was born, and I want to say now that I am controlled by no prejudices, but I believe generations yet unborn will hold fast to the principle, not only in the North, but in the East, and the West, and South, that we can never afford to place a premium upon the disloyal acts of any of our citizens. We must remember that obedience to the law is the only thing for which we should give reward. I have no prejudice in this matter, but a fundamental principle controls my voice and my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. BUTLER. Will not the gentleman please inform me, because I do not feel that I understand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the gentleman may have half a minute in order to answer one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. The mere fact that a man was disloyal does not disqualify him from holding a fourth-class post office?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all. But this provision relieves him from the disability under the present law with regard to the age limit.

Mr. BUTLER. Does it not relieve our fellows, too?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely. Everybody stands on the same basis under the law as it now stands.

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not want to enter with any feeling into the discussion of a matter of this sort, but we all understand that a part of our people were on one side of a great war and a part of them were on another. The gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. GOOD] says he was born after the conflict between the States was over. If he is to remain in this country to fan the prejudices of a conflict that raged before he was born, it would be better for good citizenship if he never had been born. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why should he speak thus at this late day, when even those bitter, hateful, black radicals that infested and plundered a portion of the country after the war was suppressed by the loyal citizens of the North and the East? How, after that era of the bloody shirt was passed, could it possibly be that any human being imbued with a single sentiment of devotion and loyalty to his country could find his way into this House and give expression to views such as the gentleman who has just left the floor has uttered? The statement that they are not the product of sectional hate and prejudice carries its refutation upon its face. No man could be guilty of uttering such sentiments without such prejudice.

Mr. Chairman, this is but a preferential distinction in favor of the soldiers of two great armies. I do not care what men think about the merits of that conflict; all honest men believe that the men contending on both sides of it were honest in that contest. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All men who are survivors of that conflict and their descendants thank God that the Union was preserved and that constitutional liberty for which the Confederates fought still lives to bless our country. Why is it that we should hear this doleful sound from the tomb after nearly 50 years have passed? I could imagine when the gentleman was speaking that it was the ghost of some departed deserter who never had faith in either army that was talking here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why the preference? It is plain enough. Here are men who had taken practically out of their lives four years—four years in which they could not perform the service and the duties of a citizen. The balance of the people in this country have, to my mind, that many years' advantage over these old soldiers of the two armies. Let us make them equal where, under the language of this section, they are competent and capable of filling these offices. Let us be manly enough to give them the advantages to which they are entitled. In my opinion, under the conditions, it is sentiment, it is true, but in this country or any other land of liberty when sentiment is lost in questions of consideration the day of decadence is coming. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. HULINGS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To perfect the section?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HULINGS. My amendment is that all after the word "persons" in the third line shall be stricken out, down to and including the word "Army" in the fifth line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 8, by striking out, after the word "persons," in line 3, the following: "Honorably discharged from the military and naval service in the Civil War, either in the Federal or Confederate Army."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that this subject has been brought up here in the way it has been, and treated as it has been. I think thoughtful persons, North and South, are willing to forget that quarrel. [Applause.] For myself, being brought up in the North, I can not wipe out the distinction between the men who fought to save this Union and the men who fought to destroy it; but I believe they were equally honest and sincere. The valor of the Union soldier which we vaunt in the North necessarily was measured by the valor of the southern soldier. [Applause.] Whatever of valor and fortitude and of manly quality was shown by the soldiers of those two armies, they were all Americans. [Applause.] And I am willing to forget that quarrel.

I repeat, I regret that it has been brought in here, and I address myself only to this section of the bill. I should like to see this section changed so that it shall read, "That all persons shall be exempt from any age limitation in the selection of fourth-class postmasters, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for a proper discharge of the duties of such office." That, I think, is all that is necessary. You can leave it to the communities of the South, where they have brave Confederate soldiers, to choose their postmasters, and if those communities desire to have as their postmasters brave Confederate soldiers who are beyond the age of 65, that is up to them. In my section the brave Federal soldier will always be preferred for any public duty which he can discharge. Make no comparisons at all. Do not invite into an enactment which you propose here a comparison between the Confederate and the Federal soldier. Let these comparisons die here as they have died in the hearts of the brave men who fought. I hope this amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, we shall not object to that amendment. I do not care so long as we get the substance of it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves to strike out the section. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 39.

So the motion to strike out was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That such part of section 6 of the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a system of postal savings depositories as provides that "no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month" is hereby repealed, and said act is further amended so as to repeal the proviso in section 7 thereof and insert in lieu of such proviso the following: "Provided, That no interest shall be paid on such part of the balance to the credit of any person as is in excess of $1,000."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 8, at the beginning of line 9, strike out the figures "13" and insert "11."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 13, or 11, as it is now numbered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOON. All of lines 9 to 17, inclusive.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 8, by striking out all of section 11, beginning with line 9 and ending with line 17.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion for the reason that some time ago the House passed this very section, and the Senate has passed it with amendments, and the matter is now in conference. I think it is unnecessary to have two bills covering the same question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That sections 2 and 13 of the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes," be hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That provisions of section 3 of the act of July 5, 1884, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes,' are hereby extended and made applicable to all official mail matter pertaining to the business of the Postal Savings System; and hereafter the board of trustees for the control, supervision, and administration of the postal savings depository system shall not be required to show in the annual report prescribed by section 1 of the act of June 25, 1910, establishing such system, the amount of work done for that system by the Post Office Department and Postal Service in the transportation of free mail."

"SEC. 13. That postmasters, assistant postmasters, clerks, or other employees at post offices of the presidential grade, and postmasters at post offices of the fourth class, shall not be allowed or paid any additional compensation for the transaction of postal savings depository business."

With the following committee amendments:

Amend, page 8, at the beginning of line 18, by striking out the figures "14" and inserting "12."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that ought to be "11," instead of "12," as the preceding section was stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, to strike out "12" and insert "11."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from July 1, 1914, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following five classed, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, closed-pouch service, and side and transfer service.

Full railway post-office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post-office cars shall be for standard sized cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Apartment railway post-office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed and fitted up and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post-office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars of 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars on trains upon which full railway post-office cars or apartment railway post-office cars are not operated.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department, as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried.

Closed-pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

Side and transfer mail service shall be the transportation of mails between railroad stations and post offices supplied therefrom and between railroad stations.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 20 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

For apartment railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 10 cents for each mile of service by a 30-foot apartment car, and 5 cents for each mile of service by a 15-foot apartment car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car, and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

The storage-car mail service at not exceeding 18 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2.50 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Where authorizations are made for cars of the standard lengths of 60, 30, and 15 feet, as provided by this act, and the railroad company is unable to furnish such cars of the length authorized, but furnishes cars of lesser length than those authorized, but which are determined by the department to be sufficient for the service, the Postmaster General may accept the same and pay only for the actual space furnished and used, the compensation to be not exceeding pro rata of that provided by this act for the standard length so authorized: Provided, That the Postmaster General may accept cars and apartments of greater length than those of the standard requested, but no compensation shall be allowed for such excess lengths.

For closed-pouch service, on routes upon which closed-pouch service only is performed, at not exceeding 95 per cent of the rates of compensation provided by existing law for average daily weights of mail carried over the whole route; on routes upon which apartment railway post-office car and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $20 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried, and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weight greater or less than 2,000 pounds; and on routes upon which full railway post-office car and closed-pouch services or full railway post-office car, apartment car, and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $19 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried, and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weights greater or less than 2,000 pounds, the average daily weights to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails.

For side and transfer mail service the Postmaster General is authorized to provide, in his discretion, by regulation screen or other wagon, automobile, or mail-messenger service under existing law, or to contract with the railroad company, after advertisement, for the performance of any or all service on its route. Postmasters at post offices of the third and fourth classes shall be eligible as contractors for this service.

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act, excepting for side and transfer mail service.

The initial and terminal rates provided for herein shall cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, lighting, heating, cleaning mail cars, and all other expenses incidental to station service and required by the Postmaster General in connection with the mails that are not included in the car-mile rate. The allowance for full railway post-office cars, apartment railway post-office cars, and storage cars may be varied in accordance with the approximate difference in their respective cost of construction and maintenance.

For the purpose of ascertaining the average weight of closed-pouch mails per day upon which to adjust compensation, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to have such mails carried on the several routes weighed by the employees of the Post Office Department for such a number of successive days, not less than 35, at such times after July 1, 1914, as he may direct, and not less frequently than once in every year thereafter, the result to be stated and certified in such form and manner as he may direct. In computing the average weight of mails per day carried on a railroad route, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor. The expenses of taking the weights of mails and the compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings, for assistance in completing computations, and of rental, if necessary, in Washington, D. C., shall be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

In computing the car miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

In computing the car miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

New service and additional service may be authorized at not exceeding the rates herein provided, and service may be reduced or discontinued with pro rata reductions in pay, as the needs of the Postal Service may require: Provided, That no additional pay shall be allowed for additional closed-pouch service on established routes until the next regular readjustment of pay therefor on such routes, and no additional pay shall be allowed for additional car service unless specifically authorized by the Postmaster General.

All cars, or parts of cars, used for the railroad mail service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction, and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe, or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railroad company not conforming to these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. In cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

Service over property owned or controlled by another company or a terminal company shall be considered service of the railroad company using such property and not that of the other or terminal company: Provided, That service over a land-grant road shall be paid for as herein provided.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation, when required by the Postmaster General.

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails, and when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General shall in all cases decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed. Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and with due speed all mailable matter, equipment, and supplies directed to be carried thereon. If any such railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, equipment, and supplies when required by the Postmaster General on any train or trains it operates, such company shall be fined such amount as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of railroad companies carrying the mails under the provisions of this act for reduction in service or in frequency of service where, in his judgment, the importance of the facilities withdrawn or reduced requires it and impose fines upon them for delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the value of the service in cases where it is not performed, and not exceeding three times its value if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the railroad company.

The provisions of this act shall apply to service operated by railroad companies, partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

The provisions of this act respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit under oath, when, and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals, when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to return to the mails, when practicable for the utilization of car space paid for and not needed for the mails, postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the Postal Service.

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and, where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this act, to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

The Postmaster General may have the weights of mail taken on railroad-mail routes, and computations of the average loads of the several classes of cars and other computations for statistical and administrative purposes made at such times as he may elect, and pay the expense thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, is the Clerk reading the committee amendments as he goes along?

Mr. FINLEY. As we understand it, the entire section is being read, and then we will take up the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). In the ordinary practice of the House amendments would be in order at the end of each paragraph instead of at the end of the section.

Mr. FINLEY. I think both courses have been pursued in the Committee of the Whole. We understand that the entire section is being read, and that after the section is completed we will then take up the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the course suggested by the gentleman will be followed.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. After this section has been read there will then be opportunity to act upon the committee amendments. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. There will be that opportunity, under the agreement just made. The usual practice is to offer amendments at the end of each paragraph, but under the agreement just made, at the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], after the entire section is read, then amendments will be in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. In view of the length of this section, which runs from page 9 to page 22, it is practically impossible to keep the whole section in our minds at once, and I ask unanimous consent that it be read paragraph by paragraph, and that amendments may be offered at the end of each paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that would be the regular and ordinary course of procedure, but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] just submitted a request, which has been agreed to, that the whole section be read first.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not understand that he submitted it as a request. I thought he merely made a suggestion.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall object to changing that, because I think we will get along with the bill much more rapidly and just as intelligently if we read the whole section at once.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been agreed to, and the Clerk will proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. We think there will be no trouble about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the section and then read the following committee amendment:

Page 9, line 19, strike out the figures "15" and insert "13."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, that should be "12" instead of "13."

Mr. MANN. By unanimous consent, make it 12.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONRY). If there be no objection, the change will be made from 13 to 12.

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Amend, on page 10, line 2, by striking out "5" and inserting in lieu thereof "4."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 10, line 5, before the word "closed-pouch," insert the word "and," and after the word "service," strike out the comma and the words "and side and transfer service," and insert a period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 11, strike out all of lines 13, 14, and 15.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 11, strike out, in line 19, the figures "20" and insert "21."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the committee amendment. We are now moving out of the field of pay by weight into the field of pay by space. Under the new system there are two full-sized cars, as there were under the old system, the full railway post office and the storage car. They are of equal length and equal capacity, although the storage cars under the old system have always carried more mail on the average than the railway post office. The railway post office technically is a traveling post office, where mail is distributed. A storage car is one in which the mail is loaded in bulk. The average load in the railway post office will run from 2½ to 4 tons. The average load in a storage car is from 14,000 pounds upward. Under the present system we pay for the transportation of the mails in railway post offices by space and weight and in storage cars only by weight.

Under the new system we are to pay for the transportation of mails in storage cars by space. The question will rise speedily, after this has become law, Why should a difference of rates be made for space between that allowed for full railway post-office cars and that allowed for storage cars? The question has been asked already upon the floor of the House and it has not been adequately answered. I understand that the Postal Commission's report would give an identical rate for both services. It seems to me that that would be correct. It is not an answer to say that the railroads are put to an added expense in the cost of the storage cars, for they are not. The expense for a storage car will probably be, in the course of a year, greater than that for a full railway post-office car. Practically all of the storage cars in this country come out of and go into expensive terminals, and the matter of switching them and cleaning and lighting them, and so forth, will bring the expense of those cars to the railroads above the expense incurred to the railroads by the full railway post-office cars.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has studied this question thoroughly. What is the difference in equipment between a storage car and a full railway post-office car?

Mr. MURDOCK. My understanding is that a full railway post-office car has racks, pigeonholes, and that a storage car has not. On a train which carries mail out of New York City—that is, one of the larger trains—there are two kinds of cars. One of them is a full railway post-office car, where the men distribute the mail, and the other is a storage car, where the mail is piled in bulk. As the mail in the full railway post-office car is separated and tied up and dispatched by routes, other mail is taken from the storage car into the full railway post-office car for further distribution and separation. My point is this, that the rate which the committee has in the bill as an amendment for railway post offices—that is, 21 cents—should be reduced to the amount allowed, in amendment, for storage cars, 20 cents. That is, my proposition is to let the original committee amendment for railway post offices stand, so that the rate we pay for space for storage cars shall be the same as the rate we pay for railway post-office cars. It makes quite a difference. I have no desire to deceive the House on this proposition. If the original figure of 20 cents in the committee bill stands, it will make a difference in saving to the Government of over $1,000,000; and if the amendment made by the committee raising this pay from 20 to 21 cents is adopted, it will cost the Government over a million dollars more than it would otherwise. I am opposed to the committee amendment changing 20 to 21 cents, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I think, was warranted in making the change by way of amendment in the original bill that has been made. What is the proper rate?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question right there at the start, and it will simplify matters? Does the gentleman believe that the rates in a storage car and the rates in a railway post-office car ought to be the same? I hope the gentleman will answer that.

Mr. FINLEY. I am coming to that; yes. What is a proper rate to be paid by the Government to the railroad companies for transporting mails either on a weight basis or on a space basis has never been determined to the satisfaction of everybody in this country and never will.

The Post Office Committee thought that the change from a weight basis to a space basis is necessary. All that has been gone into here and I do not care to repeat it. We propose now to change to a space basis, and so far as the railroad company is concerned it will be required to furnish the space to the Government necessary to transport the mails for the Post Office Department. What difference does it make to the railroads whether there are 2½ tons of mail or 3½ tons? None at all. But that is the gist of this whole proposition. It makes a great deal of difference to the Government. I stated here yesterday, and I repeat now, that I have no doubt in the world that the weight carried in single cars would be largely increased and necessarily so, and I think the Government, if it does make up its mind to do so, and we are considering that now, changes from a weight basis to a space basis, ought to pay the railroads for the space that it occupies. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it will be seriously—well, I shall not make it as strong as that, but I can not bring my mind to see or understand how it is that anybody can conclude that a railroad will be at no more trouble, no more time, no more expense in handling and lighting and heating and cleaning a full railway post-office car than it will a storage car, and I have studied the postal propositions for many years.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. We already pay them extra for that service, and I wish the gentleman would answer why we should pay them more for service in one car than for service in another car of equal size.

Mr. FINLEY. In a full railway post-office car the railroad has to haul postal employees engaged in the business of handling the mails, many cars having several clerks.

Mr. MURDOCK. But postal clerks constantly go into the storage car while the storage car is moving. I want to say to the gentleman that this will rise to plague him and Congress unless it is changed now.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is wrong about that. We all know what a storage car is. A storage car in carrying the mails is on the basis of a through freight train loaded at New York for shipment to Pittsburgh or Chicago. It is on that basis. It is not like freight in a car for local distribution along the line of the railroad. That is the difference. So that clerks going into a storage car go in there only to see that the mail is not tampered with, and rather as inspectors in charge, and so on. The gentleman does not contend at all that the same number of clerks would be in a storage car that would be in a full railway post-office car.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly not; but I do claim that the Government is paying for space, and space in each case is equal. We ought not to pay more for one than for the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. The freight rates that the gentleman is required to pay to the railroad company in a shipment of goods is the answer to his question. The gentleman can get a cheaper rate from Wichita, Kans., to St. Louis or Chicago on his full load of freight in one car than he can on local or way freight. He can get a better rate, he can get much cheaper rates, and it is on that principle, so that I think the gentleman from Kansas is evidently wrong.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the average pay on that car has entirely disappeared from this equation, as the gentleman from South Carolina knows, so far as the railroads are concerned. It makes no difference to the railroad whether it pulls a railway post-office car empty or whether it pulls it with 2½ tons of mail in it; and the gentleman knows that, and the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. FINLEY. We all understand that, and I do not know about not answering the gentleman's question; that is a matter of opinion, and it may be that the gentleman can not answer his own question.

Mr. MURDOCK. I can answer my own question. There is absolutely no warrant for this, and I say we ought to make this rate 21 cents in both instances or 20 cents in both instances.

Mr. FINLEY. I suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has changed the system of the rate of pay, but has not changed his rates.

Mr. FINLEY. No; the Post Office Committee believed—and I think correctly—that there should be a difference in the storage-car pay and in full railway post-office car pay.

Mr. MURDOCK. However, the commission did not——

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will excuse me, my time is limited and I wish to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to be polite, but I want to make this statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FINLEY. The expease to the railroad company on a full railway post-office car fully warrants the difference made by the Post Office Committee in the difference in pay between the storage car and the full railway post-office car. It has not been denied by anybody I know of until the gentleman from Kansas rose to-day.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know that the commission was going to report the two rates to be identical?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know anything about what the commission is going to do.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do; it so happens I understand the commission was to do that very thing, but whether it was or not, the proposition I make is just.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, what this commission is going to do I do not know; they never informed me of what they are going to do. They are men of ability, of character, and so on, but they have made no report; but we framed the best bill we could, and, as I stated here yesterday, we did what we considered to be fair to the people of the United States to give them an efficient postal service, one that would make for economy and at the same time be fair to the railroads and pay for facilities rendered to the Government and no more. The Post Office Committee was unwilling to do anything else. I think it is a bootless task, and I can see no logic in arguing here that the railroads should receive as much pay for the storage car as they should receive for the full railway post-office car. I could not see it, the Post Office Committee could not see it, and the gentleman from Kansas here is the only man who can see it. I am not impugning his motives or his ability to see, but I think there is a difference, and the committee has settled this, and, I think, settled it wisely.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if I may venture to attempt to answer the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kansas, he wants to know why a distinction is justified between a storage-car charge and a railway post-office car charge. Passing the question of the adequacy of the revenues to the railroads and treating the car as the unit, the Post Office Department has made these suggestions: That the storage car does not require light, heat, and attention in the way of ice water and cleaning at the terminals.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman seems to fail to take into the equation at that point the pay for that service in each instance separately. If the gentleman will confine himself to a comparison between the moving cars after they leave the terminals, then I think I can follow him.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The characteristic of the railway post-office car is that between destination terminals it stops to take on mail and put off mail in as many instances as there are stopping places in between, and the railway post-office car has to be served with the oncoming mail by the railroad officials. That is not true of the storage car; it is only opened and closed at destination terminals.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman with reference to the delivery of mail between the railroad station and the post office. Where is the difference between the storage car and the railway post-office car? My understanding is that in large cities the mail is delivered through the screen-wagon service.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I was not referring to that; but it is the duty of the railroad at the station to load the mail on the car. The railway post-office car between New York and Pittsburgh may have this duty performed for it a dozen times, but with a storage car it only has to be rendered at New York.

Mr. MANN. But does it not also have to deliver mail between the post office and the station?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Under the well-known circumstances; yes.

Mr. MANN. Would that occur ordinarily with a storage car?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. That would not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, while at first blush one would think that the railroads should receive the same compensation for space in a storage car as it would receive when hauling a railroad post-office car, when you stop to think, and consider the service as it is, you will see that there is some reason why there should be a difference. One distinction has already been referred to by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], that so far as the storage car is concerned there is not that added terminal cost in dispatching and receiving mails. The storage car, considering the service as it is, is generally a through car. Sometimes these storage cars are not only through cars, but through cars on a through train. For instance, on those fast mail trains that are made up every night and sent out at 6 o'clock from New York City and destined across the continent on the Pennsylvania and New York Central to Chicago, and from Chicago transferred to Milwaukee, and again to be transferred at St. Paul, and then on to the Pacific, most of the storage cars go through as a train. It is true that in some instances there are storage cars connected with the railroad post-office cars which are made up for the distribution of the mail en route, but in the large number of instances the trains are made up in the main of storage cars proper. There is this other phase or element of cost to be considered in favor of the storage car over that of the railway post-office car. The statistics are uncontradicted that there is less mail hauled in a railway post-office car as far as tonnage is concerned than in the storage car. The average amount of tonnage in a railway post-office car of 60-foot length is from 3 to 4 tons. The weight of the car is from 50 to 60 tons. That is the dead weight. And in a storage car with the same dead weight the average weight runs from 20 to 40 tons, and sometimes even as high as 50 tons. It costs more to carry the storage car with a dead weight of 50 or 60 tons, with 20, 30, and sometimes 40 or 50 tons of mail, than it does a railway post-office car where the dead weight is 60 tons, with only 3 tons of mail. So in that particular the railroads should receive an added compensation for the storage car. But here is the elemental proposition that is present in this case, that in the service as it is storage cars are carried through from the point of dispatch to the point of destination, and with less frequent stops, with no stops to speak of, en route, except at the main stations; for instance, from New York to Chicago, the trains only stopping where they change engines at the section point, there is less expense in operation than in the case of a railway post-office car. I think the department is right in its differentiation in favor of a less price for the storage car, though the commission, it is true, as represented by the members of the joint committee before our Post Office Committee, stated that they were going to recommend the same rate for each service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a short statement of a minute or so.

In the first place, there ought to be this comparison made: The railroad companies receive about 24¾ cents a car mile from the passenger service. Everybody knows that the passenger service is a more expensive service than the railway post-office service. We are proposing 21 cents per mile and terminal charges, making about 22½ cents altogether, for the railway post-office service. There is that much difference between the cost to the railroads of moving the two classes of cars. We are recommending 20 cents a mile and terminal charges for the storage-car service, and there is a cent difference without any doubt in the cost to the railroad between the railway post-office car and the storage car.

Now, why? In the first place, the railway post-office car is a car in which the mail is distributed and men are carried, ice water furnished, heat, cleaning, and everything that goes to make up sanitation furnished, while the storage car is a fast-freight car. When the mail is put into that car the doors are locked and the car starts on its way to its destination, and no charge to the railroad company occurs during all the time of the transportation except the cost of moving the car. So it is a mathematical certainty that there is a difference in the cost of moving these classes of cars. And the committee has tried to differentiate along what it believes to be reasonable lines in fixing compensation for the movement of the cars in classes as described, believing that if the railroad company does earn but 24¾ cents per mile on a passenger car where it has to furnish conductors and brakemen and better cars and go to more expense for cleaning and lighting and heating there surely should be some difference between the amount earned from that service and the amount paid for the railway post-office service, and that, on the other hand, there ought to be less paid for storage-car service than is paid for the railway post-office cars on account of the lower cost to the railroad company for the movement of the storage car.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided: and there were—ayes 49, noes 3.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 24, strike out the figures "10" and insert "10½."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, strike out all of lines 20 to 25, inclusive, and on page 14, lines 1 and 2, and insert the following:

"The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise: Provided, That the Postmaster General in his discretion may relieve any of the roads of such service."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] a question in regard to this? Is this designed to change the existing law and practice?

Mr. MOON. This section, as the gentleman will observe, with the exception of the proviso, is practically the existing law. The purpose of this proviso, as I understand it, is to relieve some of the very weak and short-line railroads which insist that under certain conditions it is a burden upon them to perform this service.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, the existing law requires the railroads, where the Government does not maintain special services, to deliver the mail within 80 rods?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is this designed to remove that limitation?

Mr. LLOYD. Not except in the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON. It does not remove it except in the discretion of the department.

Mr. MANN. The department will not make fish of one and flesh of another, will it?

Mr. MOON. The proviso, as the gentleman will observe, is a very broad one. That will enable the Postmaster General to relieve the road of that service in his discretion. There is a difference of opinion as to the value of that service. The department insists that it costs about a million dollars a year. The railroad companies insist that it costs only $500,000. By reason of the conditions of short-line roads and the burdens resting upon them the contention of the department is challenged, and it is thought best to give this section a broad scope, so that in proper instances, where the parties are not given sufficient compensation, the department can exercise its discretion.

Mr. MANN. I was seeking to ascertain what was attempted to be accomplished by it. As I understand it, it is to remove the present limitation of 80 rods?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, are you now through with the committee amendments?

Mr. MANN. On that section.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; on that section.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have an original amendment to offer to the section.

Mr. FINLEY. What section are we on, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Section 13.

Mr. FINLEY. We have section 16 yet to consider.

Mr. MURDOCK. The amendment that I offer will not follow the bill that the Clerk has been reading from because I have a different print.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] submits an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is at the bottom of that paragraph, beginning with "news service," on page 16. It begins with line 12 in the copy that I have.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, line 6, after the words "Postmaster General," insert:

"Provided, That the Postmaster General shall withhold from all transportation lines which were paid for the carriage of the mails between the year 1873 and June 7, 1907, on a basis of the average daily weight of mails found by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days included in the weighing period, all payments under the provisions of this act until an amount equaling the overpayments to such railroads by reason of the use of an erroneous divisor, shall have been withheld."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to recover to the Government between $70,000,000 and $80,000,000. The very magnitude of the sum will perhaps turn some gentlemen against it; but the proposition is an absolutely just one, and during the few minutes which I have I want to explain it to the Members who are here, if I may have their attention.

In the month of February, 1907, I offered in the Committee of the Whole an amendment which was within the law, directing the department to use a correct divisor, a divisor of 7 instead of 6. A point of order was made against it. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole held my amendment to be out of order I appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the committee sustained the Chair. That fact, the sustaining of the Chair by the House, has been used for seven years by the railroads in the courts against the Government. The law as to the divisor is plain, and the action of the House on that occasion was in contravention of the plain facts and the truth. It is certainly incumbent on the House to-day to give some consideration to this proposition in view of the former erroneous action. After the House had refused to adopt the plain direction to the department, a direction which was within the law, a direction to use the divisor which was specified in the statute, and which the department had not been using, the Post Office Department itself changed the divisor and without any change of law, used a correct one, seven-days divisor on seven-days' weights, to get as a quotient the average daily weight, which change resulted in a saving of $5,000,000 annually to the Government. The railroads combated the Post Office Department's action on the matter, and the question was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Bonaparte, who in a lengthy opinion held that the use of the divisor of 7 was legal and correct. The railroads thereupon took the matter to the courts, and it was recently decided in the Court of Claims in favor of the Government.

Now, what was the contention of the railroads?

The contention of the railroads was that long-continued contemporaneous departmental interpretation of the statute fixed the terms of the law and made the use of a divisor of six on seven days' weights legal. The court held that that would be true if the statute were doubtful; but the court held that the statute was not doubtful. That is, confirming the order of the department and the opinion of Mr. Bonaparte, the Court of Claims held that from 1873 to 1907 the department had used, against the plain, unmistakable provisions of the law, a wrong divisor. By that use of a wrong divisor for 34 years the department overpaid the railroads between $70,000,000 and $80,000,000. Since the divisor was changed in 1907 this Government has accumulated, by reason of that changed divisor, a sum something between $25,000,000 and $31,000,000 in the Treasury. The railroads have been attempting to obtain that sum from the Government. They have gone to the courts for it and they have used the action of Congress in 1907 and the rulings from the Chair and the action of the House on my amendment to sustain them in their argument that the department could not legally use a divisor of seven. The railroads lost their contention. Now, is there anyone here who will say that a suit like that ought to be one sided? Is there anyone here who will argue that the Government stands only to lose in this matter; the railroads only to gain? Ought Congress to play a game of "tails I lose, heads you win"? Is there anyone here to contend that the Government should be compelled to be party to a suit where if it loses the suit it has a large amount of money to pay, but where if it wins the suit on the same facts and law it can not recover the money that has been wrongfully and illegally paid out of the public funds?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any figures to show how much that would amount to?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have stated that the amount paid to the railroads from 1873 to 1907 by the use of this wrong divisor is between $70,000,000 and $80,000,000. It has been computed by percentages by years on different roads. It is not a difficult matter to compute the whole loss by years and railroad routes. The Government ought to withhold the amount that has been wrongfully and illegally paid out of the Treasury. The enactment of this amendment which I have offered would accomplish this. I submit it to the House.

Mr. MOON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOON. Then I will take the floor in my own time. I want to suggest that while the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] may have some merit, it is a question involving the rights not only of the Government, but of the carriers who have carried the mails for a number of years, to such an extent that we ought not to attempt to pass upon it now in the committee on a mere amendment of this character. I suggest to the gentleman that if he wants that question investigated it would be but fair to give to the railroad companies as well as to the Government a full hearing before the committee. It ought to come up by a separate bill. It is a matter of too much importance to be taken up in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 10, noes 49.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-nine Members, and the Chair makes 100. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is rejected.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. MOON. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MURDOCK. On page 15, line 10, this language occurs:

In computing the average weight of mails per day carried on a railroad route, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor.

Now, when I offered my original divisor limitation back in 1907 to the Post Office bill a point of order was made against it, the claim being made that it was a change of existing law. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole held that it was a change of existing law. I appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the House sustained the Chair. It is that fact, that operation of this House, which the railroads have used in the courts as an argument that the old divisor of six was legal. What I want to get from the gentleman from Tennessee is this: He does not consider this language, in view of the present practice in the department, a change in existing law?

Mr. MOON. No; it just rather clears it up.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am anxious to get his expression as the chairman of this committee, and, if I can have it, the expression of the House of Representatives, that this language is not a change of law, because it is a similar amendment to the one I offered which was ruled out, and the overruling of which the railroads have attempted to use in the courts against the Government.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not believe it is a change of law, and I do not believe that it is the intention of Congress to change the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman that it is the identical language of the existing law that is embodied in this provision.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is correct, I trust.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that I was very cautious to compare that with the existing provision of law, fearful that there might be some change so that the divisor proposition would be altered, and I found that this phraseology is identical with existing law.

Mr. MURDOCK. In 1908 an attempt was made to alter it, and that was prevented for that reason.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service, by the act of March 9, 1914, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, are hereby available for the purposes of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 22 line 20, strike out the figure "16" and insert the figure "14."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the figure "14" to the figure "13."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as modified.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 23, line 3, strike out the figures "17" and insert the figures "15."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of this section be passed over temporarily until we can finish the proposed amendments of the committee, which will come in before that, so that this section may come at the end of the bill. There are two or three amendments in the nature of new sections.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 14. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders had been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section:

"SEC. 15. That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to that committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, strike out all after the words and figures "Sec. 15" and insert:

"That on and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a standard route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly; on routes 22 miles and less than 24 miles, $1,152; on routes 20 miles and less than 22 miles, $1,080; on routes 18 miles and less than 20 miles, $960; on routes 16 miles and less than 18 miles, $840; on routes 14 miles and less than 16 miles, $720; on routes 12 miles and less than 14 miles, $672; on routes 10 miles and less than 12 miles, $624; on routes 8 miles and less than 10 miles, $576; on routes 6 miles and less than 8 miles, $528; on routes 4 miles and less than 6 miles, $480. A rural letter carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes: Provided, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles, and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length, may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum."

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I desire to offer to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina state in what manner he proposes his amendment?

Mr. FINLEY. I propose my amendment to strike out all after the words and figures "Sec. 15," and to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman offers his as an amendment?

Mr. FINLEY. As an amendment.

Mr. BLACKMON. And I offer mine as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation as the Chair understands it is this: Section 15 is a committee amendment. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina is an individual amendment, to strike out and insert. Does the gentleman from Alabama now propose his as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As such it may be admitted, and the Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. FINLEY:

"That on and after July 1, 1914, the pay of letter carriers in Rural Delivery Service, for service six days in the week shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly, for standard routes 24 miles in length. For routes in excess of 24 miles, $30 per mile per year shall be added, and for routes below 24 miles, $30 per mile per year shall be deducted. Major fractions of a mile to be considered a full mile.

"For triweekly service the salary shall be the same as for daily service on routes one-half the length. For triweekly service on two routes, the salary shall be the same as for daily service on routes one-half of the combined length of the triweekly routes."

Mr. TRIBBLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "$1,200," in line 3 of the amendment, and insert "$1,300."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I offered needs very little explanation. The law that was passed raising the limit of rural carriers' pay at the present session of Congress was in the Post Office appropriation bill. The language used in that bill in providing this raise is the identical language that was used in making the raise in 1912, and I believe indefinitely, back as far as rural carriers' pay has been raised, so of course this left the matter of how the salary should be apportioned amongst the carriers to the Post Office Department, but it was intended and always understood that the carriers serving a standard route of 24 miles or over would get the maximum pay. Now, the law was framed in the way it was framed supposedly for the purpose of enabling the department to graduate the pay on routes less than standard routes, less than 24 miles in length, and I may say until quite recently the Post Office Department has always carried its rules and regulations made as I have stated.

The rules and regulations for years have provided for this basis of fixing the pay of rural carriers, and the recent executive order of the Postmaster General bringing into consideration the question as to what increase of salary should be received amounts to about this: The executive order does not reduce the salary of any carrier as fixed to June 30, 1914. I take it there is a provision in the act of 1912 which was probably construed by the department as prohibiting any decrease, and I think it does, but not only is the length of route considered by the executive order of which I spoke, but the weight of mails and the number of pieces and those elements are brought in and made a part of the executive order recently promulgated, and the result is——

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield just at that point for a moment?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman be kind enough, as he is very familiar with this subject, to give us some reason why the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads predicate the salaries of rural carriers solely upon the number of miles they travel?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, first it is because the same equipment is required and the same service, so to speak. It is only necessary to travel 24 miles whether you carry 100 pieces of mail or 500.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the standard route?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes. Now I am going to the other part of it. I say that was first. Now, second, the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department for years have been as I have stated. They have predicated the maximum pay on routes of 24 miles or over and then they have graded down the pay allowed the carriers on routes of 24 miles. I understood we were legislating in view of the rules and regulations that had been in force by the Post Office Department for years. I am sure the House understood it. I believe the Senate understood it, and I know that the carriers themselves understood this, if the amount of mail that comes to Members of Congress who have rural districts is anything like the mail I have received is considered. The purpose of my amendment is to carry out the intention of Congress in passing the law raising the pay to $1,200.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield at that point? I understood there was something in the gentleman's amendment in reference to $1,800 pay——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. FINLEY. I will ask for five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there is no disposition to shut us off, and I do not make objection. I made no objection and I shall not.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I wanted to ask the gentleman about a service that seems to have broken down——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has yielded the floor, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret the necessity for disagreeing with my friend from South Carolina and my friend from Alabama on these amendments. I disagree with a great body of this House that I know is profoundly in sympathy with the rural carriers, and I confess when I look at the matter from a personal standpoint my sympathy is that way, too; but I propose to say one word to you in the interest of the people and the Treasury of the United States on this question. I suggested in the last session, when this question of $1,200 increase arose—$100 per annum—we might fix it at $50 more and there stop until we ascertained the result of these appropriations and see if we could not perfect this system better; but you proceeded, and under the language of the old law it was clear then, as it is now, that this department, for the purpose of protecting the Treasury, must say to the rural carriers, It is time for you to halt in your demands for increase of pay. The department said it in the shape of an order, authorized by law, that adds an additional element to mileage—that is, the number of packages and weight—and under that graduated from the standard route of 24 miles down, and it turns out they did not get but a little more pay than they did heretofore.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Not now. I know that it has been the desire of the House to give it to them, but the House did not repeal those laws that destroyed the discretionary power of the department, and this result has come about. Why did the Postmaster General have to do it, when you come to consider the question? Now, take the schedule of the routes. At Eagle, Colo., the carrier travels 24 miles, the standard route, gets $1,200, and each time he makes a trip he carries from 400 to 600 packages containing from 300 to 400 pounds, in the aggregate, per day.

Well, he ought to be paid a just compensation for that, and probably $1 200 is correct. But take a case in my own State——

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman does not mean that each one of those packages weighs 500 or 600 pounds?

Mr. MOON. Five hundred or six hundred pounds in the aggregate.

Mr. BARKLEY. For the whole load?

Mr. MOON. For the whole load.

Take it in another district, and a carrier traveling over a good pike road 12 miles, carries an average of about 6 pounds one way and 6 pounds back, and he gets $1.200 a year. I do not mean that is true as to all the routes, but as to that one, and a number of others that I have in mind now. Now, every honest man knows that a man who travels 24 miles and carries 500 or 600 packages weighing that many pounds is entitled to more compensation than a man who travels over the same route with a much less load and only for a few hours. That is part of the reason that the department gives in behalf of their position. And while I say that my sympathies are with the carriers, I know, and you know, you can not deceive the people of your district if you wanted to do so, and I know you do not, for standing back of these salaries at such a high rate of compensation except where they earn it. You can get in your districts, each one of you, just as good a man, and get this mail carried by just as good a man as a civil-service carrier for three-fourths of the pay that you are giving him. I can to-day obtain contracts for the carrying of the rural mails of the United States for 50 per cent less than you are paying the carriers. I warn you that you are paying out for this service of the United States—a necessary, essential service, I concede—and I am not going into any argument on that question—$53 000.000. There is being returned to the Treasury about $13.000.000. There is a loss of $40.000.000 to the National Treasury. You may say it is very well, and that the people are entitled to the service, and we can afford the loss. Possibly that is true. I am not going to disagree with you about that, because I know that some services ought to be performed even at a loss. But what I am going to say to you now is this: That you ought not to act hastily on this question. I want to place in the RECORD not only the reasons of the Postmaster General, but a number of figures covering this question, as a part of what I have to say, which explain more fully than I can now the wisdom of his action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave for five minutes more, in order that I can answer some of these questions.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is not going to shut the rest of us off from making speeches?

Mr. MOON. No; I am going to say to you, that whether you carry this section now or not in the shape it is in, there is not a single one of these amendments worth the snap of your finger and never will be. You will never get the increase. But what I wanted to say was this, that you ought to wait and have a full, careful, deliberate consideration of this question before the committee or in this House, and fix it so that carriers can get what you want them to have.

There is pending in this House a bill, H. R. 12928, reported from this committee and on the Calendar, that carries with it the present proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] in proper shape. Had you not better wait until that bill comes up? There are other sections in that bill that have been disposed of in this bill. Then, let us take that question up deliberately and discuss it and settle it. You made a slip in making the law before, in order to give this $1.200 to them. I am in favor of a fair increase, but I do not want quite so much. But standing in the position that I do as chairman of this committte, I feel it is my duty to undertake to protect, even over your protest, the Treasury of the United States, even though you have got as much interest in it as I have. You know that I do not care whether you pass this amendment, or both of them, in the shape they are in; they will never be effective, never be worth a cent, even if both Houses of Congress were to pass them, as a matter of law. That is a question that you can work out for yourselves. My suggestion to you is that you had better let the matter pass over until you consider deliberately and calmly the views of the department, and not try to turn down the department in accordance with the views expressed here. If you have not the time now, you will have between now and December. It is not necessary that you be too hasty. Now, having sympathy in common with you in a measure upon this matter, yielding to my own sense of responsibility to you and the Government, I have nothing more to say upon this question except it is very wise to make haste slowly on a matter of this kind. Do what you do so it will stand and be worth something to the carriers.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. In fixing the pay of the city letter carriers, is the amount of mail carried, or the number of pieces and the weight, considered, or do they pay them so much a month?

Mr. MOON. They pay them so much a month, and they weigh them down like pack horses, and they are living under conditions that cost them more than the rural carriers to live. I know that you and other gentlemen who try to protect yourselves from this thrusting of your hands into the National Treasury for those carriers, make all sorts of excuses of that kind, but it is hardly legitimate.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has not answered my question yet. I asked if the wages were based on the weight carried or the number of pieces.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has yielded to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, is it not true that in parceling out the territory to the city carrier the number of inhabitants that the city carrier has to serve is taken into consideration?

Mr. MOON. I think so; and they do a very arduous work.

Mr. BRYNES of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman if he voted for the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. MOON. Of course.

Mr. BRYNES of South Carolina. And did you think you were jamming your hand down into the Treasury, as you say now?

Mr. MOON. No; and I do not think I am jamming it down into the Treasury now.

I am willing for you to have the $1.200 if you get it under the proper conditions and if the proper elements enter into the question of compensation. I believe that under the rule the department has established it would bring nearly all of them up to the $1.200 standard if properly pursued.

I voted for the $1.200 proposition. I voted for the bill, of course. I would not refuse to vote for a bill that had many propositions in it that I favored simply because it contained some propositions that I did not favor; but as the gentleman will recollect, my position was that you had better not go so far at that time. I suggested that you had better stop. I yielded reluctantly to the $50 increase.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Was it not the gentleman's intention at that time to make the salary $1.200 for a 24-mile route?

Mr. MOON. Yes; and would now do so in all cases where it is earned; but my insistance is that you wait and consider and not make another foolish amendment that, like in the last one, will do no good. I am a friend of the carrier.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. But you are not upsetting the department. The department is upsetting Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I submit, in connection with my remarks, the following letters, order, and memorandum:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: The unit of compensation for duty performed by letter carriers in the Rural Delivery Service of the Post Office Department has finally reached a point, through the action of the Congress in prescribing a maximum salary of $1.200 per annum, where the entire subject of adequate remuneration for service rendered in rural delivery and the return received therefrom is vital to the welfare of the country and the proper and efficient administration of the Postal Service.

This administration is committed to the fundamental principle that economy shall prevail in the public service and that any expenditure of the money of the people shall bear some fixed relation to the returns received from such expenditure. Now, therefore, when $53,000,000 of the people's money is expended annually for the maintenance and extension of postal facilities to patrons anywhere, and the returns therefrom, as ascertained after careful investigation, do not exceed $10,000,000 (in 1912 the actual returns were $7,570,000), it is time that those charged with the responsibility of administering the distribution of such a huge sum at such a tremendous loss should earnestly endeavor, in a spirit of justice and equity, to provide a means whereby the maximum income from the expenditure might be secured.

This discrepancy and the discrimination that prevailed in the compensation of the employees in the rural service were so self-evident and so startling as to command immediate attention, and prior to the enactment of the legislation hereinbefore mentioned the department had carefully investigated ways and means that would reduce the annual loss of more than $40,000,000 that now appears in the operation of this service and which is rapidly rendering prohibitive the cost of further extension thereof for the benefit of the people, and had arrived at the conclusion that the compensation of the employees engaged therein was entirely adequate for the work performed, subject to a radical revision of the unfair and unequal basis upon which such compensation was fixed. The attitude of the department was materially influenced by the enormous number of applications presented to the Civil Service Commission for employment at the prevailing rate of pay.

A careful survey of the details involved in the rural mail delivery developed these unusual conditions, in that the personnel engaged in such delivery, which was inaugurated in the year 1896, then received a uniform compensation of $300 per annum.

	Per annum.
In 1898 this was increased to	$400
In 1900 this was increased to	500
In 1902 this was increased to	600
In 1904 this was increased to	720
In 1907 this was increased to	900
In 1911 this was increased to	1,000
In 1912 this was increased to	1,100

In each and every instance where increased compensation was authorized certain good reason therefor was apparent to the Congress, yet the mileage factor, which constituted the sole basis of compensation, was never changed by the department.

During this session of Congress a pernicious lobby, encouraged by the circulation of a sheet known as the R. F. D. News and labeled "The official organ of the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association," advocated the increase of the maximum salary of rural letter carriers to the extent of $100 additional per annum, ostensibly on account of the increase in the amount of mail matter carried, due to the establishment of the parcel-post feature of postal activity. This proposition to increase the annual cost of operation of the Rural Delivery Mail Service to the extent of $4,500,000 was further promoted by the periodical visits of certain officers of the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, an organization presumably formed within the carrier body to cooperate with the department in the advancement of the Postal Service, but which in reality has degenerated to a point where, in the opinion of the department, it exercises a baneful influence over the service and incites the carrier body to political reprisal upon the Representatives of the people in Congress who may have the courage to deny its demands or defy its vengeance. Largely through the influence and activities of the "official organ" certain carriers submitted grossly exaggerated, misleading, and untrue statements to Members of Congress relative to the cost of maintaining service on their several routes. A circular issued from the same source, dated July 29, 1914, boasts of the success of the methods pursued and tells of plans for further legislation, and mentions an allowance for equipment, etc., as the next avenue of approach.

Now, the annual maximum compensation of the rural carriers was fixed at $1,200, effective July 1, 1914, and the department, while not consulted as to the necessity for the increase in compensation, has earnestly endeavored to adjust the salaries of the employees in an equitable manner on the basis of additional service rendered.

Our further survey disclosed that on a very large number of daily routes more than 20,000 pieces and more than 2,500 pounds of mail are handled each month, whereas on other daily routes of equal length less than 3,000 pieces and less than 500 pounds are handled monthly. The following tables illustrate the woeful lack of attention which has heretofore been given to this most important factor involved in the equitable and definite relationship that should prevail between the amount of work performed and the amount of money paid therefor:

A most cursory examination or comparison of these two tables shows conclusively that some readjustment of compensation for rural carriers was an imperative necessity. This the department has done, as is set forth in the inclosed order dated July 14, 1914.

To secure the increase of $100 in pay, as authorized by the Congress, a carrier shall transport each month 10,000 pieces of mail, which has been ascertained as the average carried in the past over a standard route, and not less than 1,300 pounds of any mailable matter. You will note that this requires the carriage of one parcel of the maximum weight established by the regulation (50 pounds), or its equivalent in weight of mail matter of other classes, and is apparently in strict compliance with the intent of the Congress to provide for a higher compensation for the greater service rendered, due to the extra duty involved in handling the parcel post.

A return to the former mileage basis, as is suggested in certain bills introduced, would be inequitable and unjust to certain carriers whose compensation has now been very materially increased beyond that which has been paid them heretofore, and will include, in addition to those entered upon the tables above mentioned showing increases over $100 each, many thousands of other employees not so included, since it has been impossible, as yet, to complete the comparative tabulation of the entire service.

Your attention is also invited to the fact that under the new system certain pecuniary recognition is given to the carriage of closed pouches of mail to post offices located on rural routes and to those carriers who serve routes in excess of 25 miles in length. The employees themselves have been insistent that both these factors should be considered in any revision of their salary schedule. Neither has heretofore been recognized by the Congress nor by the department. Thus, the weight and the number of pieces as an additional factor again illustrate their usefulness as a matter of equity and justice.

Finally, not a single employee in the rural service suffers any decrease in the compensation heretofore paid, and the only sentiment which is either material or relevant to the equity involved is that which has been created by the unfortunate dissemination of unauthorized information to the effect that all carriers in the Rural Delivery Service would receive an increase of one-eleventh in their annual rate of pay, regardless of the argument used in support of the requests for such increase or the facts that warrant the proper distribution of the increase in proportion to the actual work involved or amount of mail matter transported.

The future advancement and promotion of efficiency in the rural mail service will undoubtedly be influenced by the attitude of the Congress on this subject. Shall these employees receive compensation in proportion to the amount of work performed and the arduous nature thereof, as is the case in all other lines of employment throughout this country, or shall a special privilege be granted to certain of their number to receive the same remuneration for extremely limited service rendered, and who, for instance, may utilize a motor vehicle on highly improved highways, carrying in some cases only 10 pounds of mail matter, in less than three hours daily, and then engage in other lines of competitive activity remunerative to themselves, while their fellow employees not so favored must perform eight hours of service daily, on difficult mountain highways, carrying over 300 pounds of mail matter? The department has sincerely endeavored to remedy this gross injustice and believes that the patrons of the Postal Service will recognize the substantial equity involved in the principle that the salary of an employee should be proportionate to the work performed.

Further, in the interest of thousands of prospective patrons, it is the earnest desire of the department to continue the extension and increase the frequency of the Rural Delivery Service, and plans have already been formulated whereby the delivery zone may be doubled, the accomplishment of which will be sadly handicapped when the available resources for the purpose have been otherwise applied.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 14, 1914.

(Order No. 8246.)

On and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of rural carriers shall be based upon the length of routes and the number of pieces and the weight of mail carried, as shown by the records of the department, and their rates of pay shall be computed on and fixed according to the following schedule:

Schedule.

Length of route.	Salary base.	Pieces of mail per month.	Pounds of mail per month.
4 miles and less than 6 miles	$480	3,000	400
6 miles and less than 8 miles	528	3,700	490
8 miles and less than 10 miles	576	4,400	580
10 miles and less than 12 miles	624	5,100	670
12 miles and less than 14 miles	672	5,800	760
14 miles and less than 16 miles	$720	6,500	850
16 miles and less than 18 miles	840	7,200	940
18 miles and less than 20 miles	960	7,900	1,030
20 miles and less than 22 miles	1,080	8,600	1,120
22 miles and less than 24 miles	1,152	9,300	1,210
24 miles and over	1,200	10,000	1,300

An increase or decrease of $12 per annum shall be made for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds, respectively, greater or less than the schedule, and an allowance of $12 per annum shall be made for each closed pouch or closed sack of mail carried per day, and also for each full mile of route served in excess of 25 miles in length.

Provided, That no carrier shall be reduced in present compensation because of this order, and that $1,200 per annum shall be the maximum salary.

A carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the combined length of the two routes.

The compensation of carriers on newly established routes shall be at the rates in effect June 30, 1914.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

JULY 31, 1914.

The Postmaster General issued an order to-day promulgating the schedule of salaries to be paid carriers in the Rural Delivery Service from July 1, 1914, in accordance with the recent act of Congress providing $1,200 per annum as the maximum pay of these employees.

Heretofore the unit of compensation upon which the salaries of carriers has been based included only the number of miles traversed, without any consideration of the time required to travel such mileage or the amount of work performed by the carrier during such travel.

The Postmaster General concluded that the time had arrived when certain recognition should be given to some additional features involved in the collection and delivery of the mail on rural routes, and that the most important item for particular attention was the improvement in the efficiency of rural mail delivery, in order that the patrons of the service should receive the maximum return for the enormous expenditure involved and that the remuneration of the employees engaged therein should bear some fixed relation to the amount of service rendered. To this end it was equally essential that the new features thus introduced should not interfere with or reduce the basis of compensation which heretofore prevailed and which was regarded as adequate, but should also establish equity, in so far as possible, in the compensation paid to the employees who now perform and who have in the past performed particularly arduous and difficult duty.

The establishment of the parcel post has been utilized as an argument for the necessity for increased compensation to postal employees. During the period that has elapsed since the inauguration of this very meritorious addition to postal activity the department has carefully ascertained the actual results produced on each rural route, and every consideration has been given to the information thus secured in this order of the Postmaster General now in effect. The basis of computation for maximum compensation requires the transportation of one parcel-post package per day of the maximum weight now established by the postal regulations or the equivalent thereof in any mailable matter and the handling of an average of 400 pieces of mail daily.

The order further provides that on routes less than the standard length (24 miles), where carriers have been receiving less than the former maximum pay of $1,100 a year, an increase or decrease of $12 per annum greater or less than the schedule pay shall be made to or from the prescribed salary for such route for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds of mail handled monthly up to the maximum of $1,200 per annum. It also stipulates that an allowance of $12 per year shall be made for each closed pouch or sack of mail transported by carriers to post offices located on rural routes.

The Postmaster General believes that the new order will encourage the carriers to use all legitimate means to increase the business on their routes and that it will be a further incentive to the patrons to utilize the rural service in the transportation of articles by parcel post in that the increase in the weight or number of pieces thus transported will indirectly have an immediate effect upon the remuneration of the carrier.

It is self-evident that the promulgation of this order is one of the first steps toward the improvement in the efficiency of the rural delivery mail service and the elimination to a large extent of the tremendous disparity that exists between the revenues and the expenditures in this particular branch of the service.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the order of the Postmaster General on this point is very short, and I would like to have the Clerk read it in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read in the gentleman's time the order of the Postmaster General.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, July 14, 1914.

(Order No. 8246.)

On and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of rural carriers shall be based upon the length of routes and the number of pieces and the weight of mail carried as shown by the records of the department; and their rates of pay shall be computed on and fixed according to the following schedule:

Schedule.

Length of route.	Salary base.	Pieces of mail per month.	Pounds of mail per month.
4 miles and less than 6 miles	$480	3,000	400
6 miles and less than 8 miles	528	3,700	490
8 miles and less than 10 miles	576	4,400	580
10 miles and less than 12 miles	624	5,100	670
12 miles and less than 14 miles	672	5,800	760
14 miles and less than 16 miles	720	6,500	850
16 miles and less than 18 miles	840	7,200	940
18 miles and less than 20 miles	960	7,900	1,030
20 miles and less than 22 miles	1,080	8,600	1,120
22 miles and less than 24 miles	1,152	9,300	1,210
24 miles and over	1,200	10,000	1,300

An increase or decrease of $12 per annum shall be made for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds, respectively, greater or less than the schedule; and an allowance of $12 per annum shall be made for each closed pouch or closed sack of mail carried per day and also for each full mile of route served in excess of 25 miles in length: Provided, That no carrier shall be reduced in present compensation because of this order and that $1,200 per annum shall be the maximum salary.

A carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the combined length of the two routes.

The compensation of carriers on newly established routes shall be at the rates in effect June 30, 1914.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am in favor of the payment of $1,200 as the salary of a rural carrier for a standard route of 24 miles.

Mr. BLACKMON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] is recognized.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I think the record of my service in this House will convince fair-minded Members that I am not very much of a grand-stand player; and, I believe, too, that I have been as consistent in my record in protecting the Treasury of the United States as most other Members. But this proposition comes to us in this form: The Congress of the United States deliberately passed a law and placed it on the statute books, and it was the intention, that rural carriers on standard routes should receive $1,200 per annum.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BLACKMON. I have only a few minutes, but will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that the language used in the last Post Office appropriation bill which proposed to increase the salary for rural letter carriers on standard routes to $1,200 is the identical language which was used in all former bills under which the salary of the carriers was increased; and if this is true did not you and other Members of Congress believe at that time that the language was entirely sufficient to authorize the increase to the carriers? I favored the increase and voted for it, believing they would get it, and I think that all Members of Congress believe the language used is entirely sufficient, and we were surprised when, under the order of the Postmaster General, it was not given to them. Will you do me the kindness to give me the benefit of your views and judgment in reference to these matters?

Mr. BLACKMON. The gentleman is correct in his idea as to what Congress intended, at least I so construed the provisions of the last appropriation bill. When we reported the last appropriation bill we used the same language used in all former bills which undertook to increase the salary of carriers in the rural service. It was the intention of Congress to give the carriers on standard routes $1,200 per annum, payable monthly. The department should have known that it was the clear intent of Congress to give the rural free delivery carriers on standard routes $1,200 per annum, payable monthly.

Mr. Chairman, I deny the right of any executive department by an executive order or otherwise to change the provisions of any bill in such a way as to defeat the clear intent of the Congress of the United States. They have not the right to do so. [Applause.] Now we come to the proposition, suggested by certain Members, of putting our hands in the Treasury of the United States and appropriating money that should not be appropriated. I find as I serve here that we have a number of Members who, when the question of voting $35,000,000 to build a railroad in Alaska to accommodate about 35,000 people was before the House, had no objection to a slight appropriation like that; but when it comes to the question of a salary increase for rural carriers who are engaged in a service that is rapidly developing the rural districts of our country, we are met with a cry that "You are improperly putting your hands into the Federal Treasury."

Mr. MOON. Well, you must not include me in that. I did not vote for it.

Mr. BLACKMON. I am not including any of those who did not vote for it. I find, too, Mr. Chairman, that in the delivery of mail in the large cities the Congress of the United States is willing to walk up to the rack and appropriate $17,000 per mile for some fifty-odd miles to flash the mail through 8-inch pneumatic tubes in New York and these other large places and feel that they are not putting their hands into the Federal Treasury improperly. But when you come down to the question of educating and aiding the people out in the rural districts we hear this cry of "Economy."

Here is a man who carries 100 pieces of mail 24 miles over a rough road. He is gone all day. What is the difference to that man whether it be 100 pieces of mail or 200 pieces? Why should he be discriminated against when it takes the same equipment, the same effort on his part to make that delivery as it does in the case of a man carrying 200 or 300 pieces of mail? Yet that is the proposition. The idea of the department is that they will figure it out by the piece and regulate it in that way.

Mr. Chairman, I want the best thing that can be had; but I say to this Congress that if it is right to increase this salary to $1,200 for a standard route of 24 miles, then you can not defend yourselves in not voting for my substitute to grant additional pay to the man who carries the mail 28 miles. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. COX, and Mr. SISSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] may have five minutes more. He is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and heretofore he has not taken up any time at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, a number of gentlemen want to debate this question, and I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois and his colleagues on that side that, if they desire, suppose they take about 20 minutes for debate, and divide it among themselves to suit themselves. I presume the House is going to pass this section.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes of that time myself.

Mr. COX. And I want five minutes.

Mr. MOON. Then, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes, and that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] control one half of the time and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] control the other half.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, I shall have to object if I do not get five minutes' time.

Mr. MOON. Gentlemen, you know it is wholly immaterial to me. I realize that I am in the position of Germany to-day. All of these enemies are around me, and they can divide this time to suit themselves.

Mr. COX. I am with the gentleman from Tennessee, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee, will modify his request and make it 40 minutes, leaving the recognition to the Chair. The Chair will be fair about it.

Mr. MOON. That will be satisfactory to me. I move that all debate on this section, with amendments thereto, be closed in 40 minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. This is a motion, not a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MOON. It is a motion, not a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee please repeat his motion?

Mr. RUCKER. I move to amend that by making it one hour.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will get to a vote too late in the afternoon.

Mr. MANN. Here is an amendment that everybody, or nearly everybody, is going to vote for in some shape. Which is better, to pass it to-day or to wait until next week?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Pass it to-day.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment will do more harm than good, I withdraw it. I want to get a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. Those in favor will say "aye."

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. SISSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. You can not interrupt a vote by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SISSON. I made a request before the Chair put the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not heard it.

Mr. SISSON. I made a request for unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] have five minutes.

Mr. MOON. That was not objected to.

Mr. SISSON. That is not included in this 40 minutes, is it?

Mr. MANN. It is. The gentleman will have to take his chances.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 40 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACKMON. As I was saying, the proposition to increase the salaries of rural carriers to $1,200——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. BLACKMON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. In comparing the expenses of the city carrier with those of the country carrier, should it not be stated that the rural carrier has to furnish an equipment which is very expensive, and expensive to maintain, two horses and a vehicle, which expense the city carrier is not subjected to?

Mr. BLACKMON. In very many instances that is entirely correct. Now, Mr. Chairman, when we come to deal with this proposition, I do not believe there are any Members here who are undertaking to play politics on this question. They ought not to do so. It is absolute folly for a man to talk about playing politics, or about overpaying the rural carriers, when every man in this House who knows anything at all about the subject knows that the rural carrier is subjected to all kinds of hardship. In all kinds of weather he has to carry the mail, and under the law if he fails for any reason to make his trip on schedule time there is a deduction from his salary, and he has to file his claim, and it may be a year or two before he gets his money, if at all. Yet we have gentlemen in this Congress who raise a hue and cry every time you undertake to extend rural free delivery or to aid in paying the agencies that are extending this great service.

I think every Member of Congress ought to be interested in educating the people, because the recent primaries held in this country in different parts of the United States have demonstrated that Members of Congress and all other public officials have been slandered world without end, and until you can reach the people these political assassins will keep up their attacks. There is no better method of educating the people than to extend the Rural Free Delivery Service.

If we are going to carry out the intent of the Congress of the United States, we ought to come to it like men, adopt this substitute, and pay the carrier what we believe he is entitled to. I am not unfriendly to the department. The chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON] said he was surrounded by his enemies. Why, he has more friends around him than anyone else. But this is not a question of friendship or of catering to the department. It is a question of doing what you think is right in the matter, and I hope you will adopt the substitute, because if you do not you make our position appear very inconsistent. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. If I understand the parliamentary situation, there is an amendment offered by the committee. To that amendment the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] has offered an amendment, and then the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] has offered a substitute.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] has offered an amendment to that.

Mr. MOON. So an amendment to the substitute would not be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] has proposed an amendment to it.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] desires to offer an amendment. It is not in order, I take it, at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order in the present parliamentary situation. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, this is a question which appeals to my sense of honor and justice. Rural carriers all over the country have been led to believe that we provided for an increase in their salaries in the last Post Office appropriation bill, but since the Postmaster General's construction on this provision of our bill has been circulated over the country they are in serious doubt about it, and are flooding Congress with anxious inquiries concerning the same. In fact, many of them believe that under the ruling of the Postmaster General their salaries will be reduced, and I have no doubt but what this would be true in many instances, because his construction makes the salary depend upon the number of packages and the weight of the same. This is most unfair and unreasonable. The people in the country are as much entitled to have their mail delivered to their own doors as the city people are. No distinction should be made concerning mail facilities. Everybody can not live in populous cities and communities; it is necessary for a portion of our population to live in the country to keep up our high standard of farming. Indeed, farming is necessary alike to all, for all must depend upon it for support. This being the case, it is unjust to discriminate against farming communities in mail matters simply because they are not so readily reached as the populous cities. The question of keeping in touch with the intelligence of the day does not depend upon the distance of transporting the mail or the number of persons living in a community, but it rests upon a higher plane. We live in a progressive age, which requires accurate information in order to keep up our high standard of efficiency in the various trades and callings among men. We are daily making improvements in everything and it is necessary to keep up with the times in order to properly discharge our portion of the burdens of this busy life, and the farther away one lives from the center of population and culture frequent delivery of mail becomes all the more important.

The rural carrier's work is among the most burdensome. He is exposed not only to the hardships of daily travel over bad roads, but he is exposed to all kinds of weather. When it is too hot he is compelled to sweat it out, and when it is too cold he is compelled to shiver it out. And between shivers and sweats he meets with a thousand unpleasant things, such as muddy roads with his wheels in mud to the hub, sudden rises in streams on his route, causing him to baptize the mail while swimming across or losing a portion of his load entirely in the stream, or ferry across and foot it the rest of the way with a heavy load of mail on his shoulder to deliver, or lost in a snowstorm in the West, a horse gone lame on the way and forced to hire another in order to get home, some part of his mail wagon broken because of hard pulls or runaways. In fact, he has the most difficult part of the postal work. His is like living on the frontier and blazing out the road for civilization. He is the man whose claims we are now considering. He is the man who is asking for an increase. Shall we refuse him? No. Let us place him more nearly on the same plane with letter carriers in the city. They start in on a salary of $720 a year and receive an annual increase of $100 automatically until they reach $1,200 a year. They furnish no delivery wagons. They furnish no teams. They buy no feed for horses. Theirs is all salary, while the rural carrier's salary is divided in two equal parts, one-half of which must be used for keeping up wagons and teams and feed for horses. His burdens have been increased by reason of the parcel post and an ever-increasing mail. His salary is too small and he has no time to engage in any other business for income.

This country is too big, it is too rich, to require men to sacrifice themselves and their families in order that the machinery of Government may be kept in motion. Let us pass this amendment, so that it can not be said that our Postal System is not able and willing to pay a decent wage to those who bear the heaviest burdens. To ride horseback or drive a mail wagon 25 miles each day for six days a week continuously the year round is no easy task. Let him who never tried it consult those who have before he votes against this amendment. I do not know of a more burdensome task.

Mr. Chairman, it was the intention of Congress to provide for this increase in the Post Office appropriation bill passed during this session. I defy the opponents of this amendment, if such there be here, to find a Member of this House or of the Senate who did not believe that at the time of the passage of the Post Office appropriation bill it contained a provision for the increase proposed by this amendment. I pause for some one to speak. No one will deny it. Then, if such was the case, why should we refuse to vote for the Finley amendment? The Postmaster General has seen fit to place a construction on it which was not intended by Congress, and this amendment is intended to convey to him just what we intended when we passed that bill. I have no fault to find with him. He is a good and great man and has made a marvelous success in the Post Office Department, but we have the responsibility of enacting laws, and if we failed to make ourselves clearly understood in our former effort we should be more than willing to do so now, so that these public servants will not unjustly suffer.

It must be remembered that this service is only 7 years old, beginning with three places in West Virginia, in 1896, as experiments, and to-day it has reached every State in the Union, covering more than 1,000,000 miles, at a cost of $53,000,000 annually. No branch of the Postal Service has enjoyed such a wonderful growth and received such a universal indorsement.

Why is this? None other than a public thirst for the news of the day, necessary in the discharge of our duties to ourselves and to our country. He who would discourage it is its enemy and he who is its enemy is an enemy to this country. It may not be intentional, yet the effect is the same as though it were intended.

In August, 1897, the rural carrier's salary was fixed at $300 annually, and seven increases have been made since that time, and this one will make eight, and fix the salary of a full or standard route of 24 miles at $1,200 per annum. The hardships of the work and its importance to the public amply justify the increase, and I feel that we will not have fully discharged our duty until this amendment has been passed. Public opinion is behind it, and it is useless to say that we are not warranted in our efforts to secure its passage. Heretofore it has been quite easy to secure an increase in big, ornamental salaries, but it has been very hard to push up low salaries only a few dollars. Let us show the world that we are willing to recognize labor at least once by passing this amendment and setting at rest forever what our intentions were when we passed the Post Office appropriation bill a few months ago. I vote for it because I think it is right. I vote for it so that the Postmaster General may not be in doubt as to what Congress wants on this subject. I stand for it because I love the laboring man and want him to share in the good things of this life. I do it to lighten some of his burdens and to cheer him on his way, so that he may have a heart to see more beauty in the flowers strewn along his pathway and be more happy in the noble work which he is doing for his country.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I desire to compliment the committee on the discussion of this bill this evening. It has been ably argued from every viewpoint and every angle of the case by every gentleman who has spoken on the subject.

Some criticism has been leveled against section 3 of the bill, and we have been charged upon this side of the House with being salary grabbers and being members of the old spoils party. But I believe that even the gentlemen who make that criticism will, upon reflection, when they come to study the provisions of section 3 find that their accusations against it are unjust.

I am not going to devote much time to section 3, contenting myself with saying, however, that I am for it, and following that by the statement that there is not a more ardent advocate of the civil service in all the United States than I am. That puts it pretty broadly, but I mean exactly what I say.

But I am for an honest civil service. I am opposed to a dishonest civil service. I am in favor of a civil service where brain power and merit are the controlling issues. The Republican Party for 16 years played football with the civil service, and the country knows it. That the Democratic Party will play football with it as long as the rules and regulations are what they are now everybody knows, and everybody will concede it.

There is but one way out of it, and that is to amend the regulations so as to require the Civil Service Commission to certify only one person, and that one person, the one who has made the best rating, and then require the departments to accept that person and appoint him. That is what I am in favor of.

Now, then, you say that the Democratic Party is in favor of the spoils system. What were you in favor of in 1897, when every assistant postmaster in the United States was appointed, not with a view to his efficiency or competency at all, but solely because of his political activities? What has occurred from that time down to date to take them out of the spoils system?

You enforced the spoils system relating to assistant postmasters from 1897 to 1910, when President Taft by Executive order, without any competitive examinations being held, turned all assistant postmasters into the civil service. Instead of this aiding civil service, it was a direct blow at it. Merit system had no chance under such procedure; brain power counted for nothing; efficiency was not on the board; but by a stroke of the pen all assistant postmasters, originally appointed under the spoils system of the Republican Party and retained by it, were turned into the civil service. This is unfair; it is un-American and undemocratic. It gave no chance and no opportunity for a bright, active man to compete in the open field in a fair, square examination for an opportunity to fill these places.

The issuing of these orders, turning thousands of men into civil service without a written competitive examination, weakens the force and effect of the law and is the cause of a vast majority of the people in the United States to-day fighting it. Instead of turning platoons and brigades of men and women into civil service by Executive order, if examinations were held and the people given a right to compete for these places and positions, there would not be the universal outcry and condemnation against it that there is to-day.

It was all right then, when the shoes were upon your feet. But now when we propose not to take these positions out of the civil service at all, but to keep and maintain them in the civil service, but to submit them to a competitive examination, it is said to be a return to the old spoils system. You cry, "Oh, for God's sake save the civil service of the country. For God's sake do not return to the old spoils system." That is your cry now. Did it injure the Postal Service when you maintained it down to 1910? Did you not get competent and efficient people to service in that capacity during that period of time? If you did, and if after 16 years of experience they are not able to stand these competitive examinations it is conclusive proof that they are neither competent nor efficient. All that we propose to do by section 3 is to submit these places to a written competitive examination in which your 2,500 assistant postmasters will be given a full, fair chance to sit down and compete for these places. Why, you know as well as I do, and the country knows, that when President Taft by an Executive order turned into the civil service more than 30,000 fourth-class postmasters your own party did not approve of it. But I believe that the country with one accord, even the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service League in the United States, commended President Wilson when he issued his order requiring a written competitive examination for fourth-class postmasters where the salary was in excess of $180 per year. Your postmasters had an opportunity to sit down by the side of Democrats and compete for those places, and many of them won out. Many hundreds, aye thousands, of them are to-day appointed as the result of competitive examinations. Now, all we want to do by section 3 is simply to submit those people to a written competitive examination with brain power as the test. It is not a return to the spoils system at all, and not an attempt to return to it.

The main part of this bill is in section 13, which proposes to remodel the transportation of the mails of the country. That is the largest question pertaining to the entire mail service. It has been a bone of contention for almost 25 years, the people upon one side contending that the railroads were overpaid, the railroads upon the other contending that they were underpaid, and under the old haphazard way of paying the railroads for carrying the mails there was room for these arguments back and forth. It has cost the United States practically $1,000,000 to get this bill where we have got it to-day. Commission after commission and committee after committee have been appointed in the last 20 years to study the question of transportation of mail over the railroads. Report upon report has been made by these commissions and committees at a tremendous cost to the people of the country, with recommendations as to what should be done, and yet Congress up until this hour has not taken an advance step to determine what it proposed to do. The plan outlined here may not be perfect as presented to the committee, but I believe it is a step in the right direction, and that if details are insufficient or lacking it will only remain for future Congresses to remedy those defects. I do not believe we would ever have gotten this far if Congress had not two years ago appointed a bipartisan commission, composed of Members of the House and Senate, and it is to their work, in season and out of season, that we are able to present a bill which, in my judgment, is sound and workable. Henceforward in the future the railroads will know exactly what they are to get for carrying the mails. The people, on the other hand, will know exactly what they are paying for the transportation of the mails; no one on this floor or elsewhere would stand for oppression against the railroads. The American people are honest and sincere, and desire to pay their transportation companies all they are entitled to. But there has been a doubt as to whether or not they were being overpaid or underpaid, and around that doubt heretofore has waged, for a quarter of a century, a tremendous warfare.

The rates fixed in this bill may not be accurate. I do not know; but, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] said, I think the committee gathered the best data and the best information that it was in their power to gather and report, and from the data gathered by that committee they have fixed these rates; and after having the rates fixed it becomes a mathematical calculation, with power given to the Postmaster General to change them from time to time.

Some criticism has been offered here about the language contained in the bill "not exceeding" so much. I am heartily in favor of that language. I doubt the wisdom and propriety of passing fundamental legislation which changes the entire system of paying for the transportation of the mails of the country without giving to the Postmaster General some power, some weapon, some club in his hands, to hold over the heads of the great railroads of the country.

The limitation fixed in this bill "not exceeding" gives to the Postmaster General complete power over the transportation of mails over the railroads. It would be unwise, if not dangerous, to not intrust him with this power. He should have discretion, and very wide and broad discretion at that, when it comes to fixing rates for the transportation of mail over the railroads. For instance, he might detemine that 21 cents a mile for each mile necessary to travel was too much. Without the language "not exceeding 21 cents" he would be compelled in each and every instance to pay the railroad company 21 cents or 10 cents or whatever the initial rate might be. But while we have fixed the maximum rate we have not fixed the minimum rate, and if I am correctly informed, that provision is following out almost completely the Canadian law on this subject. I believe that the Dominion of Canada has come nearer solving the railway problem of transportation of the mails than the United States. The Dominion of Canada gives the postmaster general plenary power over the transportation of its mails, and the postmaster general in the Dominion has the power to compel the railroad companies to accept the mails and transport them at the rates fixed by him.

Closely allied with the railway transportation problem of the mails is the question of the rate of postage to be paid upon second-class mail matter, which comprises magazines, periodicals, newspapers, and so forth.

For the past 20 years this has been a burning question. Commission upon commission has been appointed; investigation upon investigation has been made by different committees, who have patiently sat for weeks and months at a time, at a tremendous cost to the people, to determine what rate of postage should be imposed upon second-class mail matter. Many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended in studying this ever vexatious and troublesome problem. The rate of postage now paid on second-class matter is a flat rate of 1 cent per pound. It is conceded by all who have studied the question that this fails to pay the cost of transporting and handling this class of mail.

Again, it is conceded by all who have studied the question that the Government is now transporting, handling, and distributing second-class matter at a tremendous loss each year.

Some five years ago Postmaster General Hitchcock inaugurated a complete and exhaustive investigation of this entire subject, and he arrived at the conclusion—and, in my judgment, rather accurately—that it cost the Government 9 cents per pound for transporting and handling all second-class matter, making a net loss to the Government of 8 cents per pound upon all second-class matter handled by the Government, a total loss per year of $63,000,000.

I do not state that Gen. Hitchcock's figures are absolutely correct and accurate, but I give it as my judgment that they are in the neighborhood of being correct.

Three years ago Congress appointed a commission to study the question of postage upon second-class mail matter. This commission was composed of three persons and presided over by Justice Hughes, of the Supreme Court of the United States, one of the ablest jurists that ever adorned that bench, and after going through the subject for months, taking and hearing evidence, studying the question, he and his commission recommended that the rate of postage on second-class matter be increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound.

Every commission and every committee that ever studied the question in the past 20 years, without a single exception, has recommended an increased rate of postage on all second-class matter; but some way, somehow, the powerful magazines and press of the country down to this hour have been able to prevent Congress from following out the recommendations of the commissions and committees who have sat in judgment on the question and recommended an increase thereon.

The time has come, and is here now, when Congress should do something upon this question. To handle second-class mail matter at such a loss to the Government amounts to a subsidy pure and simple to the publishers of second-class mail matter, and it should be against the policy of the Government to subsidize any individual or corporation.

Second-class mail matter, like each of the other classes of mail matter, should be compelled to bear its own proportionate cost of transportation and handling.

Our committee last winter held rather extensive and exhaustive hearings upon this subject with the view of seeing whether or not we would follow out the recommendation of the Hughes Commission and increase the rate of postage from 1 to 2 cents per pound on all second-class matter. At those hearings many publishers and many representatives of publishing houses appeared before our committee giving their views as to why the postage should not be increased to conform to the recommendation of the Hughes Commission from 1 to 2 cents per pound. I insert, as a part of my remarks, the testimony of some of the representatives of the big publishing houses who appeared before our committee.

On the 10th day of February, 1914, Mr. Charles T. Root, representing the joint postal committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, Periodical Publishers' Association, and Federation of Trade Press Association of the United States, appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post

Roads, and among many things testified to by him were the following:

Mr. COX. Is your concern a corporation?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, it is; and a good many corporations. It is very important to the good will of the paper.
Mr. COX. What do you mean by saying it is a good many corporations?
Mr. ROOT. For example, the Chicago Dry Goods Co. is one. That circulates among the dry-goods merchants.
Mr. COX. Do you know what the capitalization of the Chicago concern is?
Mr. ROOT. It is not large; I can not remember offhand, but I should say roughly it was $100,000.
Mr. COX. Can you tell us anything about how much profit they made last year?
Mr. ROOT. They did not make as much as they did in previous years, because the last two years have been very poor for all publications. I represent the Automobile of New York, and Motor Agent, of Chicago.
Mr. COX. What is the capitalization of the Automobile?
Mr. ROOT. That is the class journal. The Automobile is not capitalized separately.
Mr. COX. What is the capitalization, then, of the two papers combined?
Mr. ROOT. $30,000.
Mr. COX. Can you tell anything about how much profit they made last year?
Mr. ROOT. I think the two papers made somewhere near $40,000.
Mr. COX. What was their capitalization?
Mr. ROOT. It is nominal, $30,000; that was the way it was started, and they never increased it.
Mr. COX. And they made $40,000?
Mr. ROOT. That is my remembrance.
Mr. COX. Out of that $30,000 investment they made 133 per cent, and yet you think they would have to cut out the business if Congress increased the rate of postage from 1 to 2 cents a pound?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know; it would depend on how much we could pass along, how much we could pass along to the advertisers, and how much we could pass along to the subscribers.
Mr. COX. You say, then if Congress should make these rates from 1 to 2 cents per pound, a company making 133 per cent on its investment would undertake to shove that off on its advertisers and subscribers?

* * * * * * *

Mr. COX. What is the capitalization of the Motorage?
Mr. ROOT. I can not tell what the capital stock of the Motorage is.
Mr. COX. You can not tell whether is it $1,000 or $100,000?
Mr. ROOT. It is near $100,000, but I do not know.
Mr. COX. How much profit did you make out of that last year?
Mr. ROOT. I could not remember that for last year.
Mr. COX. Did you have anything to do with figuring up the profits?
Mr. ROOT. No, sir.
Mr. COX. Did you get any part of the profits?
Mr. ROOT. I presume I did.
Mr. COX. Do you know how much your part of it was?
Mr. ROOT. No, sir.
Mr. COX. What is the name of the holding company?
Mr. ROOT. The holding company is the United Publishers' Association.
Mr. COX. How much stock has that in it? How much is it capitalized at?
Mr. ROOT. I think about $5,000,000.
Mr. COX. Has that ever declared a dividend?
Mr. ROOT. Yes.
Mr. COX. What dividend did the corporation pay last year?
Mr. ROOT. I think it was about $160,000. There never has been any dividends on its common stock; I think its preferred stock paid, perhaps, $160,000 or $175,000.
Mr. COX. How much preferred stock does it have?
Mr. ROOT. It has about two and a half million dollars, I think, in preferred stock.
Mr. COX. And two and a half million dollars of common stock?
Mr. ROOT. Yes.
Mr. COX. How much tangible stock is behind the two and a half million dollars of preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. I haven't got the figures here.
Mr. COX. Well, what would be your judgment on it?
Mr. ROOT. Almost all its work is contracted out; its tangible property is comparatively small.
Mr. COX. Will you give this committee some idea of the tangible property?
Mr. ROOT. I would not venture to go into bookkeeping without any preparation.
Mr. COX. Will you write the chairman of this committee a letter and tell him how much tangible stock it has?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not know that I would.
Mr. COX. Why wouldn't you?
Mr. ROOT. Because I do not think it has entered into this discussion.
Mr. COX. You do not?
Mr. ROOT. Of course, if the United States subpœnaes me, I will be obliged to do it. I am willing to do anything that is fair, but it looks to me like that would be alieunda as the lawyers say.
Mr. COX. It might be alieunda, but it might be very important. Then, you refuse to write the chairman that letter?
Mr. ROOT. I do.

And speaking of the Iron Age, Mr. Root made the following statement:

Mr. ROOT. I think its capitalization was reduced to a million and a half.
Mr. COX. When was it reduced?
Mr. ROOT. Probably within a couple of years.
Mr. COX. And how much was it reduced?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know that it has been reduced. I think perhaps it has not been reduced; think that still remains the same.
Mr. COX. Then, your judgment is that the capitalization of that concern is a million and a half?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. Have you any stock in it?
Mr. ROOT. No; not personally.
Mr. COX. What do you mean by "not personally"?
Mr. ROOT. I have an interest in it on behalf of the United Publishers' Association.
Mr. COX. How much stock does the United Publishers' Association hold in the Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. Practically all of it.
Mr. COX. How much did your concern pay for it?
Mr. ROOT. My impression is that we paid $2,000,000 for it.
Mr. COX. Did you pay that in cash, or did you pay it in stock or in bonds?
Mr. ROOT. Partly in bonds, partly in cash, and partly in stock.
Mr. COX. How much in bonds did you issue for it?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not think it is necessary for me to answer as to all these details. I do not know that there is anything discreditable about it, but it does not seem to have anything to do with this question.
Mr. COX. How much profit did you make last year on the Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate as to that.
Mr. COX. Did you make any profit?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate.
Mr. COX. Did you strike any dividends at all?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate.
Mr. COX. Do you recollect whether you received any dividends or not?
Mr. ROOT. Yes; I recollect.
Mr. COX. How much did you receive?
Mr. ROOT. I decline to make an answer to that.
Mr. COX. Well, it was a money-making concern last year, was it not?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not think I will answer any questions along that line.
Mr. COX. You will refuse, then, to give the committee any information along that line at all?
Mr. ROOT. I will.

And on the same day Mr. E. T. Meredith, of Des Moines, Iowa, publisher of Successful Farming, appeared before our committee and among other things made the following statements:

Mr. COX. In that connection, I believe you said, in answer to a question of Mr. STAFFORD a while ago, that you sold your papers to your subscribers for 25 cents a year?
Mr. MEREDITH. Yes; 2 cents a copy.
Mr. COX. Suppose the rate of postage was increased from 1 cent to 2 cents a pound, what would be the rate you would charge your subscribers?
Mr. MEREDITH. Fifty cents a year; 3 years for $1.
Mr. COX. Would you have to do that?
Mr. MEREDITH. I do not say I would have to; but I would.
Mr. COX. Is your paper a corporation?
Mr. MEREDITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. What is it capitalized at?
Mr. MEREDITH. Seventy-five thousand dollars.
Mr. COX. Who is its board of directors?
Mr. MEREDITH. I am the whole thing.
Mr. COX. You own all the stock, do you?
Mr. MEREDITH. I own the stock; yes.
Mr. COX. Would you be willing to tell this committee how much you made last year on your paper?
Mr. MEREDITH. I do not see that that is essential, etc.
Mr. COX. Can you pay the increase of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound and still make a profit on your $75,000 investment?
Mr. MEREDITH. I can; yes; and still make a profit.
Mr. COX. You can pay the increase and still make a profit?
Mr. MEREDITH. Yes.

In speaking of advertising, he made the following statement:

Mr. COX. Then, you get $1,350 on that page?
Mr. MEREDITH. And the postage alone was $4,000.
Mr. COX. Only one page.
Mr. MEREDITH. That is only one publication.
Mr. COX. You say you charged $1,350 for that one page?
Mr. MEREDITH. Yes; and I am paying about 200 salaries.
Mr. COX. And yet you think if this postage was increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound you would jump the price of your paper to your subscribers up to 50 cents a year?
Mr. MEREDITH. I know I would.
Mr. COX. You would say it had raised because the department increased the cost of carrying the publication, would you?
Mr. MEREDITH. Absolutely so.
Mr. COX. And yet you admit you can carry that increase?
Mr. MEREDITH. Oh, yes.

I particularly call attention to the testimony of Mr. Charles T. Root, who appeared as the representative of the Federation of Trade Press Associations of the United States. It will be observed from his testimony that two of the papers represented by him were capitalized at $30,000 and last year made a net profit of $40,000, or 133 per cent upon the total capitalization, yet Mr. Root, notwithstanding his admission that his paper last year made 133 per cent, insists that if the rate of postage be increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound his papers will have to increase their price to their subscribers. What an absurdity. An investment netting a dividend of 133 per cent, yet if the rate of postage be doubled upon his papers he will be compelled to increase the price of his paper to his subscribers and at the same time increase the price of advertising.

And I especially call your attention to the testimony of Mr. Meredith, of Des Moines, Iowa, publisher of Successful Farming. Mr. Meredith admits that his paper is a corporation, capitalized for $75,000, and that he owns the entire stock of the corporation, and frankly admits that he is making enough money upon his investment to stand the increased rate of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound and still make a profit upon his investment, but again as frankly admits that he would not stand this increased rate of postage himself, but would shove it out upon the shoulders of his subscribers by doubling the cost of his subscription.

No one can read the testimony of these large publishers and be impressed with their sincerity and honesty of purpose.

Every time they were pressed to give facts and figures concerning their business they flatly refused to make answers thereto, and yet these same papers for years have been crying in every issue for publicity—"Throw the limelight on;" "Let the people know the truth"—and when they appeared before our committee in behalf of their enterprise and were interrogated touching matters of vital importance to the committee they flatly refused to answer any question put to them on this subject.

The time has come when Congress should no longer shirk its duty but move straight forward and increase this rate of postage from 1 to 2 cents per pound. This would be far short of equity and exact justice, but it would be the means of increasing the revenue to the Post Office Department of approximately $9,000,000 per year. In other words, the Post Office Department, if it were done, would derive $18,000,000 per year revenue from second-class matter whereas it is now only getting approximately $9,000,000 per year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is no contest here that equals in interest this battle that is made ever so often for the Rural Mail Service by its friends. And, judging from the present temper of the House, the champions of rural free delivery are at last learning wisdom, learning to write into law just what they want, specifically and in terms. The first salary that the rural carriers received was $300 a year. It then was increased to $500, and it was seriously contended at the time on the floor of this House that that was reasonable compensation. The carriers in the country and the people along their routes set in motion an agitation for an increase of salary to $600. It was most bitterly opposed. The president of the Rural Carriers' Association of that day, a rural carrier in Nebraska, had the courage to come to Washington and ask Members of Congress to increase the rural carriers to $600, and the department cut off his head. At that time the opposition to the increase in pay of rural carriers here was led by the men from the city, Members who did not hesitate to increase the pay of their city carriers, but who were moved by a profound conviction that any increase of the rural carriers' pay was an unmitigated and indefensible extravagance. The city Members made all kinds of arguments against the rural carriers' increase, one of which has been repeated this afternoon, about the amount of mail the rural carrier delivers. The argument was not effective then, and it will not be effective to-day. When the day arrives for us to gauge the pay of the rural carrier by the amount of mail he carries it will be well enough to turn to the cities of this country and examine into some of the postal practices there. Take, for instance, the pneumatic-tube service. We are paying in Boston to-day for one pneumatic tube $17,000 per annum per mile, and only 5 per cent of the capacity of that tube is used in expediting the mails.

I recommend to the gentlemen who criticize the rural carriers because they are not carrying the maximum quantity of mail to a prayerful consideration of that fact. Now, I said that the friends of the rural carriers in the House are growing wiser. The House is going to pass, I believe, without delay, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON]. It is not going to be beguiled into postponement by this talk of undue haste. In the old days, when the House was solemnly persuaded by its leaders not to exercise undue haste in this matter, but to view it with deliberation and calmness and scrutiny, the Members were inclined to follow such counsel and refuse the carriers' reasonable compensation. Then a few months later on the same bill the United States Senate would come along and generously increase the rural carriers' pay. The candidate for the United States Senate went out in his State as a hero among the rural carriers, while the Member of the House campaigned his district a much-explaining and an unappreciative advocate of an economy he did not believe in himself.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do.

Mr. COX. When the gentleman spoke of hero worship, one Senator from the State of Kansas certainly was not worshipped very much.

Mr. MURDOCK. He may have been an exception in that regard. At any rate, the House, in refusing reasonable compensation, was repeatedly put in an attitude toward the carriers that the real sentiment of Members did not warrant. The House is for the fullest development of rural delivery. This service, of all the branches of the postal system, is the most popular to-day. The carriers are most faithful servitors. They are giving the best of service, a world better service than could ever have been given to the country had the suggestions of its antagonists been adopted in the beginning, for the men who opposed the Rural Carrier Service at the start wanted to put it upon a contract basis, like the star-route system. It would not have developed under such a plan. In a recent law Congress increased the pay of the carriers to a figure it believed just, reasonable, and compensatory. No one seriously doubts that Congress intended that the carriers should have $1,200. An interpretation of the statute has denied this. This is the time and place for Congress to repeat, unmistakably and without delay, its purpose. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] does this. It should be, and I believe it will be, adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, one of the most interesting chapters in the history of this country is that which sets forth the growth of the Postal System from the inception of this Nation down to the present time. Every patriotic citizen finds many things in his country to commend. The Postal Service is one of the institutions of this country of which we may all justly boast, because no other great country, on the whole, has a postal service superior to that of the United States.

The growth of our Postal Service has been without a parallel. Its inception antedates the adoption of the Constitution. In 1753 Benjamin Franklin was appointed Deputy Postmaster General for all the Colonies. His first service was under Great Britain, as our forefathers had not at that time thrown off the British yoke. Franklin was dismissed because of his sympathy with the Colonies. In 1775, even before the immortal Declaration of Independence was promulgated, the Continental Congress appointed Dr. Franklin Postmaster General. So an independent post office department was set up by the Colonies even before they formally declared their political independence. Franklin resigned in 1776. Ebenezer Hazzard was the first Postmaster General under the administration of our first Chief Magistrate, George Washington. When Franklin resigned there were but 75 post offices in the United States. The total receipts during the 15 months of Franklin's administration of the department were $27,985, and the expenditures were $32,142, showing a deficit for those 15 months of $4,157.

This is an insignificant sum, but a deficit of equal percentage upon the amount now expended would amount to about $35,000,000 annually or more than a million dollars for every week in the year.

Prior to 1816 postage rates were as follows: For a letter composed of a single sheet of paper, under 40 miles, 8 cents; under 90 miles, 10 cents; under 150 miles, 12½ cents; under 300 miles, 17 cents; under 500 miles, 20 cents; and over 500 miles, 25 cents.

These rates continued, with slight modification, until 1845, when the rates established were as follows: For a letter not exceeding one-half ounce in weight, under 300 miles, 5 cents; over 300 miles, 10 cents. The first great reduction in postage came in 1851, when the law was changed so that 3 cents would carry a letter one-half ounce in weight any distance under 3,000 miles. The 2-cent letter postage was established by the act of 1883. Stamps and stamped envelopes were first introduced in 1852. The money-order system was established November 1, 1864. Postal cards were introduced in 1872. We have added the city delivery, the Railway Mail Service, the postal savings banks, the free rural delivery, and the parcel post. A vast army of men are employed in our Postal Service. The annual expenditures amount to $250,000,000. The receipts practically meet the expenditures. The Postal Service is virtually self-sustaining. Our Postal Service is a great institution. It is contributing to the education of our people, to the intellectual advancement of our citizenship. It is a great moral force and is a potent factor in the social uplift of all classes of our inhabitants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we can not afford to cripple any part of our Postal Service. The men in charge of this service, in all departments of the work, must be well paid. The postmasters, their assistants, clerks, city and rural carriers, and railway mail clerks, must be paid salaries to correspond with the splendid service they render, with the responsibility they assume, with the risk they take in this service, and the importance of this service to our country and our people. And we must not give those who occupy the big positions in this service excessive salaries and be stingy with the rank and file, who constitute the great army of public servants in the Postal Service. I have thought for some time that the pay of our third and fourth class postmasters was too low. I hope the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will carefully consider the question of salaries for these postmasters at the smaller post offices, to the end that at an early date we may take under consideration the advisability of increasing their salaries.

PAY OF RURAL CARRIERS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was astounded the other day when I read in the public press the now famous order of our Postmaster General fixing the pay of rural-route carriers under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 9, 1914. That act provides as follows:

Provided, That on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

Under that provision the Postmaster General has made an order which will prevent many carriers from receiving any substantial increase of pay. I am sure the great majority of the Members of this House, irrespective of party, do not approve this order of the Postmaster General. Possibly under the law he may have the authority to enforce this new scheme for fixing the pay of rural carriers. But Congress can amend the act of March 9, 1914, and it is clearly our duty to do so. I believe the rural carrier on a standard route of 24 miles should receive at least $1,200 annually. Indeed, when the Post Office appropriation bill was before the House, in January last, I offered an amendment to the bill to increase the pay of rural carriers to $1,250 annually. I wish to quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, 1914, pages 2201 and 2202, showing the amendment I offered and a portion of the remarks I made at the time. The RECORD on the above date and pages is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, by adding after the word 'substations' in line 19, on page 25, the following:

"'That from and after the 1st day of July, 1914, the compensation of rural letter carriers for carrying the mail six days each week on standard routes of 24 miles in length shall be the sum of $1,250 per annum, to be paid monthly; and on routes exceeding 24 miles in length, the sum of $50 per mile per annum for each mile in excess of 24 miles; and on routes under 24 miles in length, an increase of 10 per cent per mile per annum; on routes carrying the mail three times each week, of the same length as above, the pay shall be one-half the compensation there provided: Provided, That no carrier's pay shall be increased more than $200 per annum on account of the passage of this act.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] makes a point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, on a standard route of 24 miles the rural carrier now receives $1,100 per annum. Section 9 of this bill provides that for such a route a carrier shall receive $1,150.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. Was not the point of order sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. It was, but the gentleman from Oklahoma has been recognized to debate the proposition under the 40-minute plan.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as I said, under section 9 of this bill the pay is increased to $1,150. Under the amendment which I have offered the pay for such a route would be $1,250 per annum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since I have had the honor to be a Member of this House I have felt a special interest in doing what I could to promote improvement in every department of our mail service. I have taken especial interest in every proposition to better the service given our rural population. Great progress has been made along this line. I am ready to vote for larger appropriations from year to year until every farmer shall have his mail delivered at his door. The pay which our rural carriers receive will affect the mail service which our farmers receive. Poor pay to rural carriers means inferior mail service to our farmers. I am therefore in favor of paying rural carriers liberally for their services. Four years ago, March 10, 1910, I made a speech in this House on the very subject we now have under consideration—the pay of rural carriers. My sentiments have not changed. In that speech I said:

"In my judgment the pay of the rural carriers should be substantially increased. They perform a very important service for the people. The position is one of great responsibility and requires men of unquestioned integrity. These men come in close contact with the people. The success of the service and the reputation of the department depend upon their fidelity to duty. The rural carrier is required to make quite an investment before he enters upon his work. He must maintain this investment. There is constant danger of loss. There is the wear and tear of his vehicle and equipment, and he never knows when a large portion of his annual salary must go to purchase a horse to replace the one that has died. He is often exposed to inclement weather. He must go, rain or shine, in heat or in cold. The patrons of the route expect him every day at the proper time. The records show that he seldom fails. The present schedule of salaries was fixed when the equipment of the rural carrier cost much less than it does now and when admittedly the cost of living was not nearly so high. Unless these men receive better pay, in my opinion, the service will lose many of its best men. This would cripple the service. This we can not afford to allow. The rural service must be both extended and improved. We must pay sufficient salary to induce the right kind of men to seek and remain in this service. For two important reasons the pay of the rural carriers should be increased—first, in the interest of an improved service, and, second, in justice to the carriers, who are not now, in my judgment, receiving pay commensurate with the service performed."

I am heartily in favor of extending the rural delivery system. In this service there must be no halting, no hesitation, no delay. The work must go on. We must give to every citizen of the United States the advantages of daily mail as rapidly as suitable public highways shall be provided. The people now understand the value of this service. If the system is not self-sustaining, this will not justify any backward step relative thereto. The people are willing to pay what is necessary to secure this service. The people who reside in the rural districts are entitled to a daily mail to place them to some extent upon an equal footing with the splendid free-delivery system furnished the inhabitants of our towns and cities. But aside from the question of justice, this system is a good investment for the Nation. It is worth far more than it costs. The Post Office Department, as a rule, should be made self-supporting. In the main, it should be managed as a business institution. But there are exceptions to every rule. The manifest and manifold benefits of a daily mail to all our people bring the rural delivery system within the exception. We can afford to provide this system even if it is not self-supporting. If we have in view the welfare of the people of this Republic, we will continue to develop, extend, and perfect the rural delivery until all of our people enjoy its advantages and benefits.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad this amendment has been offered to this bill. Its object is to make the law so plain that the Postmaster General will be compelled to pay the rural carriers salaries in proportion to the plain intent of the provisions in the act of March 9, 1914. When that law was passed the Members of this House understood that carriers on standard routes of 24 miles would receive $1,200 per annum. I have had many complaints from my district of this order of the Postmaster General.

This is clearly out of harmony with the law as Congress wrote it and as Congress intended it. At this our first opportunity we should amend the law in such terms as will take from the Postmaster General the discretion to arrange salaries of rural carriers upon such basis as is embodied in his late order. High-grade mail service to the farmers of this country is of the highest importance, and we can not expect to improve this service by a reduction in the salaries of rural carriers. I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON], and I hope it will be unanimously adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the question as to the advisability of granting this raise in salary has been settled. Congress decided in its wisdom that on standard routes of 24 miles rural carriers should receive $100 a month. The Post Office Department construed the law, and I want to give the House the result in my State. There are in North Carolina 1,230 rural routes. A great many of them are standard routes of 24 miles. Out of that 1,230 there are less than 30 who are receiving $100 per month. These figures are not official, but I obtained them from a source which I believe to be entirely reliable. Very naturally the carriers in my State are disappointed. I am disappointed; naturally every gentleman who supported this increase is disappointed.

Now, I say that this Congress in its wisdom ought to so amend this law as to carry into effect its clear intent, and if this Congress have not legislative ability sufficient to write a law that will carry into effect what we clearly intend to do, then somebody had better go to school and learn how to draw a bill which will stick. By a big majority this House and the Congress decided that rural carriers should have the increase provided for. The question that confronts us now is whether or not we will adopt an amendment which will carry into effect the intention of this House and the intention of the Senate when we passed this law. I see over there my friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. He informs me that a condition exists in his State similar to that I have described in North Carolina. Very few carriers in his district—almost none—will receive $100 per month. It is, I might say, compromising the dignity of this House to permit the law to be construed in a manner different from what we intended.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] tells me that he wrote letters to his constituents saying that this increase which he has worked for in season and out of season had at last been granted. Other gentlemen did the same thing. What sort of explanation can we make? That we do not know how to write a law? Let us answer the question by amending the bill as suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON]. Let us adopt some amendment which will not permit a construction by anyone which will nullify the purpose we have in view. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment, or one of these amendments, for two reasons. One is because of its merits and the other is because we had already enacted, as we thought, a law like this, and we ought not to deceive ourselves, deceive the carriers, and deceive the country by failing to carry out the intention of Congress as we then understood ourselves as expressing it.

I am for it because I believe the letter carriers deserve the increase in salaries as herein provided. I believe that these letter carriers render a service that is of more value to more people, and one that is appreciated by more people, than any other branch of the public service in this country. And to-day they are getting in my district, if you will take the expenses out that they are required to pay for maintaining their outfits, feeding their teams, shoeing their horses, keeping up their wagons, and all of these expenses—and I have ascertained it from every carrier in my district directly—about $500 net a year, or, in other words, about $42 per month, for going every day except Sunday in all kinds of weather and rendering a service that is very important and highly appreciated by the public.

But, in addition to that, we have heretofore enacted this law, as we thought. There is no question about that. There is no man in this House who did not understand at the time that we were passing a law that gave all these carriers $100 a month for standard routes. I notified every one of them in my district that we had passed a law of that sort. The Rural Free Delivery Journal that is taken and read by every carrier, nearly, in this country, published at that time that the salaries of carriers were increased to $100 a month for standard routes and other routes proportionately. Every man in this House so understood it. I understand that one of the rules of construing a law is to ascertain the intention of the legislative body that enacted it. There is no question about the intention of every man in this House when that law was passed. We all understood at the time that we were enacting a law giving them $100 a month, and we appropriated exactly money enough to pay that increase, which shows conclusively that we intended it to be paid. This was the legislative will then, and it should be respected now by the prompt enactment of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the law prior to 1912 placed the maximum at $1,100. During 1912 this Congress considered the question of a raise in those salaries. It was agreed that the maximum should be raised to $1,200. That this increase was understood by everybody to increase the amount of pay to each carrier by $100 is shown by the fact that the total amount of the appropriation for rural carriers' pay was increased so as to allow the 43,535 carriers an increase of $100 each. But we have an executive construction of this law the result of which is to reduce the salaries all along the line from that intended. In order to make an excuse for not allowing the intended increases new elements are introduced as an excuse for not putting into operation the intended increases. Unless the number of articles carried and the weight comes up to an arbitrary standard fixed by the department increases are not allowed. That is in direct contravention of the intention of Congress.

Under these circumstances, it is no more than our duty to make the law so specific that there can be no justification for not carrying into effect our intent. If we believe, as most of us do believe, that the rates are too small and should be increased, we have the opportunity now to change them by supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON]. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the pay of these rural mail carriers should be raised, and that the very modest raise that is asked in the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama should pass this House at this time. At least, there can be no doubt that it is our duty to go as far as the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] will take us, for that is but to make evident and unmistakable our intent in passing the law now in existence. [Applause.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, this proposition has a political and business phase. I am on the business side of it. I want to make it to the interest of the rural carriers to develop to the fullest extent the advantages which the rural mail service, by means of the parcel post, affords the farmer to dispose of his produce. I am disseminating now through my district the literature that is being published by the Post Office Department on the uses of the parcel post by the farmer to market his produce, and when I get through baptizing the district with that literature, the rural carriers will come within the weight limitations prescribed by the Postmaster General, and entitled to the maximum salary allowed rural carriers.

I want to see the platform at every station along the lines of railroad where the early morning trains to Louisville and Cincinnati start in my district lined with packages to be taken to the cities of Louisville and Cincinnati, containing the surplus products of the farmer that have heretofore been thrown into the waste pile. I want to see converted into a profit what heretofore may have been a loss to the farmers.

The rural mail and star route carriers furnish the farmer, if he will only avail himself of it, a golden opportunity to get his produce to market at a minimum cost, and with as much safety and dispatch as a letter is carried.

When the carrier's pay is rated upon the weight carried and not, as at present, exclusively on the distance traveled it will then be to the carrier's interest to encourage his patrons on his route to utilize the parcels post in marketing their produce in the large cities, to the mutual advantage of the producer and consumer. He will thereby not only make money for himself, but he will also both make and save money for his patrons.

For the purpose of familiarizing the farmer with the advantages and uses of the parcels post I shall request leave to publish as part of my remarks several circulars published by the Post Office authorities, showing how the producer and consumer are being brought in direct touch with each other in several of the larger cities of the East, which system I have recently succeeded in having installed at the Louisville and Cincinnati post offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following documents as a part of my remarks:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington.

PARCEL POST OR FOURTH-CLASS MAIL.

RATES OF POSTAGE, CLASSIFICATION, INSURANCE AND C. O. D. FEATURES, WRAPPING, ETC.

Fourth-class matter embraces that known as domestic parcel post mail, and includes merchandise, farm and factory products, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, books (including catalogues), miscellaneous printed matter weighing more than 4 pounds, and all other mailable matter not embraced in the first, second, and third classes.

Extent and usefulness of parcel post.—The domestic parcel post offers a convenient, quick, and efficient means of transporting mailable parcels to any post office in the United States or its possessions. The service reaches more places than any other transportation agency. It brings producers and consumers into closer contact, thus opening the way to reducing the high cost of living. Special treatment and advantages are accorded to shipments of farm products weighing between 20 and 50 pounds. Low postage rates, based on the service rendered, are provided. The rates to nearby zones are particularly advantageous. Parcels may be insured against loss and may be sent C. O. D.

Rates of postage on fourth-class or parcel-post matter—to be fully prepaid—unsealed—are as follows:

(a) Parcels weighing 4 ounces or less, except books, seeds, plants, etc., 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof, any distance.

(b) Parcels weighing 8 ounces or less containing books, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof, regardless of distance.

(c) Parcels weighing more than 8 ounces containing books, seeds, plants, etc., parcels of miscellaneous printed matter weighing more than 4 pounds, and all other parcels of fourth-class matter weighing more than 4 ounces are chargeable, according to distance or zone, at the pound rates shown in the following table, a fraction of a pound being considered a full pound:

The local rate applies to parcels mailed under the following conditions:

(1) At any post office for local delivery at such office.

(2) At any city letter carrier office, or at any point within its delivery limits, for delivery by carriers from that office.

(3) At any post office from which a rural route starts, for delivery on such route, or when mailed at any point on a rural route for delivery at any other point thereon, or at the office from which the route starts, or for delivery on any other rural route starting from the same office.

Alaska, Hawaiian Islands, Canada, Cuba, Mexico, etc.: The eighth zone rate of 12 cents for each pound or fraction thereof on all parcels weighing more than 4 ounces (except books, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, weighing 8 ounces or less), applies (1) between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands; (2) between the United States and its postal agency at Shanghai, China; (3) between any two points in Alaska and between any point in Alaska and any other point in the United States; (4) between the United States and the Canal Zone; (5) between the United States and the Philippine Islands; (6) between the United States and its naval vessels stationed in foreign waters; and (7) to matter not exceeding 4 pounds 6 ounces in weight, except books and other printed matter (to which the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces applies) mailed to Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and the Republic of Panama. (Parcels weighing up to 11 pounds may be sent to Mexico and the Republic of Panama as foreign parcel post mail under the parcel post conventions with those countries.)

The rate of postage on fourth-class matter (which includes farm produce) weighing not more than 4 ounces is 1 cent for each ounce or fraction of an ounce regardless of distance, and on such matter in excess of 4 ounces in weight the rate is by the pound, as follows, the postage in all cases to be prepaid by postage stamps affixed:

ZONES—PARCEL POST GUIDE AND MAPS.—For parcel post purposes the United States is divided into units of area 30 minutes square. Such units form the basis of the eight postal zones. To ascertain in which zone a post office is located from the office of mailing, a parcel post guide, costing 55 cents, and map, costing 20 cents, are jointly used. The guide applies to all offices, but a separate map is required for each unit. A zone key is furnished with the guide for use in the units of area in which the 50 largest post offices are located, and makes the map for those units unnecessary. The guide and maps may be purchased by sending a money order to the Third Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C. Stamps are not accepted.

Send your name and address to the Postmaster, Louisville or Cincinnati, if you want to sell your produce by parcel post, and tell what you have for sale. KEEP THIS TABLE FOR REFERENCE.

The limit of weight of fourth-class matter is 50 pounds for parcels mailed for delivery within the first and second zones, and 20 pounds for all other zones.

Limit of size: Parcel post matter may not exceed 72 inches in length and girth combined. In measuring a parcel the greatest distance in a straight line between the ends (but not around the parcel) is taken as its length, while the distance around the parcel at its thickest part is taken as its girth. For example, a parcel 35 inches long, 10 inches wide, and 5 inches high measures 65 inches in length and girth combined.

Name and address of sender: A parcel of fourth-class matter may not be accepted for mailing unless it bears the name and address of the sender, which should be preceded by the word "From."

Additions to fourth-class mail: There may be placed on fourth-class matter, or on the wrapper or cover, tag or label, any marks, numbers, names, or letters for purpose of description. There may be written on the blank leaves or cover of any book a simple manuscript dedication or inscription not in the nature of personal correspondence. Space sufficient for a legible address, postmark, the necessary postage stamps, and any words necessary for forwarding or return, must be left on the address side of parcels.

Inclosures: There may be inclosed with fourth-class matter a written or printed invoice showing the name and address of the sender and of the addressee; the names and quantities of articles inclosed, together with inscriptions indicating, "for purpose of description," the price, style, stock number, size, and quality of the articles, the order or file number, date of order, and date and manner of shipment; and the initials or name of the salesman, or of the person by whom the articles were packed or checked.

Inscriptions, such as "Merry Christmas," "With best wishes," "Do not open until Christmas," or words to that effect, may be written on fourth-class mail, or on a card inclosed therewith.

Communications attached to parcels: When it is desired to send a communication with a parcel on which postage at the fourth-class rate has been fully prepaid, the communication may be placed in an envelope fully prepaid at the first-class rate and addressed to correspond with the address on the parcel and then be tied to or otherwise securely attached to the outside of the parcel in such manner as to prevent its separation therefrom and not to interfere with the address on the parcel. The stamps to cover the postage on the parcel must be affixed to the wrapper of the parcel, and those to pay the postage on the communication must be affixed to the envelope of the communication. Parcels to which such communications are attached are treated as fourth-class matter. Only one special-delivery fee is required on such parcels sent as special-delivery matter.

Public library books, otherwise mailable as parcel-post matter, may bear any printed or written mark constituting a necessary inscription for the purpose of a permanent library record.

Proprietary articles of merchandise, such as harmless medicinal preparations, soaps, tobacco, food products, etc., put up in fixed quantities, in original sealed packages, by the manufacturer so as to allow examination of the packages in their simplest mercantile form and labeled in printing so as to show the nature of contents, quantity, and name of the manufacturer, are mailable at the fourth-class rates of postage. If such sealed packages are inclosed in an outer wrapper, the latter must not be sealed.

Meats and meat-food products: Before meat or meat-food products of cattle, sheep, swine, or goats may be accepted for mailing from one State or Territory to another State or Territory, the certificate of inspection or exemption required by section 477, Postal Laws and Regulations, must be filed with the postmaster. Such certificate must be prepared and furnished by the sender.

Game: The dead bodies of any wild animals or birds, or parts thereof, including furs, skins, plumage, etc., lawfully killed and offered for shipment, may be accepted for mailing only when the parcels are plainly marked to show the actual nature of the contents and the name and address of the sender. The dead bodies, or parts thereof, of any wild animals or birds which have been killed or offered for shipment in violation of the laws of a State, Territory, or District, are unmailable, persons sending such articles and the addressees knowingly receiving them in violation of the law being liable to a fine of not more than $200.

Nursery stock, including all field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, and other seeds of fruit and ornamental trees or shrubs, and other plants and plant products for propagation, except field, vegetable, and flower seeds, bedding plants, and other herbaceous plants, bulbs, and roots, may be admitted to the mails only when accompanied with a certificate from a State or Government inspector to the effect that the nursery from which such nursery stock is shipped has been inspected within a year and found free from injurious insects, and the parcel containing such nursery stock is plainly marked to show the nature of the contents and the name and address of the sender.

Place of mailing: Parcels of fourth-class matter weighing more than 4 ounces must be mailed at a post office, branch post office, named, numbered, or lettered station, or delivered to a rural or other carrier duly authorized to receive such matter. Parcels weighting 4 ounces or less may be deposited in letter or package boxes.

INSURANCE OF FOURTH-CLASS MAIL.

Fees and conditions: Fourth-class or domestic parcel-post mail but no other may be insured against loss upon payment of a fee of 5 cents for value not exceeding $25, or 10 cents for value not exceeding $50, in addition to the postage, both to be prepaid with stamps affixed. It may not be registered.

Such mail may be insured at any post office or station thereof, or by rural carriers. The sender must fill out an insurance tag, which will be furnished him on request, to be attached to the parcel.

Return receipts for insured parcels may be obtained by indorsing the parcels "Return receipt desired."

Indemnity for lost insured parcels is paid for the actual value within the limit of insurance. No indemnity is payable on account of mere partial damage. However, when an article is so damaged as to render it wholly worthless, it is regarded as lost, provided it was packed and indorsed in accordance with the postal requirements. No indemnity is paid for labor, workmanship, etc., in repairing partial damage.

COLLECT-ON-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Conditions and fee: Parcels of fourth-class or parcel-post matter may be sent "C. O. D." from one money-order post office to another on payment of a fee of 10 cents in addition to the postage, both to be prepaid with stamps affixed. The amount to be collected and remitted to the sender must not exceed $100. The remittance is made by post-office money order, the fee therefor being included in the amount collected from the addressee. A "C. O. D." tag furnished by the postmaster must be filled in by the sender and attached to the parcel. The "C. O. D." fee also covers insurance against loss up to $50 actual value.

A receipt is given to the sender of a "C. O. D." parcel at the time of mailing, but no return receipt is furnished, as the remittance shows that delivery has been made.

Examination of contents of a "C. O. D." parcel is not permitted until it has been receipted for and all charges paid.

Indemnity for lost "C. O. D." parcels is paid for the actual value not to exceed $50, under the conditions governing the payment of indemnity for lost insured parcels.

PREPARATION AND WRAPPING OF MAIL MATTER.

Examination: Fourth-class or parcel-post matter must be so wrapped or enveloped that the contents may be examined easily by postal officials. When not so wrapped, or when bearing or containing writing not authorized by law, the matter will be treated as of the first class.

Nailed boxes.—Parcel post mail may be inclosed in boxes to which the lids are nailed or screwed, provided the lids can be readily removed with a chisel or screw driver for examination of contents.

Wrapping: All matter should be securely wrapped so as to bear transmission without breaking, or injuring mail bags, their contents, or the persons handling them. Many articles are damaged in the mails for the reason that they are not properly wrapped to withstand the necessary handling.

Umbrellas, canes, golf sticks, and similar articles must be reinforced by strips of wood or otherwise sufficiently wrapped to withstand handling and transportation.

Hats in pasteboard boxes must be crated with wood or packed in strong, double-faced corrugated pasteboard boxes.

Cut flowers, candies, etc., should be inclosed in strong and suitable boxes.

Stove castings and pieces of machinery should be protected with excelsior or similar material and wrapped in cloth or strong paper or be properly boxed or crated.

Mailable hides and pelts must be thoroughly wrapped to prevent the escape of grease.

Parcels weighing 20 pounds or under are generally carried inside mail bags with other mail; those weighing over 20 pounds are usually carried outside mail bags. They should be wrapped with that understanding.

Parcels improperly or insufficiently wrapped will not be accepted for transmission in the mails.

Harmful articles not absolutely excluded from the mails, but which, from their form or nature, might, unless properly secured, destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag, or harm the person of anyone engaged in the postal service, may be transmitted in the mails only when packed in accordance with the postal regulations.

Sharp-pointed or sharp-edged instruments or tools must have their points and edges protected so that they can not cut through their covering, and be thoroughly wrapped.

Powders and all pulverized dry substances must be so wrapped that none of the contents of the package will sift out.

Pastes, salves, etc., not easily liquefiable must be inclosed in water-tight containers and placed in strong boxes and securely wrapped.

Liquids.—Admissible liquids in packages not exceeding the limit of weight of fourth-class matter will be accepted for mailing when intended for delivery at the office of mailing or on a rural route starting therefrom when inclosed in a glass or metal container securely inclosed and heavily wrapped, provided it is not necessary to transport them over steam or electric railways.

Admissible liquids and oils, pastes, salves, or other articles easily liquefiable, will be accepted for mailing, regardless of distance, when they conform to the following conditions:

(a) When in strong glass bottles holding 4 ounces or less, the total quantity sent in one parcel shall not exceed 24 ounces, liquid measure. Each bottle shall be wrapped in paper or other absorbent substance and then all placed in a box made of cardboard or other suitable material and packed in a container made of double-faced corrugated pasteboard of good quality. The corners of the container must fit tightly and be reinforced with tape so as to prevent the escpae of any liquid if the contents should be broken, and the whole parcel shall be securely wrapped with strong paper and tied with twine. Single bottles of liquid holding 4 ounces or less may also be packed as prescribed in the following paragraphs (b) and (c):

(b) When in glass bottles holding more than 4 ounces, the total quantity sent in one parcel shall not exceed 16 ounces liquid measure. The bottle must be very strong and must be inclosed in a block or tube of metal, wood papier-mâché or similar material; and there must be provided between the bottle and the block or tube a cushion of cotton, felt, or other absorbent. The block or tube, if of wood or papier-mâché, must be at least one-eighth of an inch thick for bottles holding 8 ounces or less, and at least three-sixteenths of an inch thick for bottles holding more than 8 ounces. The block or tube must be rendered water-tight by an application on the inside of paraffin or other suitable substance and must be closed by a screw-top cover with sufficient screw threads to require at least one and one-half complete turns before it will come off. The cover must be provided with a washer, so that no liquid could escape if the bottle should be broken. Any number of bottles separately packed as herein prescribed may be included in a single package if the limit of weight and size for fourth-class matter be not exceeded.

(c) Bottles containing liquid may also be packed in strong and tight receptacles of wood, metal, or waterproof corrugated pasteboard. Space must be left all around the bottle, which must be filled with bran, sawdust, or other absorbent material in sufficient quantity to absorb all the liquid if the bottle should get broken.

(d) When in a metal container the weight limit of the parcel is the same as for other fourth-class matter. The container must be securely sealed and inclosed in a strong box.

(e) When in parcels weighing more than 20 pounds, mailable liquids in securely sealed glass bottles or metal cans will be accepted for mailing to offices in the first and second zones when packed in strong boxes and surrounded with sawdust or other suitable substances to protect the contents from breakage. All such packages to be marked "Fragile—this side up," or with similar inscriptions and to be transported outside of mail bags.

All packages containing liquid must be marked "Fragile."

Fragile articles. Articles easily broken must be very securely wrapped for safe transmission.

Glass, crockery, fragile toys, etc., must be so packed as to prevent the escape of particles or pieces from the packages if broken in transit.

Cigars should be packed in a manner to prevent damage by shock or jar.

Maps, drawings, paintings, etc., must be suitably protected with stout material to prevent damage. When not flat they should be rolled around a stout stick and carefully wrapped or inclosed in a strong pasteboard tube.

All such articles should be marked "Fragile."

Eggs will be accepted for local delivery when so packed in a basket or other container as to prevent damage to other mail.

Eggs will be accepted for mailing regardless of distance, when each egg is separately wrapped and surrounded with excelsior, cotton, or other suitable material and packed in a strong container made of double-faced corrugated pasteboard, metal, wood, or other suitable material and wrapped so that nothing can escape from the package. All such parcels shall be labeled "eggs."

Eggs in parcels weighing more than 20 pounds will be accepted for mailing to offices in the first and second zones when packed in crates, boxes, baskets, or other containers having tight bottoms to prevent the escape of anything from the package and so constructed as properly to protect the contents; such packages to be marked "Eggs—this side up," and to be transported outside of mail bags.

Perishable articles: Parcels containing perishable articles shall be marked "perishable." Articles likely to spoil within the time reasonably required for transportation and delivery shall not be accepted for mailing.

Butter, lard, and perishable articles, such as fish, fresh meats, dressed fowls, vegetables, fruits, berries, and articles of a similar nature which decay quickly, when so packed or wrapped as to prevent damage to other mail, will be accepted for local delivery either at the office of mailing or on any rural route starting therefrom. When inclosed in an inner cover and a strong outer cover of wood, metal, heavy corrugated pasteboard, or other suitable material, and wrapped so that nothing can escape from the package, they will be accepted for mailing to all offices to which in the ordinary course of mail they can be sent without spoiling.

Butter, dressed fowls, vegetables, fruits, and other perishable articles in parcels weighing more than 20 pounds will be accepted for mailing to offices in the first and second zones when suitably wrapped or inclosed and packed in crates, boxes, or other suitable containers having tight bottoms to prevent the escape of anything from the package, and so constructed as properly to protect the contents. All such parcels to be transported outside of mail bags.

Vegetables and fruits which do not decay quickly will be accepted for mailing to any zone if packed so as to prevent damage to other mail.

Forwarding and return: A new prepayment of postage at the rate applicable between the forwarding office and the one to which fourth-class matter is to be forwarded must be made by the addressee or by some one for him each time it is forwarded. A new prepayment must likewise be made before undeliverable fourth-class matter may be returned to the sender.

Requests for further information should be addressed as follows:

Third Assistant Postmaster General, Division of Classification, relative to the classification and admissibility of matter as parcel-post mail, rates of postage, limit of weight and size, permissible inclosures and additions, attaching communications to parcels, etc.

Third Assistant Postmaster General, Division of Registered Mails, relative to the insurance and "C. O. D." features.

Second Assistant Postmaster General, Division of Railway Mail Service, relative to the admissibility to the mails and wrapping of matter which from its form or character would be liable to injure the mails or the person of postal employees.

Third Assistant Postmaster General.

FARM PRODUCTS BY DOMESTIC PARCEL POST.

RATES OF POSTAGE AND METHOD OF PACKING BUTTER, EGGS, FRUITS, VEGETABLES, DRESSED POULTRY, ETC., FOR THE MAILS.

[Parcels weighing over 20 pounds to be carried outside mail bags.]

Producer and consumer to be brought into closer touch.—The Post Office Department desires to increase the usefulness to the public of the parcel post by bringing the consumer and producer in closer touch. Therefore it invites all farmers who desire to sell and ship country produce by parcel post direct to the consumer to send their names and addresses by mail to "Postmaster, Louisville or Cincinnati, Produce List." Tell what you have for sale. A postal card may be used for the purpose. When a sufficient number of names are received they will be printed and distributed to persons who would likely make use of such lists.

The following rules and regulations govern in the transmission of farm products by parcel post:

Size and weight of parcels.—Packages for the parcel post must not measure more than 72 inches in length and girth combined and must not weigh more than 50 pounds when addressed to a person within the first or second zones, or a distance of not more than about 150 miles. If the package to be shipped is to go more than 150 miles, or beyond the second zone, it must not weigh more than 20 pounds. The postmaster or the mail carrier who will receive your package for mailing will give you any further information you may desire about the rates and manner of packing your parcels.

The rate of postage for parcel-post packages is given in the table here printed. The local rate is applicable to parcels of farm products intended for delivery at the office of mailing, including rural routes starting therefrom.

Preparation for mailing.—Farmers intending to ship farm products in considerable quantities should submit to the postmaster at their local post office for approval, a specimen parcel showing the manner of packing. Parcels containing perishable articles should be marked "Perishable." Articles likely to spoil within the time reasonably required for transportation and delivery will not be accepted for mailing.

Butter, lard, and perishable articles such as fish, fresh meats, dressed fowls, vegetables, fruits, berries, and articles of a similar nature which decay quickly, when so packed or wrapped as to prevent damage to other mail matter, shall be accepted for local delivery either at the office of mailing or on any rural route starting therefrom. When inclosed in an inner cover and a strong outer cover of wood, metal, heavy corrugated pasteboard, or other suitable material, and wrapped so that nothing can escape from the package, they will be accepted for mailing to all offices to which in the ordinary course of mail they can be sent without spoiling.

Butter, dressed fowls, vegetables, fruits, and other perishable articles in parcels weighing more than 20 pounds shall be accepted for mailing to offices in the first and second zones when suitably wrapped or inclosed and packed in crates, boxes, or other suitable containers having tight bottoms to prevent the escape of anything from the package and so constructed as properly to protect the contents. All such parcels to be transported outside of mail bags.

Vegetables and fruits which do not decay quickly will be accepted for mailing to any zone if packed so as to prevent damage to other mail matter.

Eggs shall be accepted for local delivery when so packed in a basket or other container as to prevent damage to other mail matter.

Eggs shall be accepted for mailing regardless of distance when each egg is wrapped separately and surrounded with excelsior, cotton, or other suitable material and packed in a strong container made of double-face corrugated pasteboard, metal, wood, or other suitable material and wrapped so that nothing can escape from the package. All such parcels should be labeled "Eggs."

Eggs in parcels weighing more than 20 pounds shall be accepted for mailing to offices in the first and second zones when packed in crates, boxes, buckets, or other containers having tight bottoms to prevent the escape of anything from the package, and so constructed as properly to protect the contents. Such packages to be marked "Eggs—this side up," and to be transported outside of mail bags.

Mailable liquids, including preserves, in securely sealed glass bottles or metal cans shall be accepted for mailing when packed in strong boxes and surrounded with other suitable substance to prevent contents from breaking. All such packages to be marked "fragile."

Pastes, salves, etc., not easily liquefiable, shall be accepted for mailing when inclosed in water-tight containers and placed in a strong pasteboard or wooden box.

Mailable hides and pelts shall be thoroughly wrapped to prevent grease soaking through the packing and damaging other mail matter.

Permissible additions.—You may tie or otherwise securely attach a letter in a sealed envelop to your parcel-post package if it bears the same address as the package, but the letter must have on it the regular letter postage and the parcel must have on it the proper amount of postage. It is better, however, to mail your letter and parcel separately. You may place in the parcel a printed circular describing the matter sent, and inclose a printed or written bill for the articles in the parcel. Any other written matter, however, will subject the whole package to the letter-postage rate. In addition to the name and address of the sender, which is required, it is permissible to write or print on the covering of a parcel of fourth-class matter, or on a tag or label attached thereto, the occupation of the sender, and to indicate in a small space by means of marks, letters, numbers, names, or other brief description, the character of the parcel, but ample space must be left for the full address and for the necessary postage stamps. Inscriptions such as "Merry Christmas," "Please do not open until Christmas," "Happy New Year," "With best wishes," and the like, may be included inside or placed on the covering of the parcel in such manner as not to interfere with the address.

Insurance.—Parcels on which the postage is fully prepaid may be insured against loss in an amount not exceeding $25 on payment of a fee of 5 cents, and $50 on payment of a fee of 10 cents. A return receipt will be furnished if desired.

Collection on delivery.—You may send a package C. O. D. by parcel post by attaching an additional 10 cents in postage on the package, provided the amount to be collected by the post office on the package for you is not more than $100, and provided also that the office which mails the package and the one at which it is received are money-order offices.

Time of shipment.—Your postmaster or rural carrier can inform you when is the best time to ship parcels so as to make good connection and promptly reach the office they are addressed to. No delivery of parcels is made on Sundays unless sent by special delivery.

Special delivery.—Parcels which are fully postage paid will be immediately delivered by the office they are addressed to on an extra payment of 10 cents in postage stamps affixed.

Packing boxes for parcel post.—The following is a list of the known manufacturers of packing boxes and containers for the shipment of farm products by parcel post: J. M. Raffel Co., Heath, Clarkson and Race Streets, Baltimore, Md.; Robert Gair Co., Brooklyn, N. Y.; The Thompson & Norris Co., Concord and Prince Streets, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Lawrence Paper Manufacturing Co., Lawrence, Mass.; Hinde & Dauch Paper Co., Sandusky, Ohio; Hartley Folding Box Co., 181 Griswold Street, Detroit, Mich.; H. B. Elliott & Sons, Harbor Springs, Mich.; Sefton Manufacturing Co., 1301 West Thirty-fifth Street, Chicago, Ill.; American Paper Products Co., Second and Bremen Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.; Diamond Egg Box Co., 1002 New York Life Building, Minneapolis, Minn.

Since the publication, on June 9, of the list of farmers who are willing to sell direct to the city consumers through the parcel post, many additional names have been received by the Washington post office. These names, together with those appearing in the circular of June 9, are published below.

It is realized that the method of shopping, by sending the market basket direct to the farm, is to some extent experimental with both the consumer and the farmer, and for this reason the Housekeepers' Alliance of Louisville and Cincinnati has consented to cooperate with the Louisville and Cincinnati post offices to the extent of trying out as many farmers as possible, with the view of determining the following points: First, whether the business methods of the farmers make it practicable to deal direct with the producer; second, whether the method of packing, character of produce, and intelligence shown in mailing meet the requirements of the city consumer; third, whether the transportation service by the Post Office Department and the Louisville and Cincinnati post offices insures delivery of parcel-post matter in fresh and satisfactory condition.

In order to arrive at a fair determination of these matters and to be able to render a practical service to the consumers of Louisville and Cincinnati generally, the Housekeepers' Alliance desires to have sent to committee on cooperation, Housekeepers' Alliance, by postal card or letter, a specific report by any person in the city who has had parcel-post experience, answering the following questions:

1. Name and address of farmer.
2. Articles purchased and prices paid for them.
3. Who (farmer or consumer) furnished the container and how well were the products packed?
4. Was the farmer's service prompt and satisfactory?
5. In what condition did parcels arrive and how promptly were they delivered by the post office?
6. Remarks.

In order to cover as many sections of the country, as many farmers, and as many separate shipments as possible the Housekeepers' Alliance will receive answers to the foregoing questions from all who desire to thus cooperate with it.

The organization will collate this information and place the results before the city consumer, as well as the farmer, for the information and guidance of each.

Quotations by farmers for their products will continue to be found posted on the bulletin board of the post office in Louisville and Cincinnati.

The purpose of this undertaking by the Post Office Department, with the cooperation of public-spirited persons and institutions, is to bring the city consumer and country producer together through the facilities offered by the parcel post. This consists of a very simple proceeding. After you have written to a farmer on this list, or any other farmer whose address you have learned from some acquaintance, and have made arrangements as to the price and payment for the articles you want to buy, take a strong market basket with a cover or a double corrugated pasteboard mailing box and send it to the farmer. If it weighs a pound it will cost 5 cents to mail it to the farmer empty; if between two and three pounds, it will cost 7 cents to mail. Double corrugated shipping boxes of various types can be purchased very cheaply from paper stores and market supply houses in Washington.

When you have found a satisfactory farmer to deal with, shopping by parcel post becomes a simple process of sending your market basket to the farm with a letter telling what you want. The cost of that process is just a little less than if you got on a street car and rode down town and back, and just a trifle more than if you ordered what you wanted over the telephone. You can mail your empty basket at any drug-store postal station. The parcel post brings the filled basket to your door. This simple process of sending an ordinary, strong, market basket to the farm has been found to be entirely satisfactory for shipping short distances—say 50 to 100 miles, several such baskets now going empty and returning filled weekly through the Washington post office.

Housewives who want to deal with the farmers direct will realize that sometimes they may not be able to make an entirely satisfactory arrangement the first trial any more than they may find satisfactory the first city dealer they may try. Therefore, it may be found advisable to select from this list, at random, the names of three or four farmers to write to, and from the replies pick out two or three of the more promising, give them a trial, and report results to the Housekeepers' Alliance.

Remember that it is more economical to buy three or four dozen eggs by parcel post than one or two dozen, because after the first pound the postage will cost the farmer only 1 cent per pound. When writing to the farmer for his prices, it is well to tell him what the same articles are costing in the city market at the time. This is advisable because some farmers have an exaggerated idea as to the prices that city people are willing to pay for fresh country produce, whereas, others are entirely moderate and reasonable. It is also well to direct the farmers to mail the basket so that it will arrive in this city in time for delivery on the day desired. If intended for Sunday, it should reach Louisville or Cincinnati not later than Saturday noon.

The same system has been recently installed at Louisville and Cincinnati post offices at my request.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

INFORMATION FOR THE PUBLIC.

OBJECT.

1. The postal-savings system is established by authority of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, for the purpose of providing facilities for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the United States Government for repayment.

SAFETY.

2. The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of deposits made in postal savings depository offices, with accrued interest thereon, as provided by the postal-savings act.

WHO MAY DEPOSIT.

3. An account may be opened and deposits made by any person of the age of 10 years or over in his or her own name, or by a married woman in her own name and free from any control or interference by her husband.

4. Deposits will be accepted only from individuals, and no account will be opened in the name of any corporation, association, society, firm, or partnership, or in the name of two or more persons jointly. No account will be opened in the name of one person in trust for or on behalf of another person or persons.

5. A person may open a postal savings account at any depository post office, but no person may at the same time have more than one postal savings account either at the same office or at different offices.

6. All accounts shall be opened in person by the depositor or his authorized representative. After opening an account, a depositor may forward subsequent deposits to the post office by registered mail or by money order made payable to the postmaster.

NO CHARGES TO DEPOSITORS.

7. No charges or fees are collected or required from depositors in connection with the opening of accounts or the subsequent deposit or withdrawal of moneys.

HOW TO OPEN AN ACCOUNT.

8. When a person applies to open an account, he shall furnish the necessary information to enable the postmaster to fill out an application, which the depositor will then be required to sign.

DEPOSITS.

9. Deposits are evidenced by postal savings certificates issued in fixed denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100, each bearing the name of the depositor, the number of his account, the date of issue, and the name of the depository office. The depositor shall sign a duplicate of each certificate, which the postmaster will retain.

10. No account may be opened for less than $1, nor will fractions of a dollar be accepted for deposit. (See paragraph 16 relative to postal savings cards and stamps.)

11. No person is permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month nor to have a total balance to his credit at any time of more than $500 exclusive of accumulated interest.

12. Postal savings certificates are not transferable or negotiable, and are payable only to the person to whom issued, except as provided in paragraphs 27, 28, and 29.

13. On opening an account a depositor is supplied with an envelope in which he may keep his savings certificates. This envelope bears information for his guidance, and a blank ledger record on which an account of his deposits and withdrawals may be kept.

14. If a postal savings certificate is lost or destroyed the depositor should notify the postmaster. Upon compliance by the depositor with the necessary requirements, a new certificate will be issued by the Third Assistant Postmaster General if deemed proper.

15. Postmasters are not permitted to receive issued postal savings certificates for safe-keeping.

POSTAL SAVINGS CARDS AND STAMPS.

16. Amounts less than $1 may be saved for deposit by purchasing 10-cent postal savings cards and 10-cent postal savings stamps. Each postal savings card bears blank spaces in which such stamps may be affixed from time to time. A postal savings card with nine postal savings stamps affixed will be accepted as a deposit of $1 either in opening an account or in adding to an existing account.

17. Postal savings cards and stamps are not valid for postage, and postmasters will not exchange them for postage stamps nor exchange postage stamps for postal savings cards or stamps.

INTEREST.

18. Interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum will be allowed on the amount represented by each postal savings certificate, payable annually. Interest will not be paid for any fraction of a year.

19. Deposits will bear interest from the 1st day of the month next following that in which made.

20. Interest will continue to accrue annually on a postal savings certificate as long as it remains outstanding, certificates being valid until paid, without limitation as to time.

21. Compound interest is not allowed on an outstanding certificate, but a depositor may withdraw interest accrued and make a new deposit, subject to the restriction that deposits at interest will not be received for less than $1.

WITHDRAWALS.

22. A depositor may at any time withdraw the whole or any part of the deposits to his credit, with any interest payable thereon, by surrendering, at the office of issue, postal savings certificates, properly indorsed, for the amount to be withdrawn.

23. A depositor presenting a certificate for payment in full shall indorse it in the presence of the postmaster or his representative and surrender it. The postmaster or his representative, upon being satisfied as to the depositor's identity, will then make payment.

24. When a depositor desires to withdraw only a part of the amount represented by any certificate, the postmaster will cancel the certificate and issue a new certificate or certificates covering the amount remaining on deposit, which will bear interest from the 1st day of the following month.

25. When a depositor desires to withdraw the interest payable on any certificate, he will be required to give his receipt for the amount of the interest paid. The postmaster will enter on the back of the certificate the date of the interest payment.

DEPOSITS MADE IN PERSON.

26. When a depositor, for good and sufficient reason, is unable to appear in person to make an additional deposit, the amount to be deposited may be sent by a representative or forwarded by registered mail, or by a money order made payable to the postmaster. New accounts can not be opened by mail, but a person who desires to open an account and is unable to appear at the post office may forward the money by a representative, who will be provided with an application form, which shall be properly filled out by the intending depositor.

WITHDRAWALS NOT MADE IN PERSON.

27. When, for good and sufficient reason, a depositor is unable to appear in person to make a withdrawal, a blank order for the purpose will be furnished upon his application by mail or at the request of his representative. When the order has been properly filled out and signed by the depositor, his signature witnessed by a disinterested person, and the order returned to the postmaster, together with each certificate to be paid properly indorsed, payment will be made to the depositor's representative, or a money order covering the amount withdrawn, less the money-order fee, will be forwarded to the depositor.

28. When a depositor who is unable to appear in person desires to withdraw the interest payable on any certificate, the blank order furnished will be accompanied by a receipt for the interest to be paid. Upon return of such papers, properly signed by the depositor, the postmaster will make payment as provided in paragraph 27.

DEATH OF DEPOSITOR.

29. In case of the death of a depositor the amount standing to his credit will be paid to the executor or administrator of his estate upon compliance with necessary requirements. In case of the death of a depositor intestate, where no formal administration is desired by his relatives, the Third Assistant Postmaster General may authorize the postmaster, upon obtaining an affidavit in proper form, to pay the amount to the persons entitled under the State laws to receive it.

ACCOUNT OF WOMAN WHO MARRIES.

30. A woman who opens an account and afterwards marries should present her postal savings certificates to the postmaster at the issuing office in order that the certificates may be indorsed as payable to her in her new name. The postmaster will receive no further deposits from a woman who marries and fails to comply with this requirement.

POSTAL SAVINGS BONDS.

31. A depositor may exchange the whole or any part of his deposits in sums of $20, or any multiple of $20 up to and including $500, for United States registered or coupon bonds bearing interest at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after one year from date of issue, and both principal and interest being payable 20 years from such date in United States gold coin. The exchange may be made as of January 1 and July 1 of each year.

32. A depositor desiring to convert his postal savings deposits into bonds on January 1 and July 1 of any year shall make application to the postmaster at least one month previously on a form which will be supplied in triplicate for the purpose. At the time of making application the depositor shall indorse and surrender postal savings certificates covering the amount of the bonds desired, and the postmaster will give him a receipt for the certificates. When the bonds applied for have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, he will forward them to the depositor. The exchange is considered as taking effect on the date when the bonds begin to bear interest (January 1 or July 1), and any yearly interest due on the certificates surrendered will be paid by the postmaster on or after that date.

33. Postal savings deposits which have been exchanged for bonds are not counted as a part of the maximum of $500 allowed one depositor, and there is no limitation upon the amount of postal savings bonds which may be acquired by a depositor.

34. Postal savings bonds are exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

35. Postal savings bonds can be procured only by the surrender of postal savings deposits and will not be issued to persons who are not depositors, but whether in registered or coupon form they may, after receipt by the depositor, be sold or transferred at any time. A leaflet containing additional information concerning postal savings bonds may be obtained from the postmaster.

INFORMATION.

36. Further information concerning the Postal Savings System may be obtained by application at any depository post office or by addressing the Third Assistant Postmaster General, Division of Postal Savings, Washington, D. C.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Those who will read and study the information contained in the above insertions will learn the way to use any surplus products that their families and the local market do not consume or absorb.

It is an opportunity to make and save money—to convert into a profit what you may have been wasting and to sell what you may have been throwing away.

With small postage you can send by mail to any person in any city within 150 miles a package of farm products weighing from 1 to 50 pounds. It is obvious that the lightest containers and most valuable contents will yield the greatest profit. Generally speaking, the city price should not be less than the home price plus the postage. Your rural or star route carrier will receive the package at your mail box, and it will be delivered to the person addressed in the same manner as a letter.

Send your name and address to the postmaster at Louisville or Cincinnati, stating what you have to sell. The early morning trains mean a speedy market. Deposit the proceeds of these sales in a postal savings bank, and see what a snug sum of Christmas money you will accumulate. These opportunities are the result of Democratic legislation. Avail yourself of them.

This system, when completely organized and in perfect working order, will be most useful and welcome to the city people, for no housekeeper, restaurant, café, or hotel manager can then complain of the excessive high prices. It will certainly assist in lowering the high cost of living, and take the punch out of the Republican orators' campaign speeches along this line this fall.

The larger the load, the larger the pay of the carrier. A thrifty, industrious, and happy community, all the direct result of wholesome Democratic legislation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. BRISTOW as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment almost identical with the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], and so I shall support his amendment. It is possible that the pay of some of the letter carriers should be increased. I think rural carriers are, as a rule, underpaid. But there is nothing, as I understand it, before the committee at this time which would indicate just what the increase should be. I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, because it writes into law what was the intention of Congress when we passed the appropriation bill for this great service. When a showing is made, I shall be glad to vote for just and reasonable increases.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a short interruption right there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. My sole intention in drawing the amendment which I offered was to carry out the intention of Congress, and nothing else.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that. I believe this order of the Post Office Department, No. 8246, is without rhyme or reason. It finds no support in actual conditions and shows a lack of business experience as to the work of rural carriers. Everybody knows that it is harder on a team, it is harder on a wagon, to carry a light load over hills and rough roads than it is to carry a good-sized load over level and smooth roads.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GOOD. I regret I can not. This order of the Post Office Department will operate against the carriers who are to carry mail over rough roads and hilly country, where the loads will necessarily be light. We should not hesitate to adopt the Finley amendment.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the RECORD a letter of the Postmaster General of July 21, 1914, explaining the order of July 14, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to insert the letter named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the letter referred to:

JULY 31, 1914.

The Postmaster General issued an order to-day promulgating the schedule of salaries to be paid carriers in the Rural Delivery Service from July 1, 1914, in accordance with the recent act of Congress providing $1,200 per annum as the maximum pay of these employees.

Heretofore the unit of compensation upon which the salaries of carriers has been based included only the number of miles traversed, without any consideration of the time required to travel such mileage or the amount of work performed by the carrier during such travel.

The Postmaster General concluded that the time had arrived when certain recognition should be given to some additional features involved in the collection and delivery of the mail on rural routes and that the most important item for particular attention was the improvement in the efficiency of rural mail delivery, in order that the patrons of the service should receive the maximum return for the enormous expenditure involved, and that the remuneration of the employees engaged therein should bear some fixed relation to the amount of service rendered. To this end it was equally essential that the new features thus introduced should not interfere with or reduce the basis of compensation which heretofore prevailed and which was regarded as adequate, but should also establish equity, in so far as possible, in the compensation paid to the employees who now perform and who have in the past performed particularly arduous and difficult duty.

The establishment of the parcel post has been utilized as an argument for the necessity for increased compensation to postal employees. During the period that has elapsed since the inauguration of this very meritorious addition to postal activity the department has carefully ascertained the actual results produced on each rural route and every consideration has been given to the information thus secured in this order of the Postmaster General now in effect. The basis of computation for maximum compensation requires the transportation of one parcel-post package per day of the maximum weight now established by the postal regulations or the equivalent thereof in any mailable matter, and the handling of an average of 400 pieces of mail daily.

The order further provides that on routes less than the standard length (24 miles), where carriers have been receiving less than the former maximum pay of $1,100 a year, an increase or decrease of $12 per annum greater or less than the schedule pay shall be made to or from the prescribed salary for such route for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds of mail handled monthly up to the maximum of $1,200 per annum. It also stipulates that an allowance of $12 per year shall be made for each closed pouch or sack of mail transported by carriers to post offices located on rural routes.

The Postmaster General believes that the new order will encourage the carriers to use all legitimate means to increase the business on their routes and that it will be a further incentive to the patrons to utilize the rural service in the transportation of articles by parcel past, in that the increase in the weight or number of pieces thus transported will indirectly have an immediate effect upon the remuneration of the carrier.

It is self-evident that the promulgation of this order is one of the first steps toward the improvement in the efficiency of the Rural Delivery Mail Service and the elimination to a large extent of the tremendous disparity that exists between the revenues and the expenditures in this particular branch of the service.

Mr. TRIBBLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] for one minute.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, we have a straight issue before this House. It will, no doubt, be several years before this question comes before this House when Members have an opportunity to move amendments which will be in order. Members have truthfully been telling their carriers that it is not in order to move an amendment to increase salary on the Post Office appropriation bill, and that they can not get the increase question before the House because the Post Office Committee will not act favorably on a bill for increase. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show many amendments ruled out of order by the Speaker, but now the friends of increase have their opportunity of getting a House vote, and every man has a chance to make his record. My amendment makes $1,300 the maximum. I am offering you an amendment that gives each man who operates a rural route $87.50 clear of expenses. I consider reasonable $250 for the food of the horse and the wear and tear of the horse and buggy, which leaves the carrier $87.50 per month for personal service. If you leave the salary as it is now they will get only $62.50 for personal service, and if you vote against my amendment your constituents will ask you whether or not you voted for the amendment introduced by me, which would give our rural carriers $87.50. What are you going to say when this question is propounded to you? It is a clear-cut issue. Are you for $87.50 for personal service of your rural boys? If you vote for my amendment you are, and if you vote against it you record yourself against this reasonable increase. Now is the time to do something for them. The issue is clear and everybody can understand it. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a man on this floor who does not know that every Member here intended to raise the salaries of these rural carriers. While I am always willing to uphold the hands of the able and splendid Postmaster General, yet I believe that he is wrong in cutting down the rural carriers' pay from what Congress intended it should be in our deliberate vote. In my judgment these men undergo the most onerous hardships and do the best service that is performed for the people of America by any department of the Postal Service. Why you take these men, driving through the country in hot weather and going through the rain and sleet and snow in the winter, men who have to feed their teams and keep up their vehicles on the paltry little pittance that we have allowed them, and say their pay should not be increased is preposterous, while Members here who would vote $17,000,000 to build battleships and $250,000 apiece for cannon to put on them, wasting the people's money, oppose giving a letter carrier a decent wage for carrying the mails through the country in order that the people in the rural districts may have adequate mail facilities. I can not understand.

As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] said, we ought to have the parcel post carried to every part of the country, in order that the farmers may dispose of their surplus products on the farms; in order that the man in the city may have fresh vegetables and fruits at reasonable prices. The parcel post is really the best thing that the Government has ever done for the people. Many Members here oppose that. Many of those who oppose adequate payment to the rural letter carrier for his work are opposing parcel-post extension. They do not want the people of this country to have the messages of enlightenment carried to them that these poor boys bring them as they carry the rural mail. [Applause.]

The amendment to this bill, making it definite and certain that the rural mail carriers shall have their increased pay, as we gave it to them heretofore on the general Post Office bill, should be adopted. It is immaterial as to whether or not he carries a great deal of mail or a little mail, as I contend that the people in the country are entitled to have good mail facilities and all the advantages of the parcel post, whether they be in districts thickly or sparsely settled. All of the people pay taxes to keep up this Government, and I believe in the policy that all the people should share in the benefits of the Government in an equal manner as nearly as possible.

I am from the country myself, and I am as familiar with the duties and the hardships of a rural mail carrier as I am with the duties of my own office.

I know that they have to go through the hot summer sun every day in the week, except Sunday, and I know that they have to expose themselves to the cold rain and sleet and the winter winds, cross swollen creeks and streams, imperiling their lives, as well as their horses, in order to get the mail to the people in the country, in accord with the intention of the lawmakers of this land.

I know that these rural carriers are at a heavy expense to feed their horses and keep up their teams and wagons, so that after these deductions are made their net salaries are small.

The rural mail carriers of my district are upright, hard-working, honest men, men of intelligence and high character, who do not want anything but justice and fair play, and I am going to fight for them to have their rights as long as I am a Member of Congress.

I oppose the extravagances and waste of government, but I believe in the men who do the work for Uncle Sam being fairly and properly compensated for their services.

I want to extend and build up the rural mail facilities so as to bring the country people in close touch with the towns, in order that they may have all the agencies to receive and transmit mail and their parcels through the parcel post, and in order to have good service to the country in the way of mail facilities we must pay men decent wages to perform that service as rural mail carriers.

Take it from me the Government can do no better service to the American people than to build up modern, up-to-date mail facilities throughout all the farming districts.

Ever since 1895 I have been an ardent advocate of the parcel post, because I knew and realized that it would be a great boon to the laboring people and the farmers of the country.

The great corporations, railroad companies and express companies, trusts, monopolies, and syndicates fought the parcel post with all of their combined strength.

The people of this country do not begrudge the mail carriers receiving just and proper pay for their work; but it is the same agencies that endeavored to blockade the parcel post and its extension that are to-day endeavoring to keep the rural mail carriers from getting just compensation for their services, because the enemies of the parcel post realize that if you have well-paid men you are going to have a good, perfected rural mail service, reaching all over the country districts, that will carry the news of what Congress is doing, what is happening in the world every day of the week, and that with this good service the parcel post is going to be a great success, and grow so that every farm will be a market place for those who toil in the towns and cities.

I see the farmer receiving good prices for all of his truck and dairy and poultry produce when we have a good parcel post and rural mail service.

I hope this amendment will be adopted by an overwhelming majority of the vote of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5313) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same; and for other purposes.

S. 5843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, some years ago, when the contest was rather sharp as to fixing the salaries of rural carriers, I took the position which I still maintain, and that is that in performing services for the Government every man should receive identically the same amount for performing the same service. The city carrier receives a certain compensation for certain services which he renders the Government in delivering the mail in the cities. Now, when a man performs that same service in a rural district he is entitled to the same compensation, and he ought to receive it. As has been said here repeatedly this afternoon, every man in Congress, so far as I know, believes that the basis pay for standard rural routes should be $100 a month, or $1,200 a year.

Now, when the rural carrier receives the same compensation that the city carrier receives I have always said that I will be satisfied, and have so told the rural carriers in my congressional district. But until that justice is done, as I said once before upon this floor, there is nothing that will stop this agitation, and it will go on until you do that justice and treat the rural carriers with the same degree of fairness and liberality that you treat the man who delivers the mail in the city.

I believe there is no service that is rendered that tends more to build up the rural districts, that tends more to enlightenment, tends more to a proper interest in public affairs, and tends more to elevate and to educate the citizenship of this country than a daily mail service; and I believe every man who lives under the folds of the flag should have his mail delivered to him at least once a day, because that is the one and only service that the Federal Government renders directly to the citizen.

Every other service that is rendered is an indirect service and the benefits are indirect; but here is a direct benefit, and for the billion dollars taken from the taxpayers they are certainly entitled to the boon of having their mail delivered at their doors once every day.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. I will if I have the time.

Mr. FINLEY. The amendment that was offered by myself clearly and unmistakably carries out the intention of Congress as expressed and understood by everybody when we raised the pay to $100 a month.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is on the committee of conference. Will the gentleman say with his Republican colleague that if we put this amendment on the bill we will then get this legislation, and can we write it on the statute books, or will it be destroyed in conference?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it will not be destroyed in conference, so far as I am concerned and so far as my vote and influence goes.

Mr. SISSON. Then, let me ask the gentleman one more question. If the gentleman's amendment goes on the statute books, will it so harmonize with the present existing law that the Postmaster General will be compelled to put the amendment into force and effect?

Mr. FINLEY. I have no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, 17 years ago Congress started the Rural Free Delivery Service with an appropriation sufficient only to provide for three carriers with an annual mileage of travel of 1,843 miles. This service has grown by leaps and bounds until to-day it comprises 43,262 carriers traveling 1,380,076 miles.

It has been suggested here that the carriers originally received $300 per annum; it has also been suggested their salaries have been increased to $1,100 per annum, and both these statements are true, but I shall neither be amazed, abashed, nor retarded in my support of the pending amendment by these facts. It is true these facts without explanation look stubborn and hard to overcome, but when understood they are easy of solution and only demonstrate how necessary it is to analyze a question and to think carefully about it before a vote is had upon it. For example, 17 years ago when the Rural Route Service began farm hands could be employed at $10 per month on the farm, girls performing housework in the rôle of maid or domestic could be had at $1.25 per week. To-day farm hands receive from $30 to $40 per month salary; clothing, food, supplies, and everything else have gone up in proportion.

At the time the Rural Route Service began it was but an experiment; few knew what it was; it was laughed at and scoffed at by many people, and none knew of its blessings and its virtues. To-day it is, to my mind, the greatest single blessing handed down by the Federal Government to the American people. I say this because it affords us a service that reaches the individual citizen, whether he be high or low, rich or poor, educated or uneducated; it is administered without discrimination. Each and every citizen, irrespective of politics, religion, or creed gets the benefit of it. Routes have grown in number, the service has increased in mileage and importance; in fact, it is one service that every Congressman ought to vote for ungrudgingly.

But if additional reason were necessary, the creation of the parcel post, which heaps new and manifold duties—and burdens as well—upon the rural route carriers, this alone would afford ample reason for the increase of salary now proposed by the pending amendment. For example, during the last fiscal year there were handled by the various rural route mail carriers of the country 45,654,876 parcels. It will be interesting to know that this is an increase of 8,000,000 over the preceding year of 1912. Does anyone think this increased burden ought all to be heaped upon the rural carriers of our country, or that they should be forced to carry it without just compensation? Does anyone think the blessings incident to parcel post should be borne and carried alone by the rural carriers? No; this is not just; it is not right; it is not what a just Congress ought to inflict upon these carriers. I am earnestly in favor of the Finley amendment, which fixes a positive and certain minimum salary for a carrier on a regulation route at $1,200 per annum, and I hope this Congress will adopt this amendment unanimously.

There are those here on the floor and elsewhere who assert that the rural carrier is paid too much. I take issue with such gentlemen squarely and pointedly and assert that it is not true. The carrier who keeps up his own vehicle, keeps in repair the harness for his horses, keeps himself supplied with good horses, well fed and comfortable, and takes decent care of his family and himself will need every cent of the $100 a month he would get for carrying on this service, which is the blessing of the age. I again repeat it is one service in which Democrats and Republicans, Socialists and Populists, Prohibitionists and Antis, should all join in commendation. This service is not afforded to a few manufacturers, not afforded to any particularly favored section, not the pap or the patronage of any political party, but is real, honest, faithful, patriotic service to all the American people.

Preceding Congresses have arranged tariff schedules for selfish manufacturers until they have grown rich beyond all the dreams of avarice; preceding Congresses have appropriated money lavishly and, I fear, sometimes wastefully to certain sections of the country for the improvement of rivers and harbors; this and preceding Congresses have appropriated money for Federal buildings when it was false economy to do so; this and preceding Congresses have appropriated money for the development of arid lands of the West; and the American people have stamped their approval thereon.

I assert the question at issue before us is not sectional, is not political, but is as broad as the country itself, is as uniform and universal as any service could be; and it would be selfish and niggardly for this Congress and the 100,000,000 American people it represents to accept so beneficent a service and not compensate the rural carriers who conduct it with a just, comfortable, and decent wage.

[Mr. HARRISON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill of March 9, 1914, says:

That on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

It is perfectly clear in my mind that every man in this House meant to give the rural mail carriers an increase of $100 when he voted for that item. I think it unfortunate that the Postmaster General should have construed it otherwise, and I propose to support the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. FINLEY]. Several days ago I introduced a bill along this line, and I hope that the Senate will concur in this amendment, and do the fair act by these worthy servants of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the Civil Service Commission, in their notices of examinations to be held, says:

The compensation of a rural carrier is based upon the length of the route, and ranges from $484 to $1,200 per year—and I believe every fair-minded, honest man believes that Congress so intended when the Post Office appropriation bill was passed. I do not believe the executive departments have any right to misconstrue acts of the legislative departments of the Government. The carrier who carries a less amount of mail in weight and pieces has the same amount of work to perform and the same time employed and about the same distance to travel as the carrier who has the greater amount of mail to handle and who travels practically the same distance. They are all subject to the same expense whether they travel by buggy, motor cycle, or automobile, and I can not see why they should not be treated fairly in the matter.

I was amazed to learn recently that the Post Office Department had, in effect, undertaken to nullify an act of Congress, and I then determined to do my best to see that these men be given fair treatment. Not one word has been said against the city carriers, and the rural carriers should be given the same square deal.

I hope the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, under the regulations promulgated by the Postmaster General many of the rural mail carriers get no increase of pay, although Congress authorized an increase of from $1,100 to $1,200.

This increase was made by Congress with the intent that these faithful servants of the people should have increased compensation.

I remember very well in the discussion it was shown that the upkeep of horses and vehicles gave a net compensation to these men altogether inadequate to the services they render.

It was suggested, indeed, that the Parcel Post Service was imposing on them additional labor, but it was not intended that the increase should depend upon the increased number of post parcels carried.

It was enacted that the compensation should not exceed $1,200, and it was left in the discretion of the Postmaster General to apportion the increase equitably between men who served only short routes and men who served standard routes.

The increase was intended to be an increase of $100 for a man who served a full route of 23 or 24 miles.

But, without warrant of law, the Postmaster General has assumed to base the increased compensation upon the weight of parcels carried.

Bills for increases of salaries of highly paid clerks have passed this House by the hundreds, but when it comes to the wages of poorly paid men, the men who bear the heat and burden of the day, who go, rain or shine, in frost and storm, plowing through the drifts and plodding through the mud, the lowly men in the service, working and toiling for scanty wages, a holy cry of economy is raised, and they are made to suffer by a sly trick.

Congress, recognizing the needs and deserving of these men, raised the wages from $1,100 to $1,200 simply because the men working for $1,100 were entitled in all decency to $1,200 to recompense them for wages and upkeep of horses and vehicles. By the ukase of the Postmaster General they are deprived of every cent of the increase enacted by Congress.

According to this ukase, men who before were getting $1,100 get no increase, while other men get increases as high as $452. As a matter of good faith we should give the rural carriers what Congress intended they should get.

[Mr. BARKLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, the schedule governing the pay of rural mail carriers contained in the order of Postmaster Burleson is inexcusable and indefensible except as a retrenchment of expenses in a branch of the service that does not pay cost.

If that is his true reason and he desires retrenchment in branches of the Postal Service that do not pay their way, I hope he will contrive in some way to make the big advertising periodical and all second-class matter pay its way and make that particular branch of the service self-sustaining, but in this matter we do not hear of an order or read of a recommendation from this bold, fearless man, who has reduced the pay of the rural letter carriers of the country.

The first-class matter is paying the deficit created in the other branches of the service, and I know that if the people who pay this first-class postage which creates the surplus could decide the question that they would rather make up a deficit created by Rural Delivery Service than one created by handling matter that pays profit to corporations and swells the fortune of the millionaire already made out of the subsidy granted by our Government to these favored few. It was my understanding when we passed the Post Office bill containing this clause—

That on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

I believed, in common with the rest of the Members of this body, that the rural carrier would get $1,200, and everyone knows that to keep up an outfit for the delivery of mail, feed their horses, keep their wagons in repair, and provide food and clothes for their families that $1,200 is not an excessive amount, especially so when we take into consideration the present cost of living. I fully believe that the Congress meant them to have it, and that the Postmaster General has gone out of his way to defeat the express will of this body, and has attacked the little fellow—the rural mail carrier—instead of the big one—the millionaire magazine publisher—and I think it is incumbent on the majority side of this House, who are now responsible for legislation, to see that the Postmaster General does what the law contemplated, and if he wants to make war on a branch of the service that creates a big deficit, let him take the initiative on second-class matter, and we will all march under his banners to bring about a real reform.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. POU, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. RAGSDALE, Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. FARR, Mr. HULINGS, Mr. RUPLEY, Mr. BURNETT, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, and Mr. SELDOMRIDGE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the city carrier. I think he ought to be represented here somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not true that the amendment to the Blackmon substitute is the first thing that comes before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is not.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It is in order to first perfect the amendment, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The usual procedure is to perfect the amendment and to then perfect the substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HULINGS (during the counting). Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] demands a division.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the Chair has already announced the result and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has withdrawn his point of no quorum.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demanded a division upon that.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, it is too late, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 4.

So the amendment of Mr. FINLEY to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLACKMON. I would like to ascertain the parliamentary situation. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina having been adopted, is it in order now to vote upon the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the Blackmon substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Upon a division, demanded by Mr. BLACKMON, there were—ayes 23, noes 62.

So the Blackmon substitute was rejected.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the pay of carriers who serve standard routes of 24 miles shall be $1,320 per annum, and carriers who serve routes of lesser length than standard routes and carriers who serve routes of greater length than standard routes shall receive pay in proportion; the provisions of this section to take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1914.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois withhold the point for a moment? The Chair wishes to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia in what connection he offers his amendment?

Mr. PARK. I offer it in connection with Mr. FINLEY's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. As what?

Mr. PARK. As an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PARK. Well, as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman offers it as a substitute, there is no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the committee amendment as amended by the Finley amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 103, noes 4.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 23, line 3, strike out the figures "17" and insert "15."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think, without objection, that the committee amendment changing the number should be disagreed to.

Mr. MOON. I understood the amendment had not been adopted that was read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is part of the original bill.

Mr. MOON. I understand that gentlemen complained of it not being adopted. The number ought to be changed.

Mr. MANN. No; the committee amendment changing the number of the sections should be disagreed to. It is properly numbered now.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the sections be renumbered by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and that the Chairman of the committee be instructed to report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17042, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the Cullop amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] demands a separate vote on the Cullop amendment. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Cullop amendment.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, may we have that again reported?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. If the Cullop amendment should be voted down in the House, does that leave the text of the bill as it is?

The SPEAKER. Yes. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. To ask that the Cullop amendment be again reported, so that we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Cullop amendment will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That hereafter any assistant postmaster, clerk, or employee in any post office who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to execute a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required to also execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant, clerk, or employee he is, for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General. The postmaster of all such offices shall have the power to select his assistant postmaster, all clerks, and employees irrespective of any civil-service law to the contrary, and all laws, regulations, and orders in conflict with this act are hereby repealed and nullified: Provided, That all such appointments shall be for a period of four years."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Cullop amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. MURDOCK. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the Cullop amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 133, answered "present" 5, not voting 224, as follows:
